In this posture, with fifty battalions of foot, and fifty one squadrons of horse and dragoons, Vaudemont resolved to expect Villeroy, though the Marshal had double the number, with which he was marching on the 14th of July towards him, and came up early enough to have attacked him. But, whether it was that he found the Prince's camp so strongly fortified, or that he would not hazard a battle, till Mental had taken his post in the rear of the Prince's right, to fall upon him there, at the same time that the French army should break up against the front, he remained in sight of the Allies that evening, expecting to have attacked them early in the morning, and in a manner to have caught them in a net, by environing them on all sides. Vau-Prince Vaudemont's fatal retreat. Vaudemont, being informed of Mental's motion, and finding he had already passed the Tbielt, wisely changed his resolution of fighting, and thought it high time to provide for a retreat. Thereupon with great preference of judgment he ordered the intrenchments to be perfected every where; some advanced houses to be set on fire, lest the French should possess themselves of them in their march against him; and the cannon of the left continually to play upon the enemy, to give them occasion to think, that his design was rather to fight than retreat. At the same time he ordered the cannon of the right and the front to be drawn off, and to march towards Deynse, which was done with that secrecy, that the enemy did not perceive it; for he had artfully ordered the artillery to be moving from the batteries all the afternoon, so that, when it went clear off, the enemy thought it had been but the ordinary motion. Then marched the two lines of foot upon the left along the retrench-

1695. retrenchments, to cover which the Prince ordered a body of horse to go and post themselves in the retrenchments, as they were quitted by the foot; the latter marching out at the same time with their pikes, and colours trailing, to conceal their going off. Neither did the enemy perceive this motion, till the cavalry mounted again, and abandoned the retrenchments; by which time the infantry was got into the bottom between Aerssele and Wouterghem, marching towards Deynse. While the foot was thus filing off from the retrenchments, the Prince ordered Monsieur Overkirk, with the right wing of the horse, interlined with Collier's brigade of foot, to make a line falling towards Caughem, and extend himself from the windmill of Aerssele, towards Wink, in order to make Montal believe, that this line was designed to oppose his attempt upon the rear of the Prince's right; but his secret orders were to march off by Wink to Nicelle, and so to Ghent. At the same time the foot marched by Wouterghem to Deynse; the Earl of Rockford, who was posted with the left wing of horse and two battalions of foot towards the Lys, made the rear-guard towards the line, with a line of foot on the one side, and three squadrons of Eppinger's horse upon the other. All this was so contrived by the Prince from the right to the left, that his army disappeared all at once; and, still to impose the better upon the French, Vaudemont, himself, and the Duke of Wurtemberg, with some other Generals, kept in the camp, forming with their own domestics and attendants a small body of horse, with which they followed the army, as soon as it was all got off. The French, finding themselves thus strangely baffled, did what they could to fall upon the rear of the Allies; and particularly Montal endeavoured to attack that body, which was commanded by Monsieur Overkirk, whom he overtook with some squadrons of horse and dragoons. But, the defiles being advantageous, and Brigadier Collier having ordered all the grenadiers of his brigade to the rear of all, to face the enemy from time to time, as they approached, the grenadiers with their fire kept the French at a distance, and made good the retreat. Nor had the enemy a much better success in their attempt upon the rear of the body of foot, commanded by the Count de Noyelles. However, two squadrons of their dragoons, putting green boughs in their hats, which was the Confederates distinguishing mark in a day of battle, and speaking some French, some English, as if they had been some of their own rear-guard, did by that stratagem, towards the evening, come up close to their rear, and marched along with them a little way, till they came to a convenient place, when they fired upon them first, and then fell in amongst them with their swords, which put the first battalion, that was set upon, in some disorder; but the other facing about immediately constrained them to retire, after they had killed a few men: A loss, altogether inconsiderable for a retreat, which is scarce to be paralleled in history, and for which King William, in his letter to Prince Vaudemont, owned himself obliged to him; adding, that he had given greater marks of a General consummate in the art of war, than if he had won a battle (1).^{1695.}

Vaudemont, having reached Deynse towards the close of the evening, left in it a garrison under Brigadier O'Farrel, and then marched as far as the plain of Oyendonck in his way to Ghent, resolving at first to have refted his army there all night; but having halted a while, and then, as he himself afterwards said, calling to mind a maxim of that great General Charles IV. Duke of Lorraine, his father, 'That, when an army is upon the retreat, it must be sure to retreat out of the enemies reach,' he decamped again, and, by nine of the clock the next morning, the whole army was advanced to Mary-Kirk, under the walls of Ghent, from whence Lieutenant-General Bellafaye and the Marquis of Miremont were detached with twelve battalions, and twelve pieces of cannon, to secure Neuport, and the canal of Pasquendal. Their diligence, and the Prince of Wurtemberg's coming up to sustain them, with twelve other battalions, and thirty-eight squadrons of horse and dragoons, quite broke the measures of Villeroy and Conti, who had already taken quarters in sight of that place, in order to invest it. Villeroy, finding the attack of Neuport too difficult, bent his march towards Dixmyde, which was garrisoned by eight battalions of foot, and a regiment of dragoons under Major-General Ellemborg.

Thus was performed a retreat scarce to be paralleled in history. The military men that served under Vaudemont magnified his conduct very highly, and compared it to any thing that Turenne, or the greatest Generals of the age, had done. In the course of the retreat it was once thought he could not get off, and Villeroy's conduct was blamed for not improving the advantage, but it was without cause; for Villeroy had not overseen this advantage, but had ordered the Duke of Mayne, the French King's beloved son, to make a motion with the horse which he commanded; and probably, if that had been speedily executed, it might have had ill effects on Prince Vaudemont. But the Duke of Mayne despised Villeroy, and made no haste to obey his orders; so the advantage was lost, and the King of France put him under a slight disgrace for it.

In the mean time, the attacks against the town of Namur were carried on with great application; and two or three small sallies of the besieged

(1) The King's letter was as follows:

Cousin,

'You cannot believe how much your letter of yesterday noon, which I received this morning by break of day, disturbed me: On the other side, how joyful I was upon receipt of the other letter, dated from Mary-Kirk near Ghent, this day at three in the morning. I am much obliged to you, for in 'this retreat you have given greater marks of a General, consummate in the art of war, than if you had gained a victory; I absolutely approve of your conduct upon this occasion, and I hope it will hinder the enemy from undertaking any more of the same nature. Nevertheless I shall be impatient 'till I know which way they bend their march, since this blow has failed them.'

1695. sieged having had no success, they resolved to make another on the 18th of July, about three in the afternoon, with twelve hundred horse, and four squadrons of dragoons. After they had crossed the Maese, they attempted the trenches on the right-hand of the bridge, belonging to that river, took a redoubt, that was unfinished, and only stuffed with sacks of wool, fell upon the besiegers both in front and flank, and forced them at first to give way; but, the latter taking fresh courage, and being timely supported by some Brandenburg horse, the French were beaten back with the loss of two hundred of their men; nor was this encounter less bloody to the besiegers. However, the King finding that very day, that the trenches were advanced within fuzee-shot of the counterescarp, he resolved to storm the advanced works and traverses that evening an hour before sun-set, to hinder the enemy from fortifying themselves any more; and for that purpose he ordered, that the battalions that relieved the trenches should support them. Accordingly, Major-General Ramsley and the Lord Cutts, at the head of five battalions of the foot-guards, English, Scots, and Dutch, began the onset on the right, being sustained by six English battalions, commanded by Brigadier-General Fitz-Patrick; and at the same time Major-General Salisburgh, with eight Dutch and other regiments, and nine thousand pioneers, insulted the enemy on the left from the redoubt to the ruined tower of Coquelet; and was to be seconded by Major-General Heukelom, with some Dutch battalions. The horse-guard was doubled, and all the troops on that side had orders to be in readiness to support the whole attack in case of necessity; which precaution proved altogether needless, by reason of the extraordinary valour and intrepidity, which the assailants shewed on this occasion. However, the besieged having brought out eight battalions, a great detachment of dragoons, and all the grenadiers, to defend their retrenchments, the dispute was obstinate for two hours, but at last the French were beaten back, and pursued to the very gates of the town. The King, who, according to his custom, remained upon the place, during the whole action, was so well pleased with the bravery and excellent order of his men, that, laying his hand over the Duke of Bavaria's shoulder, he said to him several times with transport, See my brave English! See my brave English! And indeed, it must be remembered to their immortal honour, that without any shelter they advanced boldly and undisturbed, amidst showers of great and small shot, bombs and hand-granadoes, which by the effect of mines and fougades opened graves for them in several places, towards an enemy secured by retrenchments well palisadoed. The Confederates loss in this action mounted to twelve hundred men, either killed or wounded, and that of the French to about as many.

After this success the besiegers carried on their trenches to the village of Bouge, towards St Nicholas's gate; the same being done also on that side near the Maese, as well above as below, with a design to draw two parallels along the river on the side next the suburbs of Jambe, and opposite to the castle-bridge. But, the French being apprehensive of the design, they set fire to the suburbs, which somewhat retarded the approaches that General Corbourn had begun. On the 21st of July, a battery was finished on that side next St Nicholas's gate, and the trenches advanced an hundred paces towards the rivulet, that runs into the bottom, which the French had swelled with water, and which was secured by a kind of half-moon. Next day they began to play upon a bastion, and the works before St Nicholas's gate from a battery of eighteen pieces of cannon; and on the 23d the Brandenburgers battered the water-stop, in order to drain the moat; yet with little effect, because it was lined with large freestone. The great rains, which fell about this time, very much incommoded the besiegers, and interrupted their approaches. However, on the 25th they plied their batteries with success, raised new ones, set on miners to the redoubt of Balart near St Nicholas's gate, and the next day forced the Captain, who commanded in it, to surrender at discretion. On the 27th the King went into the trenches, and perceiving, that the batteries had made great breaches in St Nicholas's bastion, the demi-bastion of St Roche, and at the end of the counterescarp of the town, he disposed all things for the general attack of the first counterescarp, which was performed towards five o'clock that afternoon, in this manner: The English and Scots commanded by Major-General Ramsley and Brigadier Hamilton came out of the trenches to the right, and attacked the point of the foremost counterescarp, which inclosed the sluice or water-stop. The enemy received them with a furious discharge, which however did not hinder them from going on briskly; and, notwithstanding the dreadful eruption of three or four fougades of bombs, that lay buried in the glacis, which put them at first into some disorder, they returned more animated to the charge, and drove the enemy from that counterescarp. But unluckily, whilst the workmen were making a lodgment, some sacks of wool took fire, whereby part of the lodgment was consumed, and the English exposed to the shot of the counter-guard and demi-bastion of St Roche, which they sustained and answered with incredible resolution, till the fire was extinguished and some traverses cast up. On the other hand, the Hollanders, seeing the English in so hot a place, immediately went up along the Maese towards the breach of the counter-guard, and so vigorously attacked the enemy with their hand-granadoes, that the latter thought it safer to retreat than to defend themselves; which very much eased the English. The Dutch lodged themselves upon the counter-guard; and thus both they and the English preserved the foremost covered way before St Nicholas's gate from the Maese to the water-stop, with part of the counter-guard. The valour and firmness of the Confederates infantry in this action is scarce to be paralleled; and it must be also acknowledged that the French officers behaved themselves like men of true courage, exposing themselves on the glacis of the counterescarp and on the breach of the counter-guard, with their swords in their hands, in order to encourage their soldiers. The enemy did not throw many bombs, but they fired incessantly into the trenches with five or six pieces of cannon, which killed several persons about the King, particularly Mr Godfrey.

While this was doing on the town-side, the Elector of Bavaria was not idle between the Sambre and the Maese, but commanded an attack to be made towards the abbey of Salzines, where he designed to post himself. This was performed with so much vigour, that he not only forced the intrenchments near the Sambre, but made himself master of the fort of la Balance near the head of those intrenchments; repulsed four squadrons of horse, that came out of the castle; laid a bridge over the Sambre; passed that river amidst the enemy's continual fire, and possessed himself of the abbey of Salzines, a post of great importance, and which favoured the attack of Vauban's line, that surrounded the works of the castle.

The Elector, resolving to form this line, ordered General Coeborn to dispose all things for that purpose towards Salzines, and General Fleming to do the same on the other side of the Maese. On the 30th of July, by break of day, the Elector, with the Spanish and Bavarian Generals, and General Coeborn, began the attack towards Salzines, and assaulted the intrenchments in flank with about three thousand foot, sustained by some battalions, and one thousand Spanish and Bavarian horse. Major-General Swerin attacked the line in front with five hundred grenadiers, as many musketeers, and one thousand pioneers. And the Brandenburg Generals, with five hundred grenadiers supported by two thousand foot, and their grand musketeers, Gens d'armes, and horse grenadiers, insulted the enemies flank on the Maese side. The besieged at first made some resistance by the favour of a line of communication of one redoubt and two trenches; but being assailed on all sides, and that too with extraordinary bravery, they were driven to the counterescarp of Coeborn fort. Animated with this success, the besiegers pursued those, who fled, as far as the Devil's House, where the French had several cannon laden with cartouches, and about nine hundred men laid flat upon their bellies, who, suddenly standing up, poured in volleys of shot upon the assailants. These received the fire with incredible courage, forced the French to quit the counterescarp of the fort, and made themselves masters of it. However, it being impossible for them to lodge themselves there, they retired in good order. By this brave action, at the expence of about two hundred men killed or wounded, the besiegers gained a lined redoubt, some advanced batteries, and Vauban's retrenchment from the Sambre to the Maese, which with immense labour the French had cut through the rock, and which they boasted would cost the Allies five thousand men before they could take it. This attack on the castle-side, where the King was present, being over, he went to view the trenches on the town-side; and finding, that a mine had been sprung, which had overturned good part of the water-stop into the ditch, whereby the water was lower by two feet, he ordered the miners to work on, in order to drain the moat; and all things to be ready to make a lodgment on the demi-bastion. The two following days the besiegers battered the works before St Nicholas's gate with great fury, and threw many bombs, which did considerable execution; and particularly one fired by Lieutenant-Colonel Brown, which set on fire the enemies magazine in the demi-bastion. On the 2d of August towards evening the Lord Cutts with two hundred English grenadiers, and Brigadier Dedam with a like number of Dutch, both which were to be sustained by the battalions in the trenches, were ordered, to attack the Saillant Angle, and the the demi-bastion, which they performed with great bravery, and, after some resistance, a lodgment was made on the second counterescarp. The cannon having by this time widened the breaches, and all things being ready for a general assault, Count Gustard, the Governor, demanded to capitulate for the town; which being readily granted, the articles were agreed upon, and signed on the 4th of August by the Elector of Bavaria for the Allies, and by Count Gustard for the besieged. The same day the iron gate was delivered to the besiegers; and on the 6th the French evacuated the Town, and retired into the castle.

In the mean while Villeroy, having failed in his design upon Prince Vaudemont, as also against Newport, marched towards Dixmuyde, and ordered Montal to besiege it. The town was weak; but, considering the strength of the garrison, it might have held out a fortnight, or at least have surrendered with less ignominy. But Major-General Ellemberg, being a soldier of fortune, who had merited his preferment merely by his blunt courage in the open field, was presently dispirited, and at a loss what to do, when he saw himself cooped up in a place surrounded by a Royal army; so that after a slight resistance of thirty-six hours, he yielded himself and his whole garrison prisoners of war. Deynse followed the example of Dixmuyde, and was surrendered to the French at discretion by Colonel O'Farrel, without firing a gun. After the surrender of these two places, Prince Vaudemont did not doubt but the French would advance towards Namur; and therefore desired to be reinforced, that he might be able to observe them. The King sent him Montigny's English brigade of horse, and the two Dutch brigades of Dompere and Rhoe, marched towards Brussels, whither the brigade of St Paul was gone before, with orders to join Vaudemont, who designed to form an army on that side.

Villeroy, having ordered the fortifications of Dixmuyde and Deynse to be razed, passed the river Lys at Wacker, and marched up the lines to the Schelde; which he also crossed at Escaenaffe, in order to continue his march to Ninove, giving out, that he was going to the relief of Namur. Upon advice of this motion, Vaudemont decamped on the 4th of August from Ghent, and, passing the canal at Vilvoerd and the Burnt-bridge, pitched his camp at Digbembaving his 1695. his own quarters at the castle of Beaulieu. The Prince sent to the French to demand the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynse, consisting of six thousand men. For, by a cartel settled between the two armies, all prisoners were to be redeemed at a set price, and within a limited time. But the French, having now so many men in their hands, did, without either colour or shame, give a new proof of their perfidiousness, and broke the cartel on this occasion, as they had often done at sea; and indeed, as often as any advantages on their side tempted them to it. They not only refused to send back the garrisons according to the agreement, but most of the soldiers were forced to enlist themselves in the French service, or were sent to Catalonia, and other remote parts. These garrisons might have been saved, for, if their officers had been masters of a true judgment or presence of mind, they might at least have got a favourable composition, though the places were not tenable. The Governors were at first believed to have betrayed their trust, and fold the garrisons, as well as the places to the French; but they were tried afterwards, and it appeared, that it flowed from cowardice and want of sense, for which Ellemberg suffered death, and O-Farrel was broke with disgrace.

Brussels
ed.

The French King, under pretence of revenging the insults of the English fleet, which, under the command of the Lord Berkley, had bombarded St Malo, and some other towns on the French coast, sent orders to Villeroi to bombard Brussels. Upon the French marching to Engbien with a great number of waggons laden with bombs and fire-works, Prince Vaudemont immediately guessed their design, and would have prevented it, if the town could have been persuaded, to give him the assistance that he desired. Burghers, upon all such occasions, are more apt to consider a present, though a small expence, than a great, though imminent danger: So Vaudemont could not pretend to cover them, unless the Confederate army, which might be reinforced by the detachment under the Earl of Aiblon and Count Nassau, should advance and incamp in the plain of Gigot and St Anne Pee. But, because this could not be done neither, without giving Villeroi an opportunity to post himself between him and the King's camp at Namur, the Prince prudently left the Earl of Aiblon and Count Nassau, with the forces under their command, between Waterloo and Genap, where the King had sent them, to oppose the enemies passage at Brain le Chateau. In the mean time Vaudemont posted his infantry on the eminences about Brussels, between fort Monterey and the counter-carp of Ixel, whereby he maintained the communication with the forces at Waterloo; ordered several battalions to the outworks before the gates of Flanders and Anderleck, to secure the city; and extended the horse and dragoons along the canal, to hinder the enemy from passing it.

After several marches and counter-marches, the French appeared before Brussels on the 13th of August; and Villeroi, having taken his quarters at Anderleck, wrote a letter to the Prince of Berghem the Governor, to acquaint him, ' That the King his Master, seeing the Prince of Orange had sent his fleet upon the coast of France, to bombard his sea-port towns, and endeavour to ruin them, without getting any other advantage by it, had thought, that he could not put a stop to such disorders, but by using reprisals; which was the reason, that his Master had sent him an order to bombard Brussels; and at the same time to declare, that it was with reluctance his Majesty had put himself upon it; and that as soon as he should be assured, that the sea-ports of France should be no more bombarded, the King his Master likewise would not bombard any places belonging to the Prince, against whom he was at war; reserving nevertheless the liberty on both sides to do it in such places, as should be besieged. That his Majesty had resolved upon the bombarding of Brussels with so much the more pain, as the Electress of Bavaria was there. That, if the Governor would let him know in what part of the town she was, the King his Master had commanded him not to fire there. Concluding, that he should stay for his answer till five in the evening; after which time he should obey his orders without delay.' The Prince of Berghem, after having communicated this letter to the Elector of Bavaria, who was come in great haste to Brussels upon this occasion, sent an answer to Villeroi, ' That the reason, which the King of France assigned for his orders to the Marshal to bombard Brussels, solely regarded the King of Great-Britain, who was before the castle of Namur: That his Electoral Highness would acquaint the King with it, and send him an answer in twenty-four hours. And as for the consideration, which his most Christian Majesty had for the Electress, that she was at the Royal palace.'

It soon after appeared, that Villeroi's message was but an empty compliment; for, instead of allowing the Governor time to get his Britannic Majesty's answer to the French King's proposal, he began that very evening to fire upon the city with twenty-five mortar-pieces, and eighteen pieces of cannon, that shot red hot bullets. It was not long before the fire broke out in several places, especially about the Town-house. The enemy continued firing without intermission all that night, the day following, and the night after that; during which arose a high wind, which would have spread the flame through the whole city, if the inhabitants had not prudently blown up several houses on the 15th of August. The same day, about noon, the French discontinued their firing, and soon after drew off towards Engbien. The lower town suffered the most by the enemy's bombs, and several houses near the market-place were quite laid in rubbish. The damage was valued at some millions; and the Electress, though she was removed to the suburbs beyond the reach of the cannon, was so frightened with its continual noise that she miscarried of a boy.

The King, having received advice of the motions of the French army, marched the 10th of August early in the morning with two troops of horse guards, the troop of horse grenadiers, and several squadrons of Brandenburgers, leaving the Duke of Bavaria to command the siege. The same evening he reached Waterloo, and joined the troops commanded by the Earl of Aiblon, Count de Nassau, and the Marquis de la Forest; and, having had an interview with Prince Vaudemont, returned on the 12th to his camp before the castle of Namur, where immediately

1695. diately after his arrival the besiegers broke ground and carried on their trenches about one hundred and fifty paces before Coeborn fort, towards the Sambre, and made a good lodgment.

Besides the batteries already erected between the Sambre and the Masse, some others were ordered to be raised, both of cannon and mortars, as well in the ramparts, as in the gardens of the city, in order to batter Terra Nova and fort Coeborn all at once. On the 13th, the besiegers began to play from no less than twelve batteries, when one of their bombs, falling upon the magazine of the Devil's House, blew up above a thousand granadoes charged, ruined a great quantity of arms, and killed and wounded several persons. The trenches were carried on with great success, though the enemy endeavoured in the night time, both with their great and small shot, to disturb the workmen. But their batteries were soon silenced by those of the English, which, it is confessed on all hands, made such firing, as was never seen since gunpowder was first invented. The cannon and mortars answered one another in time, and formed a dreadful harmony; and showers of red-hot bullets and bombs, that poured continually on the castle, so terrified the enemy, that none of them durst look out of their shelters underground, but such as were obliged to be upon duty. Boufflers himself, being unused to this way of fighting, began to wish himself in the open field, and formed a design to break through the Confederates camp with his cavalry; but the King, having notice of it, ordered strong guards to be placed at all places, where the Sambre could be passed; and, the same being done all along the Masse by General Fleming, the Marshal must now share the fate of his garrison. However, on the 18th, towards midnight, they made a sally with two hundred dragoons mounted, and five hundred grenadiers. Of the latter one hundred and fifty made the attack on the right-hand, but were repulsed by the Count de Rivera, and the rest on the left, where Lord Cutts had just posted the advanced guard to secure the workmen. The dragoons fell upon Lieutenant-colonel Sutton, who, being posted in the plain of Salsines, with about forty fusiliers, let them come on till they were near him; then gave them a round volley, and retreated to his body; but, the dragoons pressing on him, he commanded his men to give them another volley. The French received it undauntedly, pressed on, and, if their grenadiers had charged at the same time, would doubtless have caused a great confusion in the trenches; but the Spanish and Bavarian horse, who were near, fell upon the enemy with so much vigour, that they drove them to the very palisadoes of the castle, killing some, and taking others prisoners.

After the bombardment of Brussels, Villeroy, being considerably reinforced with all the troops, that could be spared out of the garrisons, and the forces from the sea-coasts, marched directly towards Namur, with an army, as the French themselves gave out, of no less than ninety thousand men, and with which they confidently boasted to raise the siege of the castle. Upon the enemies advancing from Engbien to Soignes, Prince Vaudemont, in conjunction with the Earl of Athlone, and a reinforcement of ten battalions and eighteen squadrons, which the Prince of Hesse-Cassel had brought up from the Rhine, possessed himself on the 8th of August of the strong camp of Mazy, within five English miles of Namur. The French army being in the mean time come as far as Flerus, they gave the besieged a signal of their approach, by the discharge of ninety pieces of cannon, which was answered by a great light set on the highest part of the castle. This obliged the King to leave the care of the siege to the Elector of Bavaria and the Duke of Holstein Ploen, and to repair to the army on the 26th of August, with a resolution to oppose the French, who seemed now fully bent to attack him, being lately reinforced by a detachment from Germany, and other troops, under the command of the Marquis d'Harcourt. On the 29th of August, Villeroy advanced towards the Confederates, then still incamped near Mazy, but found them so well posted, that he thought fit to retire in the night without noise. The next day he moved along the Mebaigne, extending his right to Peruys and his left to the abbey of Bouffesse. Whereupon the King caused his army to move towards Osfin and Long Champ to observe them; and sent orders to the Marquis de la Forest, who commanded a body of reserve in the plain of Bouffesse, to return to the main army. The enemy perceiving, that the Confederates had made a halt on the hill behind Long Champ, sent several squadrons of the French King's household over the Mebaigne, in order to charge the Marquis de la Forest, between whom and the French there happened a small skirmish, a far as a defile, which being secured by the dragoons of Dopst, the enemy went no further, but repassed the Mebaigne in great haste. All these marches and countermarches of Villeroy, did not hinder the King from detaching the day before three thousand grenadiers from his army, to be employed in the general assault of the castle, which he had concerted with Prince Vaudemont, the Elector of Bavaria, and other general officers.

On the 30th of August, the day appointed for this memorable action, the besiegers began early to batter the breaches of Coeborn fort and Terra Nova, and continued till eleven of the clock, when the Elector sent Count Horn, accompanied by the Earl of Portland, to summon the besieged. The batteries having ceased firing, Count Horn called to the enemy, and told Count de Lamont, Commander of the French foot (who appeared on the next bastion, attended by the Marquis of Grammont and St Hermine), that the Marshal de Villeroy, after having been three days in sight of the Confederate army, had thought fit to retire towards the Mebaigne without fighting: That the garrison could not expect now to be relieved: And that his Electoral Highness, being willing to spare the lives of so many brave men on both sides, had charged him to offer honourable terms to Count Guiscard, if he would surrender; but that he gave him but a quarter of an hour to deliberate upon the proposals. Count Lamont took upon him to acquaint Count Guiscard and Marshal de Boufflers with Count Horn's message, and promised to bring back a speedy answer; but, not returning in half an hour, Count Horn grew impatient, and told the Marquis of Grammont, that he had already outstaid his time, and therefore desired him to send some person to the Governor for an immediate answer.

1695. fwer. A second messenger, upon this, was sent away; but he tarrying also above a quarter of an hour, and several officers of the garrisons being come to view the breach of Terra Nova, the Earl of Portland did not think it convenient to wait any longer. Thus the parley was broke, and the batteries plaid incessantly against the breaches till between one and two, when the general assault began in the following manner.

The signal being given, Lord Cutts (1), at the head of three hundred grenadiers, rushed out of the trenches of the second line, which were seven or eight hundred paces distant from the breach of Terra Nova, where he was commanded to lodge himself; and Colonel Marsilly marched on his right to possess himself of the line of communication next Coeborn fort. Count de Rivera, Major-general of the Bavarians, with three thousand men, marched out of the trenches of the first line in order to attack the breaches of Coeborn fort. Major-general la Cave advanced to attempt the same fort at the point; and Major-general Swerin marched against the Cafotte with two thousand Brandenburghers. The English grenadiers under Lord Cutts, hurried on by their native ardour, and animated by the example of their leader, and of Colonel Windsor, Colonel Stanhope, Mr Thompson, and several other English gentlemen, who exposed themselves as volunteers, ran faster towards the enemy, than they could be followed by the battalions of Coulthorp, Buchan, Hamilton, and Mackay, who moved from Salfines to support them. The grenadiers mounted the breach without opposition, the enemy not expecting to be attacked on that side by reason of the great distance of the trenches. But as soon as the French saw, that those bold adventurers were not sustained, they brought down two thousand of their best foot and dragoons into the space between the Coeborn and the Terra Nova, to fall on the English in flank and in rear; which obliged them to make a speedy retreat. The besieged made a shew of pursuing them, but by this time, three of the forementioned regiments being come up to their assistance, the French retired through the breach of Terra Nova, after having surpris'd and defeated the five hundred men under Colonel Marsilly. The Colonel himself being wounded was made prisoner, and soon after killed by a cannon-ball from the besiegers batteries, with the French officer, who had carried him into the castle. The English, having borne six several discharges, had several men killed and wounded; and among the latter was the Lord Cutts himself, who received a shot in his head, which disabled him for some time.

Whilst this passed on the side of Terra Nova, Count de Rivera with the Bavarians, instead of marching to the left of the platform, went a little too much to the right, towards the covered-way, which was well palissadoed, and thick set with musketeers, who made a terrible fire. Through this mistake, instead of storming the two small breaches of the angle of the platform, according to the scheme made for this attack, the Bavarians attempted to force the covered-way before the great breach; whereby they remained exposed for two hours to the enemies double fire, which killed them abundance of men, and amongst them Count Rivera himself, with most of the officers of the Bavarian guards.

The Lord Cutts, impatient to return to the engagement, could scarce stay to have his wounds dressed. He put himself again at the head of his brave countrymen; but finding the assault of the Terra Nova not possible to be retrieved, and observing that the Bavarians, notwithstanding the loss of their leader, had fixed themselves upon the outermost retrenchment of the point of the Coeborn next to the Sambre, and maintained that post with great obstinacy, but could not gain any more ground, he resolved to make good their attack. To effect this, he ordered, that a detachment of two hundred men should be made out of such, as were most forward to signalize themselves, whom he still encouraged by promises of rewards; that those should be sustained by the regiment of Mackay, and that the other English forces should rally and follow as soon as possible. Being come to the place of action, he detached a party of those two hundred chosen men, headed by Lieutenant Cockle of Mackay's regiment, whom he ordered to attack the face of the Saillant Angle, next to the breach, sword in hand, without firing a gun; to pass the palissadoes, and enter the covered-way; and there to make a lodgment, if they found any place capable of it. And at the same time he commanded the ensigns of Mackay's regiment to march strait to the palissadoes, and place their colours upon them. All this was so well executed, that Lieutenant Cockle, breaking through the palissadoes, beat the enemy from the covered-way, lodged himself in one of the batteries, and then turned their own cannon against them. On the other hand, whilst Mackay's ensigns advanced to the palissadoes, the Bavarians renewed their attack with undaunted vigour; and so this post was made good. The troops were already so fatigued by an assault, that had lasted several hours, that the besiegers contented themselves to have gained the covered-way, before the breach of the Coeborn, and the Saillant Angle towards the Sambre, and to make a lodgment there, without any further attempt upon the breach. However, this seasonable reinforcement, which the Lord Cutts brought to the Bavarians, had this further good effect, that it kept the enemy employed in the defence of this most important post; which very much facilitated Major-General La Cave's enterprize upon the covered-way before the ravelin, and upper part of the Coeborn, and so up towards the Cafotte, where he lodged himself without any considerable loss. On the other hand, Major-General Swerin, who commanded the right attack of all before the Cafotte, made up boldly towards the covered-way and retrenchment between the Cafotte and the Masse; drove the enemy from their posts; secured all the avenues; and made a very good lodgment all along this covered-way and retrenchment of about three hundred paces; which he extended to the left, turning in towards the Coeborn about a hundred and forty paces more, to join it to that of Major-General La Cave, that reached to the 1695. the ravelin of the Coeborn. Thus, although, for want of a due correspondence among the several attacks, either by the failure or mistake of the signals, the besiegers miscarried in their design of this general storm, which was to have taken the castle, with all its prodigious outworks, all at once; yet they were now masters of one of the greatest lodgments, that ever was made in one assault, being near an English mile in extent. Such a vast lodgment could not be done in a moment; neither could the assault, which lasted till evening, be maintained without considerable loss on both sides. The besiegers, by their own confession, had two thousand men killed or wounded, and among them many persons of note. Count de Rivera; the Colonels Coulbors, Marfily, and Lindroet; the Baron de Heckeren; Lieutenant-Colonel Fabricius, of du Theil's regiment; and Captain Mitchel of the English guards, were counted among the slain; and among the wounded were reckoned the Prince of Holstein Norburgh, and the Lord Cutts; the Prince of Hesse-Homburg; and nine Colonels, Eppinger, Zinzenburg, Cawuits, Count Horne, Count Dona, Luzelburg, Melun, Count de Denhoff, and Hamilton; several officers of the English guards, particularly the Colonels Windsor, Stanhope, Evans, Mr Thompson (to whom the King gave a company of guards for his bravery); besides a great many Lieutenant-Colonels, Majors, Captains, and Subaltern Officers of other regiments. The loss of the besieged in this action did not exceed six hundred men either killed or wounded. The Elector of Bavaria exposed himself to a degree not to be imagined, riding from place to place, and giving his orders, where the dispute was most obstinate, so that several persons were killed and wounded about him. Neither was his Electoral Highness contented to encourage the officers and soldiers by his own example, but he animated the first by extolling their valour, and the latter by the more powerful incentives of immediate rewards, distributing handfuls of gold amongst them. All the troops of the several nations behaved themselves with equal intrepidity; however, it is remarked, that the English were the most bold and pressing, the Bavarians the most firm, and the Brandenburghers the most successful. In acknowledgment of which service the King wrote to his own hand the following letter to the Elector of Brandenburgh, afterwards King of Prussia:

‘ You interest yourself so far in the public good, that you must needs receive a particular satisfaction in hearing of the surrender of the castle of Namur, especially considering, what share you had in that enterprize, which could not possibly have succeeded without the assistance of your troops, whom I cannot enough commend, nor can be less pleased with the admirable conduct of your Generals. They have gained to themselves the greatest glory and reputation by this action. And I assure you, it is impossible for any one to be more sensible of an obligation, than I am of that you have laid on me by assisting me in an undertaking of such consequence, which God has vouchsafed to bless, and which, I hope, will be a considerable advantage to all the Allies. And you may assure yourself I shall omit no occasion of giving you effectual proofs of my gratitude.’

The 31st of August was wholly spent by the besiegers in perfecting the lodgment, which they had made the day before, and in preparing all things for a second general assault; but the next day, the besieged having demanded a cessation of arms to bury their dead, which was readily granted, the Count de Guiscard came upon the breach a little before the truce was over, and desired to speak with the Elector of Bavaria. The Elector having mounted the breach, the Count offered to surrender the Coeborn fort; but the Elector answering, that, if he would capitulate, it must be for the whole, Count Guiscard replied, that the Marshal de Boufflers commanded in the castle, and that he would let him know; and desired, that in the mean while the cessation of arms might be continued; to which the Elector having agreed, Boufflers consented to treat for the whole, and an adjutant was immediately dispatched, to give the King an account of it at Osfin. The Adjutant met the King with Prince Vaudemont, coming to the siege in his coach, to give directions concerning a further attack. Upon his arrival hostages were exchanged, and propositions brought from the castle, the chief of which was, that they might have ten days to expect succours. This being denied, the French, after some debates among themselves, were contented to receive such terms, as the Elector, with the King's consent, would grant them, being such as are usual upon the surrender of a strong fortress, whose garrison had made a gallant defence. The capitulation was agreed on that very night, and signed the next morning; and part of the outworks were given up presently after to the Allies, the besieged having three days more allowed them to evacuate the castle. It is remarkable, that Guiscard obliged Boufflers to sign the articles, because he had commanded in the castle during the siege: Whereas the Count had only commanded in the Coeborn and the outworks; and that this perhaps was the first capitulation, that was ever signed by a Marshal of France; which was so much more to the honour of the Confederate arms, that they took this almost impregnable place in sight of another Marshal of France, who was advanced to relieve it with an hundred thousand men, but was only a spectator of the bravery of the former, and of the consummate prudence of the King of Great-Britain, under whose conduct and direction all was happily achieved; it being universally acknowledged, that no siege was ever carried on with more regularity.

The 1st of September, the two armies observed one another; but the next day Villeroy being informed of the surrender of the castle of Namur, by a triple discharge of all the artillery, and three salvo's in a running fire along the lines of the Confederate army, he retired from his camp at Gembours, and passed the Sambre near Charleroy with great precipitation. Upon advice of this motion the King ordered several brigades towards Salsines, and a bridge to be laid over the Sambre, to oppose the enemy, in case they should make any attempt between the Sambre and the Maese, whilst the French garrison was still in possession of the Terra Nova. But it appeared that Villeroy had quite laid aside all thoughts of fighting; for, having sent two thousand men to reinforce the garrison of Dinant, he marched with the rest of his army towards the lines near Mons. On 1695. On the 5th of September, the day prefixed for the French to evacuate the castle, the horse and foot, that were incamped between the Sambre and the Maeſe, were commanded to make a lane on both sides from the breach of Terra Nova, thro' which the garrison was to march out up the hill, and so down again to the Maeſe, to the way that leads to Givet, whither it was agreed they should be safely conducted. About ten of the clock in the morning the garrison, which from fourteen thousand was reduced to five thousand five hundred and thirty-eight men, began their march. Marshal Boufflers's Guard de corps went out first; then his domestics, and next himself, with Count de Guisard, the Governor, at the head of the King's and Alsied's dragoons, as many as were mounted, between eighty and ninety in all. The King was incognito in a coach, and the Elector of Bavaria, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the chief officers of the army on horseback to see them pass within two hundred paces of the breach, and were saluted by the French Marshal and Count with their swords. This civility was scarce over, when Monsieur Dyckvelt, accosted Boufflers with a message, which somewhat discomposed his countenance; and, as they were riding up to the top of the hill, Monsieur de L'Etoing, Brigadier of the life-guards, made up to the Marshal, with about twelve of the Gentleman of that corps, and arrested him in his Britannic Majesty's name, by way of reprisal for the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, which, as has been said, were detained and ill treated by the French, contrary to the cartel. The Marshal seemed at first very much incensed, alledging, in a broken speech, 'That the laws and customs of war were violated, and particularly the capitulation lately signed by the Duke of Bavaria, wherein he was expressly mentioned: That the King of France, his Master, would resent this treatment of a man of his character, and revenge it to the utmost of his power: And that, for his own part, he had defended the place like a man of honour, and did not deserve it.' To this Monsieur Dyckvelt replied, 'That the French King, his Master, by detaining the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, contrary to their capitulation (by which they were made prisoners of war, and consequently should have been discharged within the limited time, paying their ransom, which was offered) had forced his Britannic Majesty to that way of demanding satisfaction for that infraction: That the Marshal's being arrested was not out of any disrespect to his person, but rather the contrary; for, when it was proposed to the King of Great-Britain to detain the whole garrison by way of reprisal, his Majesty had expressed so much value of his person, that he looked upon him as a sufficient caution to answer for six thousand men, the number of the two garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe; but at the same time he had his Majesty's order to offer him his liberty, if he would pass his word for sending back the said garrisons, or to return himself a prisoner within a fortnight.' To which Boufflers answered, 'That he could not pass his word of honour in a matter, which he could not execute himself: That, if he were at the head of fifty thousand men, he would not suffer himself to be arrested; but now he must submit.' Having said this, he put up his sword, and went back with his domestics to Namur, where the Earl of Portland gave him a visit, and told him as from himself, 'That he made no doubt of his release upon his parole of honour.' But the Marshal answered, 'That, in regard he knew not the reasons why his Master detained those garrisons, he could not engage for any thing.' From Namur he was conducted to Masfricht, and treated in both places with all the civility and respect due to his quality. His confinement was not long; for upon the return of the Captain of his guard, whom he sent to give the French King an account of what had happened, and the Marshal's engaging his word, that the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe should be sent back, as soon as he himself should be set at liberty, the King ordered the Governor of Masfricht to release him, and give him a guard to conduct him safe to Dinant. 1695.

The taking of Namur was reckoned one of the greatest actions of the King's life, and indeed, one of the greatest that is in the whole History of war. It raised his character much, both at home and abroad, and gave a great reputation to his troops; The King had the intire credit of the matter; his general officers having a very small share in it, being most of them men of low genius, and little practised in things of that nature. Coeborn, the chief engineer, signalized himself so eminently on this occasion, that he was looked on as the greatest man of the age; and out-did even Vauban, who had gone far beyond all those, that went before him, in the conduct of sieges: But it was confessed by all, that Coeborn had carried that art to a much farther perfection during this siege. The subaltern officers and soldiers gave hopes of a better race, that was growing up, and supplied the errors and defects of their superior officers.

The officers were tried and proceeded against by councils of war, according to martial law; they were raised in the army by ill methods, and maintained themselves by worse; corruption had broke into the army, and oppression and injustice were much complained of; the King did not approve of those practices; but he did not inquire after them, nor punish them, with a due severity; nor did he make difference enough between those who served well, sold nothing, and used their subalterns kindly, and those who set every thing to sale, and oppressed all that were under them; and, when things of that kind go unpunished, they will soon make a great progress.

The news of the surrender of the castle of Namur no sooner reached England, but it filled the hearts of all the well-affected to the government with great joy; and the King's expressing his just resentment for the affront put upon him, by the detaining the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, was highly applauded. The Lords Justices having appointed a day of public thanksgiving for the success of his Majesty's arms, the same was religiously observed in London, and throughout all England. But, amidst these rejoicings, the disaffected remained, as it were, thunderstruck; and indeed their disappointment was very great; for not only their hopes of seeing the Confederates attempt upon Namur baffled were defeated, but many of them were 1695. were ruined by the loss of considerable wagers, which they had laid upon it. Among these wagers was the famous Dr Davenant.

The King, having left the command of the army to the Elector of Bavaria, went to Dieren, and from thence to Loo, his usual recess for diversion and business; whilst both armies continued in the field till the 25th of September, and then began to separate. The French King's Household returned into their quarters, and most of the rest of his troops retired within the lines. As for the Allies, their forces were distributed into several neighbouring garrisons, except some detachments, which marched towards Newport, under the command of the Prince of Wirtemberg, for the security of that place. And thus ended the campaign in Flanders.

Nothing was done on the Rhine. Nor was there any action upon the Rhine, where both armies were so equal in strength, that they could only lie on the defensive; neither side being strong enough to undertake any thing. M. de l'Orge commanded the French, and the Prince of Baden the Imperialists. L'Orge was sinking as much in his health as in his credit; so a great body, as has been said, was ordered to march from him to Villeroy, whilst another equal to that, commanded by the Landgrave of Hesse, came and joined the King's army before Namur.

In Italy, there was nothing done in the field by force of arms: But an affair of great consequence was transacted, in a very mysterious manner; the Duke of Savoy, after a very long blockade, undertook the siege of Casal; but he was so ill provided for it, that no good account of it could be expected; the King had so little hopes of success, that he was not easily prevailed on to consent to the besieging it, but either the French intended to gain the Pope and the Venetians, and, in conclusion, that Duke himself, with this extraordinary concession; or, since our fleet was then before Thoulon, they judged it more necessary to keep their troops, for the defence of their coast and fleet, than to send them to relieve Casal; so orders were sent to the Governor to capitulate, in such a number of days, after the trenches were opened: So that the place was surrendered, tho' it was not at all straitened: It was agreed, that it should be restored to the Duke of Mantua, but so dismantled, that it might give jealousy to no side; and the slighting the fortifications went on so slowly, that the whole season was spent in it, a truce being granted all that while. Thus did the French give up Casal, after they had been at a vast expence in fortifying it, and had made it one of the strongest places in Europe.

Affairs at sea and in Catalonia. The English fleet was all the summer master of the Mediterranean. The French were put under great disorder, and seemed to fear a descent; for Ruffel came before Marseilles and Thoulon oftner than once, and contrary winds forced him out again, but with no loss. Tho' it was his opinion, that nothing could be done there, yet the honour of commanding the sea, and of shutting the French within their ports, gave a great reputation to our affairs.

In Catalonia, the French made no progress, they abandoned Palamos, and made Gironne their frontier. The Spaniards once pretended to besiege Palamos, but they only pretended to do it; they desired some men from Ruffel, for he had regiments of marines on board: They 1695. said they had begun the siege, and were provided with every thing that was necessary to carry it on, only they wanted men; so he sent them some battalions; but, when they came thither, they found not any one thing, that was necessary to carry on a siege, not so much as spades, not to mention guns and ammunition: So Ruffel sent for his men again. But the French of themselves quitted the place; for as they found the charge of the war in Catalonia was great, and though they met with a feeble opposition from the Spaniards, yet since they saw, they could not carry Barcelona, so long as our fleet lay in those seas, they resolved to lay by, in expectation of a better occasion. We had another fleet in our own channel, that was ordered to bombard the French coast; They did some execution upon St Malo's, and destroyed Grandville, that lay not far from it: They also attempted Dunkirk, but failed in the execution; some bombs were thrown into Calais, but without any great effect; so that the French did not suffer so much by the bombardment, as was expected: The country indeed was much alarmed by it; they had many troops dispersed all along their coast; so that it put their affairs in great disorder, and we were every where masters at sea. Another Squadron, commanded by the Marquis of Caermarthen (whose father was created Duke of Leeds, to colour the dismissing him from business, with an increase of title) lay off from the isles of Scilly, to secure our trade, and convoy our merchants: He was an extravagant man, both in his pleasures and humours; he was slow in going to sea; and, when he was out, he fancied the French fleet was coming up to him, which proved to be only a fleet of merchant-ships: So he left his station, and retired into Milford Haven: By which means, that squadron became useless.

This proved fatal to our trade, many of our Barbadoes ships were taken by French cruizers and Privateers: Two rich ships, coming from the East-Indies, were also taken, an hundred and fifty leagues to the Westward, by a very fatal accident, or by some treacherous advertisement; for cruizers seldom go so far into the ocean: And, to compleat the misfortunes of the East-India Company, three other ships, that were come near Galway, on the West of Ireland, fell into the hands of some French privateers: Those five ships were valued at a million, so here was great occasion of discontent in the City of London. They complained, that neither the Admiralty, nor the Government, took the care that was necessary for preserving the wealth of the nation. A French man of war, at the same time, fell upon our factory on the coast of Guinea; he took the small fort we had there, and destroyed it; these misfortunes were very sensible to the nation, and did much abate the joy, which so glorious a campaign would otherwise have raised; and much matter was laid in for ill humour to work upon.

The King, having settled with the States-General the state of the war for the next year, embarked in the Masé, aboard the William and Mary yacht, and the next day safely landed at Margate, being attended in his passage by a Squadron of English and Dutch men of war, commanded by Sir Cloudesly Shovel. That night the King lay at Canterbury, and next day came through London and Westminster to Kensington; the called.

A new Parliament
Burnet.

The King was no sooner arrived at Kensington, but he called a Council, wherein it was debated, whether a new Parliament should be summoned, or the old one be brought together again, which by the law, that was lately passed, might sit till Lady-Day. It was urged, that the happy state, which the nation was in, had put all men, except the Merchants, in a good temper. None could be sure, that affairs should be in so good a state the next year; so that now probably elections would fall on men, who were well-affected to the Government. A Parliament, which saw itself in its last Session, might affect to be froward, since the Members, by such a behaviour, might hope to recommend themselves to the next election. Besides, if the same Parliament should be continued, probably the enquiries into corruption would be carried on, which might divert them from more pressing affairs, and kindle greater heats; all which might be more decently dropped by a new Parliament, than suffered to lie asleep by the old one. These considerations prevailed, though it was still believed, that the King's own inclinations led him to have continued the Parliament one Session longer; for he reckoned, that he was sure of the majority. Thus this Parliament was brought to a conclusion, and a new one was summoned by Proclamation to meet at Westminster, the 22d of November.

The late success of the King's arms inclined many persons to chuse Members well affected to him. The Jacobites were so decried, that few of them were elected; but many of the former sort of Whigs, who were much alienated from the King, were chosen. These were generally men of estates, but many of them young, hot, and without experience.

The King's progress to the North.
Burnet.
Kennet.

During the elections for the new Parliament, the King made a progress to the North, in the course of which he studied to constrain himself to a little more openness and affability, than was natural to him: But his cold and dry way had too deep a root, not to return too frequently upon him. He began his progress with the diversions at Newmarket, and where he received the compliments of the University of Cambridge; and, having staid there three days, on the 21st of October went to Aliborp, in Norhamptonshire, a seat of the Earl of Sunderland, which was the first public mark of the high favour, that Earl was in. Whilst there, he made a visit to the

Earl of Norhampton at Castle-Aliboy, and to the Earl of Montague at Boughton, and was splendidly entertained at both places. From Aliborp he went to Stamford, and in his way took a view of Burgbley-house without seeing the owner; and proceeded to Lincoln, attended by several of the nobility and a great train of gentlemen, who resorted from all the neighbouring parts to see him; and having heard prayers at the Cathedral, he pursued his journey to Welbeck, the Duke of Newcastle's seat in Nottinghamshire. Here Dr Sharp, Archbishop of York, with his Clergy waited upon him the 2d of November, and congratulated his happy success and safe return; expressed their gratitude for his care of the Church, who had shewn himself truly the Defender of the Faith; assured him of their fidelity and loyalty; prayed for all blessings to attend him; and recommended themselves to his protection, which his Majesty assured them of, and of all other demonstrations of grace and favour. The next day the King left Welbeck, and came that evening to the Earl of Stamford's at Broadgate. On the 4th of November, he went to the Lord Brooke's, at Warwick Castle; from whence he departed the next day, and dined, with the Duke of Shrewsbury at Evesfort, arrived in the evening at Burford, and three days after came to Woodstock (1). From this place he went on the 9th of November to Oxford, and was met at some distance from thence by the Duke of Ormond, Chancellor of that University, the Vice-chancellor, and the Doctors in their habits, as also by the Magistrates of the City in their formalities; and, the compliments of both being made to him, they proceeded to the East gate of the schools, the conduit of the City running all the while with wine. The King alighting passed directly to the theatre, where Mr Charles Codrington, Fellow of All-Souls College, and afterwards Governor of the Leeward Islands, supplied the place of the University orator, who happened to be indisposed, and expressed the public thanks of the University in an elegant speech (2). The Chancellor on his knees made the usual presents, of a large English Bible and Common-Prayer-book, the cuts of the University, and a pair of gold fringe gloves. And because it was expected, that the King would do the University the honour of dining amongst them, a magnificent banquet was prepared, with great variety of music. But, the Duke of Ormond having communicated to him, a letter addressed to his Grace by a nameless person, and dropped in the street the day

(1) The King lay at Mr Cary's, an old Gentleman of near a hundred years of age, who had been servant to James I., Charles I., Oliver Cromwell, Charles II., James II., and was then servant to King William, of whom the following story is told. 'The King being informed of a humour of his in shewing his pictures, desired to see them, and pretending not to know whom they were drawn for, asked, of the first in order, who that was? That, replied Cary, 'was my good old Master King James I., I served him several years. Who is the next? says his Majesty. That, Sir, replied Cary, is my good Master King Charles I., he was a good Master to me, let them say what they will of him. Pray who is the next? the King said. Why truly Sir, replied Cary, That is my Master Oliver Cromwell, he too was my very good

Master; and so was the next there, King Charles II.; and the next, King James II.; and so now is your Majesty, whose picture there is still room for.' Whether the King gave him his picture does not appear, but he was pleased at the old Gentleman's simplicity in his way of setting out his pictures, which it seems had been all given him.

He was also Captain of a Company of Guards, and behaved very gallantly at the siege of Namur. He was a man of learning and wit, as well as bravery; the fame to whom Cresch dedicated his Latin edition of Lucretius with notes, and who left a fine library, and ten thousand pounds in money to his college.

(1) The

1695. day before, wherein information was given of a pretended design to poison him at this entertainment, the King resolved neither to eat nor drink, and immediately took coach for Windsor, declaring, as a reason of his short stay, and his not going to see the Colleges, 'That this was a visit of kindness, not of curiosity, he having seen the University before.' However this abrupt departure of the King might be resented by the University, they chose for one of their Representatives Sir William Trumbal, Secretary of State.

The Parliament being met the 22d of November, and the Commons having chosen Mr Foley again for their Speaker, the King made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'IT is with great satisfaction, that I meet you here this day, being assured of a good disposition in my Parliament, when I have had such full proofs of the affection of my people, by their behaviour during my absence, and at my return. I was engaged in this present war by the advice of my first Parliament, who thought it necessary for the defence of our religion, and the preservation of the liberties of Europe. The last Parliament with great cheerfulness did assist me to carry it on; and I cannot doubt, but that your concern for the common safety will oblige you to be unanimously zealous in the prosecution of it. And I am glad, that the advantages, which we have had this year, give us a reasonable ground of hoping for further success hereafter.

'Upon this occasion I cannot but take notice of the courage and bravery, which the English troops have shewn this last summer, which, I may say, has answered their highest character in any age. And it will not be denied, that, without the concurrence of the valour and power of England, it were impossible to put a stop to the ambition and greatness of France.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

'I think it a great misfortune, that, from the beginning of my reign, I have been forced to ask so many and such large aids of my people; and yet I am confident you will agree with me in opinion, that there will be at least as great supplies requisite for carrying on the war by sea and land this year, as was granted in the last Session; the rather, because our enemies are augmenting their troops, and the necessity of increasing our shipping does plainly appear.

'The funds, which have been given, have proved very deficient.

'The condition of the Civil List is such, that it will not be possible for me to subsist, unless that matter be taken into your care.

'And compassion obliges me to mention the miserable circumstances of the French Protestants, who suffer for their religion.

'And therefore, Gentlemen, I most earnestly recommend to you to provide a supply suitable to these several occasions.

'I must likewise take notice of a great difficulty we lie under at this time, by reason of the ill state of the coin, the redress of which may perhaps prove a further charge to the nation. But this is a matter of such general concern, and of so very great importance, that I have thought fit to leave it entirely to the consideration of my Parliament. I did recommend to the last Parliament the forming some good bill for the encouragement and increase of seamen. I hope you will not let this Session pass without doing somewhat in it; and that you will consider of such laws, as may be proper for the advancement of trade, and will have a particular regard to that of the East-Indies, lest it should be lost to the nation. And, while the war makes it necessary to have an army abroad, I could wish some way might be thought of to raise the necessary recruits, without giving occasion of complaint.

'My desire to meet my people in a new Parliament has made the opening of this Session very late; which I hope you will have such regard to, as to make all possible dispatch of the great business before you, and will call to mind, that, by the long continuance of the last session, we did not only lose advantages, which we might have had at the beginning of the campaign, but gave the enemy such an opportunity, as might have proved very fatal to us. And I am the more concerned to press this, because of the great preparations, which the French make to be early in the field this year.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I have had such experience of your good affections, and I have such an entire satisfaction in the choice, which my people have made of you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, that I promise myself a happy conclusion of this Session unless you suffer yourselves to be misled into heats and divisions, which being the only hope our enemies have now left, I make no doubt but you will entirely disappoint by your prudence and love to your country.'

Both Houses in their respective addresses, Addresses of both Houses. with great zeal and unanimity, congratulated the glorious success of his Majesty's arms abroad and his safe return home; and likewise returned thanks for the trust and confidence, which he reposed in their affections; assuring him, that they would support him against all his enemies foreign and domestic, and effectually assist him in the prosecution of the present war, in which he was engaged for the safety of England and liberty of Europe (1).

Before the proceedings of the Parliament are State of related, State of affairs at the meet-

(1) The Duchess of Marborough, in the account of her Conduct, (p. 113.) relates a particular, which shews that the reconciliation between the King and the Princess of Denmark was not real. The Princess, whilst the King was congratulated upon his taking Namur, sent him the following letter on that occasion.

'S I R,
'Though I have been unwilling to give you the trouble of a letter upon any other occasion, yet, upon one so glorious to your Majesty as the taking of Namur, I hope you will give me leave to congratulate your good success, which don't please me so much

1695. related, it will not be improper to take a view of the difficulties that lay in their way. In defence of the new settlement the nation was involved in a very burdensome war, with a formidable Monarch, who, having espoused the quarrel of the late abdicated King James, was using his utmost endeavours to re-inthronize him. But, besides this open enemy, there was a great deal to fear from the discontented at home. For, tho' the body of the nation was infinitely pleased with the late Revolution, yet a considerable number, partly out of principle, partly out of interest, were impatient of their deliverance, which, in their opinion, was accomplished by unjustifiable means. Not only the Roman Catholics, but a great number of Protestants, and such as were the creatures and dependents of the late Government, were become enemies of the present settlement; and, by open as well as clandestine ways, endeavoured to distress or subvert it. And all methods, which wit and malice could suggest, were employed to weaken the reputation of the Government, and to increase the fears of the people. The public Ministers were traduced and exposed to contempt. The losses, which befel the nation, were attributed to treachery or negligence, and highly aggravated; while, on the other hand, the advantages, which the King at any time obtained, were extenuated and slighted. The Parliament, resolving to carry on the war with vigour, were obliged to lay great taxes on the people; and, the war continuing so long, they could not be insensible of the burden. Of this the discontented took the advantage, and represented in all companies, that the Government must of necessity sink under its own weight; and these heavy taxes, by reducing the nation to extreme poverty, would inevitably prove its destruction. They never ceased declaiming on this popular subject, in hopes to make the people weary of a Government, which was represented so burdensome; and at last persuade them rather to let in the deluge, than to be at the expence of maintaining their banks.

Besides the professed adherents to King James's interest, there were others, who, though great assertors of the late Revolution, and averse enough to a second, yet, from some private disquiets, personal quarrels, and disappointments, grew sour and uneasy; and in order to gratify their resentments, endeavoured to bring the Administration into contempt. They were for breaking the Confederacy, and against raising such large sums of money for carrying on the war. They were for distressing the Government, but not for overturning it. In short, they were against all things, which the known enemies of the present settlement were against, and for all things, which they were for, except the restoration of the late King; that is, they were for all means, that could certainly bring about the end, but not for the end itself. However, under this plausible pretence of declaring against great taxes, and other popular oppositions, they thought to recommend themselves to their country as great patriots; supposing, that the character of a patriot was, without distinction of times or persons, to be ever against the Court; though they could not but be sensible, that the preservation of their religion, laws, and liberties, was inseparably interwoven with that of the present settlement; that the face of affairs was so far altered by the Revolution, that the interest of their Country was plainly the same with that of the Court; which appeared as well by the opposition, that was made to it by all those, whom these men themselves ever looked upon as the greatest promoters of popery and arbitrary power, as by the principles of liberty, by which the Government was first set up, and without which it could not stand.

The French after taking of Namur (a blow, which wounded them in so sensible a part) grew very dissident of the issue of the war. They expressed by their behaviour and language, how much their hopes of subduing England by open force were abated; and they could not but foresee, that, if King William could appear in the field the next summer in the same circumstances, as he did the last, it would be very hard, if not impossible, for them to oppose his arms. To prevent this they had two things to wish and promote; one was to embroil the nation's affairs by creating mutinies at home, the other to ruin its credit, and thereby disable the King from carrying on the war abroad. The first they hoped would be effected by the ill state of the coin; for to attempt its cure, they judged, would alike produce such intestine disorders, as would prove the ruin of the nation. For this reason they engaged their friends in England to exert themselves with the utmost diligence, to aggravate the inconveniences of not recoining the silver money, if that should be neglected; or to embarrass, as much as they were able, the methods of recoining it, in case that should be agreed on, and thereby make it grievous and insupportable. And in case this great business should, contrary to all probability, be accomplished without the confusion, that was expected to follow, they were instructed to leave no arts untried, whereby they might destroy the public credit, and particularly that of the Bank of England, which was then the great support of the nation, and was by experience found to be so the following summer, when it contributed so much to the support of the army. If either of these designs, and much more if both succeeded, they were well satisfied it would be impossible for the King to appear in Flanders the next spring in that formidable manner he did the year before. Add to all this, that at this time, though it was plain by the event, that the nation had treasure enough to support the war, yet the ways of coming at it were grown very difficult. The former Parliaments chose rather to establish funds for public supplies, than to use any methods of raising them within the year; divers branches of the King's ‘ much upon any other account, as for the satisfaction, that I am sensible your Majesty must needs feel ‘ in this great addition to the reputation of your arms.

‘ And I beg leave, Sir, to assure you, that, as no ‘ body is more nearly concerned in your interests,

‘ so no body wishes more heartily for your happiness
‘ and prosperity at home than

Your, &c.

ANNE.

To this handsome compliment the King returned no answer.

1695. King's revenue were by his own consent subjected to great anticipations, and the most easy and obvious funds were already settled, and sufficiently loaded; so that by the continuance of the war it became much harder for this than for the preceding Parliaments, to find out ways to defray the charges of it. Such was the posture of affairs, when this Parliament met.

An act concerning trials for treason.
Burnet.
Fr. H. C.
III. 3.

Four days after the meeting of the Parliament the bill for regulating trials in cases of High-treason, which had been so long pursued, was brought into the House of Commons, and at last carried by the Tories. The design of it seemed to be to make men as safe in all treasonable conspiracies and practices as was possible; it being enacted, 'that all persons, indicted for high-treason, or misprison of such treason, shall have a copy of the whole indictment, but not the names of the witnesses, five days at least before they shall be tried; and shall be admitted to make their defence by Counsel learned in the law, not exceeding two. That no person shall be indicted or attainted of treason, or misprison of treason, but by the oaths and testimony of two lawful witnesses, either both to the same overt-act, or one to one, and the other to another overt-act of the same treason, unless the party in open court confess the same, or stand mute, or refuse to plead, or peremptorily challenge above thirty-five of the Jury. That where two or more distinct treasons of divers kinds shall be alleged in one bill of indictment, one witness to one, and another witness to another, shall not be deemed two witnesses. That no person shall be prosecuted for any such crime, unless the indictment be found within three years after the offence committed; provided and excepted, that any person designing or attempting to assassinate or poison the King may be prosecuted at any time, notwithstanding the said limitation. That all persons, indicted of such treason, or misprison of treason, shall have copies of the panel of the Jurors, two days at least before their trial, and shall have like process to compel their witnesses to appear for them, as is usually granted to witnesses against them. That no evidence shall be admitted of any overt-act, that is not expressly laid in the indictment. And that this act shall not extend to any impeachment or other proceedings in Parliament; nor to any indictment for counterfeiting his Majesty's coin, his Great Seal, Privy Seal, Sign Manual or Signet.'

All these things were in themselves just and reasonable; and, if they had been moved by other men, and at another time, they would have met with little opposition. This act happened to pass but a few days before the discovery of the assassination-plot, and the benefit of it was claimed and enjoyed by some of the conspirators. It was observed, that those Members of both Houses, who chiefly promoted it, had been concerned in the illegal prosecutions for treason in the late reigns. When the bill was sent up to the Lords, the clause so often insisted on was again added, that to the trial of a Peer all the Peers should be summoned, which was not easily carried; for those, who wished well to the bill, looked on this as a device to have it dropped by the Commons, as no doubt it was, and therefore they opposed the clause; but, contrary to the hopes of the Court, the Commons were so desirous of the bill, that, when it came down to them, they agreed to the clause, on account of which the same bill had been so often rejected, and the act received the Royal assent (1).

The many protections given to the servants of Parliament-men, and the taking men into custody upon complaints of the breach of those protections, was really become a grievance to the subject; and therefore it was ordered, That all protections and written certificates of the Members of this House be declared void in law, and be forthwith withdrawn and called in, and that none be granted for the future; and that if any should be granted by any Member, such Member shall be liable to the censure of this House; and that the privileges of their menial servants be observed according to law; and that, if any menial servant shall be arrested and detained contrary to privilege, he shall, upon complaint thereof, made to the Speaker, be discharged by order from him: And that no person shall be taken into custody upon complaint of any breach of privileges of this House, before the matter be first examined; which order was not to extend to any breach of privilege upon the person of any Member of this House.

The next thing to be considered was the supply for the year 1696. The demand was still very high, and there was a great arrear of deficiencies; however all was readily granted, amounting to five millions, twenty-four thousand eight hundred fifty-three pound (2), and lodged on funds that seemed to be very probable.

Pur-

(1) It is remarkable, that, while this bill was depending in the Lower-House, the Lord Ashley, afterwards Earl of Shaftsbury, and author of the Characteristicks, who was then a Member of that House, and very zealous for the bill, and particularly that part of it, which allows Counsel to a prisoner, had prepared a speech in its behalf, which those, to whom he shewed it, thought a very proper one on the occasion. But, when he stood up to speak it in the House of Commons, the great audience so intimidated him, that he lost all memory, and was unable to proceed. The House, after giving him a little time to recover his confusion, called loudly upon him to go on, when he proceeded to this effect: 'If I, Sir (addressing himself to the Speaker) who rise only to give my opinion on the bill now depending, am so confounded, that I am unable to express the least of what I proposed to say; what must the condition of that man be, who without any assistance is pleading for his life, and under apprehensions of being deprived of it?' This sudden turn of wit (which by some was imagined to be premeditated, though it really was not) is said to be of service in promoting the bill. Gen. Dict. Hist. and Crit. Vol. IX. p. 179.

1695. Pursuant to that part of the King's speech relating to the civil list, and to the distressed condition of the French Protestants, the Commons also settled a fund for raising 500,000 l. for the civil list, and 15000 l. a year for the French Protestants (1).

The ill state of the coin was the greatest difficulty the nation now laboured under, a mischief which the last Parliament had attempted to cure, but which, through the application of too gentle remedies, was become almost desperate. The disaffected observed it with joy, and had their eyes and hopes long fixed on the effects this might produce. The Jacobites proposed to themselves great matters from the destruction of credit and trade, which they doubted not would soon be the consequence of this grievance; which though the friends to the Government were fully convinced ought to be redressed; yet how to effect it, in such a conjuncture, without bringing the nation into the utmost confusion, was a very difficult task.

Pursuant to the clause in the King's speech, the Commons took the affair of the coin into consideration, and there were great and long debates about the proper remedies. The first question was, Whether it was necessary or expedient to recoin the silver money? The recoin- ing was warmly opposed by the party, who hoped to embroil the matters. 'They alledged, 'this was no fit conjuncture for it, whilst the nation was engaged in a burdensome and doubtful war, by which the Kingdom had already greatly suffered, and of which it grew every day more sensible. That therefore the people, on whose good affection the Govern- ment so much depended, should not be provoked by fresh grievances greater than any they had yet felt, as those would certainly be, that must arise from the calling in the silver coin. That, if this was done, however things might be managed and accommodated at home, it were impossible to maintain either the com- merce or the war abroad; for neither the merchant could be paid his bills of exchange, nor the foldier receive his subsistence. That this was to lay the ax to the root, and to dig up the foundations of the Government. That, if this design was prosecuted, trade must 'stand still for want of mutual payments; whence such disorder and confusion would certainly follow, as would discourage and dis- hearten the people in the highest measure, if not drive them to a perfect despair, as despair would to the most terrible extremities. That therefore the recoining the money at this time was by no means to be attempted without hazarding all.'

It was alledged by those of the contrary opi- nion, at the head of whom appeared Mr Charles for it.

Montague, Chancellor of the Exchequer, 'That the mischief would be fatal, if a present re- medy was not found out and applied. That, by reason of the ill state of the coin, the change abroad was infinitely to the nation's prejudice. That the supplies, that were raised to maintain the army, would never at- tain their end, being so much diminished and devoured by the unequal change and exorbi- tant premium, before they reached the camp. That this was the unhappy cause, that the guineas advanced to thirty shillings, and so- reign gold in proportion. That therefore to the nation's great loss, not only the Dutch, but indeed all Europe, sent that commodity to this market, and would continue to do so, till the nation should be impoverished and un- done by plenty of gold. That we must ex- change for their gold our goods or silver, till at last we should have only guineas to trade withal, which no body could think our neigh- bours would be so kind to receive back at the value they were at here. That therefore this disease would every day take deeper root, infect the very vitals of the nation, and, if not remedied, would soon become incurable. That our enemies must be extremely intimidated by so great an action, and would sooner be induced to agree to honourable terms of peace, in case they saw us able surmount this diffi- culty by retrieving the ill state of the coin, on which their hopes of the nation's speedy ruin so much depended. And that it would just- ly create a mighty esteem abroad of the great- ness and wisdom of the Parliament of Eng- land, which was able to conquer such an ob- stinate and almost insuperable evil in such a juncture of affairs (2).'

(1) The funds for raising the supplies and civil list were,

1. A land-tax of 4 s. in the pound.
2. Duties continued upon wine and vinegar, tobacco, East-India goods, and other merchandizes, from 1698 to 1701.
3. Additional duty upon all French goods, wines 25 l. a tun, brandy 30 l. a tun, vinegar 15 s. a tun, all other French goods 25 l. per cent. ad valorem, for the term of twenty-one years.
4. Duties upon low-wines, or spirits of the first ex- traction.
5. Duties continued upon salt, glass-wares, tobacco-pipes, &c.

(2) The sad state of the money appears from the printed report concerning, An essay for the amendment of the silver coins, London 1695. The author first computes all the silver money coined in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I. and Charles I.

The silver sterling monies coin- ed in the reign of Eliz. exclu- five of some base 17th monies, amounted to

Then he considers, how far this sum is to be abated. First, all Queen Elizabeth's crowns, half-crowns, groats, quarter-shillings, half-groats, three-half-penny pieces, three-farthing pieces, and half-pence are wholly sunk.

Secondly, great numbers of her shillings and six-pences are melted down or lost.

Thirdly, the crowns, groats, two-pences, pence, and half-pence of James I. and Charles I. are quite gone; with many of their half-crowns, shillings, and six-pences. So that he reckons, there was not left above

This matter being fully debated, the Parliament resolved to call in and recoin the silver money, chusing to run the hazard of some great inconveniencies, by attempting the cure of the disease, than by their longer neglect of it to expose the Kingdom to apparent ruin.

The next step was to consider, 'Whether the several denominations of the new money should have the same weight and fineness with the old; or, Whether the established standard should be raised?' This question produced many debates. Those, who were for raising the standard, alledged, 'That the price of an ounce of silver bullion was advanced to six shillings and three-pence; and therefore the standard ought to be raised to an equality. That the raising of the standard would prevent the exportation of the coin, which of late had been much practised, to the great prejudice of this Kingdom. That it would prevent its being melted down; and that thereby people would be much encouraged to bring in their plate and bullion into the Mint.'

The other party, who were for preserving the old standard, urged, That the worth of money was relative, and to be rated by the measure of such goods, labour, advice, skill, or other assistances, as could be purchased from another by our parting with it. That the value of money among foreigners, who lived under different municipal laws, was intrinsic, and consisted in its weight and fineness. That common consent had given it this value, for the common convenience of supplying one another's wants. That the weight and fineness was the only worth, that other nations regarded in our coin, as we in theirs; all money being between subjects of different Governments of no greater value, excepting the workmanship, than so many pieces of uncoined bullion. That therefore, should our standard be altered, we should still be upon the same foot with our neighbours; for, if we were to pay them for their goods, or exchange our money with theirs, whatever denomination we gave our money, they would in their change ever reduce it to an equality with theirs, and proportion the quantity and goodness of their commodities to the weight and fineness of the money they were to receive for them; so that, in respect of our foreign commerce, there was no reason to alter our standard. That at home, if the standard were raised, great confusions would attend it; the landlord would be defrauded of a great part of his rents, and the creditor of his debts. That the seamen and the soldier would be wronged in their pay; and many the like injuries and inconveniences would happen. That it was no answer to say, that they might buy as much goods and conveniences of life with this coin raised above its standard, as they could before, because, by degrees, the seller would infallibly raise the price of his goods, in proportion to the new raised standard; and that of this there was an instance before them, all commodities being raised in their price, while guineas were paid for thirty shillings. That whereas it was alledged, that the price of bullion was risen to six shillings and three-pence, and therefore the standard of the silver coin ought to be raised likewise; it was replied, That it was a thing impossible, that the price of silver could rise and fall in respect of itself: That it was an unchangeable truth, than which no mathematical demonstration could be clearer, that an ounce of silver would ever be worth another ounce of the same fineness, and no more; allowing some inconsiderable disparity upon the account of the coin, if one ounce be in money, and the other in bullion. That it was true indeed, that the people commonly gave 6s. 3d. for an ounce of bullion; but that they gave only clipped pieces, that had no more than the found of shillings and pence, but were by no means the things themselves; that is, they were not the standard shillings of due weight and fineness, and were no more so in the just sense of the word, than an ell is an ell, when the a third part of the whole, coined in those three reigns,

5,036,462

To this he adds the unmelting coins of Charles II, James II, and King William, which he supposed to amount to about

563,508

So the whole of the silver money clipped and unclipped, hoarded and current, then was

Of this sum he reckons four millions consisted of clipped money, and the remaining million six-hundred thousand pounds to be unclipped, and lying in hoards or current in the remote counties.

The author proceeds to compute, how far the clipped pieces may have been diminished in the weight. In order to this, he observes, that of 100*l*. sterling in silver, according to the standard of the Mint, ought to be thirty-two pounds, three ounces, one penny-weight, and twenty-two grains Troy. Now there had been brought in promiscuously, in the months of May, June, and July 1695, five hundred seventy-two bags, of one hundred pounds each,

Which 572 bags, according to the standard, should have weighed, Troy weight, - 18,451 6 16 8

But upon examination they weighed only

The medium of the weight of each hundred pounds of the clipped money,

16 8 18 00

The medium of the deficiency,

Hence it appears, that the current silver coins were diminished near one half, about the proportion of 10, to 22. Consequently, if there were four millions of clipped money to be re-coined, it would make but about two millions. So there would be a loss of about that sum. The real loss proved to be 2,200,000*l*. as will be seen hereafter.

The present standard for gold is twenty-two carats (or half ounces) of fine, and two carats of alloy. For the silver, eleven ounces two penny-weights fine, and eighteen penny-weights alloy. So that, in a pound Troy of silver, which is coined into sixty-two shillings, there are eighteen penny-weights of alloy; and, in a pound Troy of gold, which is coined into forty-four pounds ten shillings, there is one ounce of alloy.

1695. the third part of it is cut off. That the case was so plain, that when they demanded of those, who affirmed an ounce of bullion to be worth six shillings and three-pence, whether they meant six milled shillings and three-pence, they knew not what to reply; for this aleration of the value of bullion was merely in relation to diminished money. And, to make it yet more evident, they urged, that it was matter of fact, that, with five shillings and two-pence of new milled money, they could buy as much bullion as they pleased; while those, who bought it with clipped pieces, paid six shillings and three-pence. That whereas it was urged, that the raising the standard would prevent the exportation of our money, it was answered, that there was no other way possible to keep our money at home, than by out-trading our neighbours; that is, by sending them more commodities, or of greater value, than those, which we received from them. For if, upon the balance, we were found in their debt, there was no way left but to pay it in coin or bullion; and that therefore, whatever denomination we gave our coin, we must be necessitated to send it abroad, if the commodities we exported could not pay our debts. And that all the other arguments for raising the standard would sink to the ground, in case these two, on which the rest were built, had no reasonable foundation.

It is resolved to recoin the money according to the standard.
Dec. 10.

After the debates on this subject, the Commons resolved to recoin the clipped money, according to the established standard of the Mint, both as to weight and fineness; and, to make it more easy to the people, they voted a recompence for the deficiency of the clipped money; and that the loss of such clipped money should be borne by the public, and a fund of 1,200,000*l.* settled for that purpose. Accordingly, for raising that sum, a tax for seven years was laid upon all dwelling-houses, except cottages (now called the window-tax) namely, two shillings yearly upon each house; four shillings upon every house having ten windows; and eight shillings upon such houses as have twenty windows over and above the two shillings.

The Parliament was not insensible of the inconveniencies that would attend the calling in and recoining of the clipped money, the principal of which would be a cessation of payments, and thereupon an interruption of commerce. It was plain, that England could not subsist, unless some expedient was found out to support its trade, till the new money returned from the Mint; and, since gold alone was not sufficient for that purpose, to fix upon such an expedient was a very difficult thing. They therefore agreed to call in the money by degrees; that, while some denominations of coin were suppressed, others might be current; hoping, that, before the last old money should come in to be recoined, so much of the new might circulate from the Mint, as might sufficiently answer the necessities of the nation. They resolved therefore, first, 'That a day be appointed, after which no clipped crowns or half-crowns, as also no money clipped within the ring, be allowed in payment, or paid, except only to the Collectors of his Majesty's revenues or taxes, or upon loans or payments into the Exchequer. Secondly, That a day be appointed, after which no clipped money should pass in any payment whatsoever. Thirdly, That a day be appointed for all persons to bring in their clipped money, to be recoined into milled money; after which no recompence should be made for the same.'

The next day, an address was ordered to be prepared, to desire his Majesty to regulate the currency of clipped money, according to the preceding resolution; which address being drawn up, and reported by Mr Montague, and afterwards presented by him to the King, his Majesty caused a proclamation to be issued out accordingly. It is to be remarked, that the Lords had already addressed the King to the same effect.

The days appointed by the King's proclamation for putting a stop to the currency of clipped money were so short, that an immediate stop was thereby put to trade. This was partly occasioned by the backwardness of the people to receive any old money, though allowed at present to pass, upon an apprehension, that at last it would be left upon their hands; partly from the slowness of recoining in respect of the people's wants, though otherwise dispatched with all the expedition imaginable in so great an affair; and partly by reason of the unequal intrinsic value between the new milled money, and those pieces or denominations of the old, which were allowed to be current. For while the hammered money, and pieces not clipped within the ring were permitted to pass for the present necessity of trade, no body was willing to make payments in new money, which so much exceeded the old in its intrinsic worth. And therefore the new silver money, as fast as it issued from the Mints and Exchequer, was in a great measure stopped in the hands of the first receivers; for none were disposed to make payments in the new silver coin at the old standard, when they could do it in clipped pieces so much below it. And those, who had no payments to make, kept their new money as medals and curiosities in their chests; and there is reason to believe, that, at first, a great quantity of new money, by the help of the melting-pot, went abroad in ingots to purchase gold, which at this juncture was a very profitable commodity in England. These inconveniencies being represented to the Commons, the House in a Grand Committee considered the state of the nation, and how to prevent the interruption of commerce, during the recoining of the clipped monies. After some debates on several days, the Commons resolved, 'first, that the recompence for supplying the deficiency of clipped money should extend to all clipped money, which was silver, though of a coarser alloy than the standard. Secondly, that the Collectors and Receivers of his Majesty's aids and revenues be enjoined to receive all such monies. Thirdly, that a reward of five pounds per cent. be given to all such persons, as should bring in either milled or broad unclipped money, to be applied in the exchange of the clipped money throughout the Kingdom. Fourthly, that a reward also of three-pence per ounce be given to all persons, who should bring in wrought plate to the Mint to be recoined. Fifthly, that, for the sooner bringing in the clipped money to be recoined, any persons might pay in their whole next year's tax of four shillings in the pound in clipped money, at one convenient time appointed for that purpose. Lastly, that Com-

These resolutions were formed into a bill, with a clause to prohibit the melting down and exportation of our coin or bullion, and to prohibit the use of plate in public houses; which last article proved the best expedient to supply the Mints with bullion, there being at this time scarce any public house in England, that had not silver tankards and other utensils of the same metal, which the owners chose rather to carry to the Mint, and turn into ready money, than to keep so much useless and dead silver at home (1).

The Lords having made several amendments to this bill, most of which, after some debates and conferences between both Houses, were disapproved to by the Commons, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, according to order, presented to the House another bill for remedying the ill state of the coin of this Kingdom, which passed both Houses and received the Royal assent.

Upon a petition to the Commons by divers merchants and traders, to desire that the difficulties and losses in their trade and payments, occasioned by the rise of guineas, might be taken into consideration; the House first ordered a bill to be brought in, for taking off the obligation and encouragement of coining guineas for a certain time; and then proceeded to the lowering their value, wherein they met with some opposition. The reasons against the sinking the price of guineas were, that the people were easy and pleased with it: That abundance of people would be losers, in whose hands the guineas should be at last found, which would raise great disturbance and clamour in the nation; that therefore it ought to be considered, how far it was fit to incense the common people in this juncture of affairs, who had already suffered so much by the war.

Those, who were for reducing the price of guineas, argued, that there was as great reason to bring down guineas, as there was to recoin the silver money at the old standard. And here they reckoned up the mischiefs mentioned before on that head. That however the Parliament might be obliged to manage by the necessity of affairs, and to suffer for a time the guineas to pass at that excessive rate, that in some measure there might be a currency of money, while the Mints were employed in new coining the silver; yet now they were obliged to sink the price nearer the old standard, that the silver money might not be stopped and hoarded up as fast as issued out from the Mints. And that, whatever losses and inconveniences the people might suffer by reducing of guineas, yet the mischiefs, that arose, and would daily increase from not doing it, infinitely overbalanced those on the other side. Upon this the Commons resolved to lower the price of guineas; and, that they might do it with less grievance and disquiet to the people, they at first reduced them from thirty to eight and twenty shillings; afterwards to twenty-six, till at last a clause was inserted in the bill for encouraging the bringing plate to the Mint, whereby they were settled at two and twenty shillings, from which they naturally sunk to their former price of one and twenty shillings and six-pence. However, it is to be observed, that though the Parliament lowered the value of the guineas, hoping by that means to bring out the new money into circulation, yet by the artifice and management of some men the people were made to believe, that the price of gold would be raised at the next Session; upon which many persons, who had great sums of guineas, kept them close in their chests. By this means, though the circulation of the new money was a little promoted, yet that of guineas, by which the nation chiefly subsisted, was considerably obstructed; the new silver money too, which the people were likewise industriously persuaded to believe would be advanced in value, when the Parliament should come next together, was for that reason in a great measure hoarded up, to the great damage of commerce. Another evil arose during the recoinage of the money; a general loss of credit which indeed shook the state. But this was cured by a seasonable and wise remedy, which the Parliament applied the next Session; and on the other hand such diligence was used, not only in the Mint of the Tower, but likewise in those, which the King caused to be set up in York, Bristol, Exeter, and Chester, that at last this great undertaking of the highest difficulty, yet of absolute necessity, was happily accomplished, to the immortal honour of the Parliament in general, and in particular of Mr Charles Montague, who had the chief management of this weighty and arduous affair, which was executed with an order and justice, and quiet and exactness, beyond all men's expectation; so that the nation was freed from a great and threatening mischief, without any of those effects, which were generally apprehended from it, and, in less than a year's time, England, that had for so many years the worst money of any nation in Europe, had then the best, to the great disappointment of the Jacobites, who had conceived great hopes of throwing the nation into confusion.

The proceedings in Parliament upon another affair gave the King no small uneasiness. The 14th of December, the Lords, in a conference, communicated to the Commons an address to his Majesty, in relation to an act of Parliament made in Scotland for erecting a Company trading to Africa and the East-Indies; to which address the Commons gave their concurrence; and a Committee was appointed to examine, What methods were taken for obtaining that act? Who were the subscribers to that Company? And who were the promoters and advisers of it? Both Houses attended the King with their address, wherein they represented to him, 'That, having taken into their consideration the state of the trade of this Kingdom, they found, that, besides many other disadvantages and difficulties it now lay under, an act of Parliament, which had lately received his Majesty's Royal assent in his Kingdom of Scotland, for erecting a Company trading to Africa and the Indies,

1695-6. ' was like to bring many great prejudices and mischiefs to all his Majesty's subjects, who were concerned in the wealth or trade of this nation. That the said act did provide, That all ships, merchandize, and other effects whatsoever, belonging to that Company, should be free from all manner of restraints or prohibitions, and of all customs, taxes, cesses, supplies, or other duties imposed, or to be imposed by act of Parliament, or otherwise, for the space of twenty-one years. And farther, that the said Company, whose members, officers, servants, or others belonging thereto, should be free, both in their persons, estates, and goods employed in the said stock and trade, from all manner of taxes, cesses, supplies, excises, quartering of soldiers transient or local, or levying of soldiers, or other impositions whatsoever, during the space of twenty-one years. That, by reason of the great advantages granted to the Scots East-India Company, and the duties and duties, that lay upon that trade in England, a great part of the stock and shipping of this nation would be carried thither; and by this means Scotland might be made a free port for all East-India commodities; and consequently those several places in Europe, which were supplied from England, would be furnished from Scotland much cheaper than could be done by the English; and therefore this nation would lose the benefit of supplying foreign parts with those commodities, which had always been a great article in the balance of their foreign trade. Moreover, that the said commodities would unavoidably be brought by the Scots into England by stealth, both by sea and land, to the great prejudice of the English trade and navigation, and to the great detriment of his Majesty in his customs. And that, when that nation should have settled themselves in plantations in America, the English commerce in tobacco, sugar, cotton, wool, skins, masts, &c. would be utterly lost, because the privileges of that nation, granted to them by this act, were such, that that Kingdom must be the magazine for all commodities, and the English plantations, and the traffic there, lost to this nation, and the exportation of their own manufactures yearly decreased. That besides these, and many other obstructions, that the act would unavoidably bring to the general trade of this nation, another clause in the said act, whereby his Majesty promised to interpose his authority to have restitution, reparation, and satisfaction made for any damage, that might be done to any one of the ships, goods, merchandize, persons, or other effects whatsoever belonging to the said Company, and that upon the public charge; did seem to engage his Majesty to employ the shipping and strength at sea of this nation, to support this new Company, to the great detriment even of this Kingdom.' To this address the King made answer, ' That he had been ill served in Scotland, but he hoped some remedies might be found to prevent the inconveniencies, which might arise from this act.'

Soon after this, the King turned out both the Secretaries of state in Scotland, and the Marquis of Tweeddale: And great changes were made in the whole Ministry of that Kingdom, both high and low; particularly the Lord Murray, son of the Marquis of Athol, was made Secretary of State.

No. 20. Vol. III.

However, this business did not stop here; for the Committee appointed by the Commons to examine by what methods this act was obtained, having made their report, and delivered a copy of an oath de fidelis, taken by the Directors of the Scots East-India Company, and of the Journal of the proceedings of the Directors; and the report, oath, and journal being examined; as also the petition presented to the House by the English East-India Company, it was resolved, That the Directors of the Company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies, administering and taking here in this Kingdom an oath de fidelis, and under colour of a Scots act of Parliament, styling themselves a Company, were guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour; and that the Lord Bellhaven, William Paterson, David Nairne, James Smith, James Cheifly, William Shepherd, Robert Blackwood, James Balfour, James Fowles, Thomas Coutts, Abraham Wilmer, Daniel Van Mildert, Robert Williamson, Anthony Merry, Paul Docminique, Robert Douglas, Thomas Skinner, Hugh Frazer, James Bateman, Walter Stewart, and Joseph Cohen d'Azevedo be impeached of the same. While the impeachments were drawing up, Roderick Mackenzie endeavoured to suppress the evidence, which he had given against these persons, for which he was ordered into custody, but he made his escape; nor could he be apprehended, though the King, at the request of the Commons, issued Feb. 13. out a proclamation for that purpose.

When it was understood in Scotland, that the Scots King had disowned the act for the East-India much set on Company, from which it was expected that great riches should flow into that Kingdom, it is not easy to conceive how great, and how general an indignation was spread over the whole Kingdom; the Jacobites saw what a game it was like to prove in their hands; they played it with great skill, and to the advantage of their cause, in a course of many years; and continue to manage it to this day: There was a great deal of noise made of the Scotch act in both Houses of Parliament in England by some, who seemed to have no other design in that, but to heighten our distractions, by the apprehensions that they expressed. The Scotch nation fancied nothing but mountains of gold; and the credit of the design rose so high, that subscriptions were made, and advances of money were offered, beyond what any believed the wealth of that Kingdom could have furnished. Paterson came to have such credit among them, that the design of the East-India trade, how promising soever, was wholly laid aside; and they resolved to employ all their wealth, in the settling a colony, with a port and fortifications in Darien, which was long kept a secret, and was only trusted to a select number, empowered by this new Company, who assumed to themselves the name of the African Company, though they never meddled with any concern in that part of the world: The unhappy progress of this affair will appear in it's proper time.

The losses of the Merchants gave great advantages to those, who complained of the Administration; their conduct, with relation to our trade, was represented as at best a neglect of the nation, and of it's prosperity: Some, with a more pitiful malice, said, it was designed, that

1695 6. we should suffer in our trade, that the Dutch might carry it from us: And, how extravagant never this might seem, it was often repeated by some men of violent tempers. And in the end, when all the errors, with relation to the protection of our trade, were set out, and much aggravated, the Commons proceeded to consider the state of the nation in relation to trade, and resolved, 'First, That a Council of trade be established by act of Parliament, with powers for the more effectual preservation of the trade of this Kingdom. Secondly, That the Commissioners constituting the Council be nominated by Parliament. Thirdly, That the Commissioners should take an oath, acknowledging, that King William was rightful and lawful King of this realm; and that the late King James had no right or title thereunto; and that no other person had any right or title to the crown, otherwise than according to the act of settlement made in the first year of his Majesty's reign, &c.' Of these and ten more resolutions, the first and second, with some others, were indeed approved; but several, and especially the fourth, whereby King William was to be acknowledged rightful and lawful King, and which occasioned a warm debate, were rejected by the House. And a bill was ordered to be brought in, upon the resolutions agreed to; though it was opposed by those, who looked on the establishment of a Council of trade by an act of Parliament, as a change of our Constitution in a very essential point. They urged, that the executive part of the Government was in the King; so that the appointing any Council by act of Parliament began a precedent of their breaking in upon the execution of the law, in which it could not be easy to see how far they might be carried. It was indeed offered, that this Council should be much limited as to its powers; yet many apprehended, that, if the Parliament named the persons, how low soever their powers might be at first, they would be enlarged every Session; and, from being a Council to look into matters of trade, they would be next impowered to appoint convoys and cruisers. This, in time, might draw in the whole Admiralty, and that part of the revenue or supply, which was appropriated to the navy; so that a King would soon grow to be a Duke of Venice. And indeed those, who set this on most zealously, did not deny, that they designed to ingraft many things upon it.

The King was so sensible of the ill effects, which this would have, that he ordered his Ministers to oppose it, as much as possibly they could. The Earl of Sunderland, to the surprise of many, declared for it, as all that depended on him promoted it. He was afraid of the violence of the Republican party, and would not venture upon provoking them. The Ministers were much offended with him for taking this method to recommend himself at their cost. The King himself took it ill, and declared to Bishop Burnet, that, if the Earl went on, driving it as he did, he must break with him; and imputed it to his fear. For the unhappy steps, which he had made in King James's time, gave his enemies many pretences for attacking him, that he would venture on nothing, that might provoke them. Here was a debate plainly in a point of prerogative, how far the Government should continue on its antient bottom of Monarchy, as to the executive part; or how far it should turn to a Commonwealth; and yet, by an odd reverse, the Whigs, who were now most employed, argued for the prerogative, while the Tories seemed zealous for public liberty; so powerfully does interest bias men of all forms.

Another affair was, about this time, brought before the House of Commons, which touched the King in a very sensible part. The Earl of Portland had begged of the King the Lordships of Denbigh, Bromfield, and Tale in the County of Denbigh; which, before he went into Holland, he readily granted, not only to him, but to his heirs for ever. The warrant coming to the Lords of the Treasury, who were the Lord Godolphin, Sir Stephen Fox, Sir William Trumbull, and Mr John Smith, the Gentlemen of the County, upon one of two days notice, were heard before them in opposition. Sir William Williams alledged, 'That the Lordships were the antient demesnes of the Prince of Wales: That the Welsh were never subject to any but to God and the King; and that none shewed their allegiance more than the Welsh. That on the statute for granting of fee-farm rents, there was a particular exception of the Welsh rents, which imported, that the Parliament took the Welsh revenues not to be alienable; yet, upon creation of a Prince of Wales, there were Mises of 800 l. payable out of those Lordships to the Prince of Wales (1); and, though there were none now, yet he hoped and doubted not but to see one of the present King's own body.' Sir Roger Pugh alledged, 'That the revenues of these Lordships did support the Government of Wales, by paying the Judges and others their salaries; and, if given away, there would be a failure of Justice.' And Mr Price, afterwards Baron of the Exchequer, urged, 'That the grant was of a large extent, being five parts in six of one County, which was too great a power for any foreign prince to have, and the people of the country too great to be subject to any foreigner (2).' Let it be

(1) Mises were certain tollages or tributes, paid at the creation of a Prince of Wales. Thus, in the County Palatine of Cheshire, it was a certain tribute, paid by the inhabitants of that County, on the change of every owner of that Earldom, for the enjoyment of their liberties. And they have there a Mise-book, in which every town and village is rated so much towards the Mise.

(2) The other arguments, he made use of against the grant, were as follow: 'That there were fifty mean Lordships held under those manors, above fifteen-hundred freeholders; waffles and commons of many thousand acres; mines of lead and copper of great value, and that the present rents amounted to 1500 l. per ann. besides other great advantages, which a mighty favourite and a great courtier might make out of this country. That courts were kept in all those Lordships in the King's name. That all or most of the Gentlemen of that country were tenants to the King, and suitors to this court, and thereby obliged to the King by a double allegiance, that is, as subjects and tenants; and, if the King gave

1695-6. be considered (added he) 'Can it be for his Majesty's honour or interest (when the people hear this and understand it) that he daily gives away the revenues, and more, the petuity of his Crown revenues to his foreign subjects? Good Kings, after a long and chargeable war, were accustomed to tell their people, that they sorrowed for the hardships the nation underwent by a long war and heavy taxes; and that now they would live on their own. But it is to be feared, if grants are made so large and so frequent, there will be nothing for the King or his successors to call his own to live upon.' The Lord Godolphin having asked by way of objection, Whether the Earl of Leicester had not those Lordships in grant to him in Queen Elizabeth's time? Sir Robert Cotton answered, 'he believed he could give the best account in that case. That the Earl of Leicester had but one of those Lordships, and that was Denbigh. That he was so oppressive to the Gentry of the country, that he occasioned them to take up arms, and to oppose him; for which three or four of his (Sir Robert Cotton's) relations were hanged; but that it ended not there, for the quarrel was kept still on foot, and the Earl glad to be in peace, and to grant it back to the Queen; since which time it had ever been in the Crown.' Then the Lord Godolphin said, they had offered many weighty reasons, which should be represented to his Majesty. From the Treasury the Gentlemen of Wales attended the grant to the Privy-Seal, where their reasons and complaints against it were heard and received with great candour. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the grant being only superseded, but not recalled, Sir Thomas Grosvenor, Sir Richard Middleton, Sir John Conway, Sir

Robert Cotton, Sir William Williams, Sir Roger Puleston, Edward Vaughan, Edward Brereton, and Mr Robert Price, addressed themselves by petition to the House of Commons. Upon this occasion Mr Price, a Member of that House, made a remarkable speech, wherein besides enlarging on the arguments he had before used, against the grant, (which doubtless was unadvisedly made, and the opposition to it very just in those, that had nothing in view but to save those lands from alienation) he took occasion not only to inveigh against the Dutch in general, but to reflect even on the King's Person, Title, and Government.

The result of this affair was, that the Commons unanimously presented the following address to the King.

Address to the King about the grant.
Jan. 22.

WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, humbly lay before your Majesty, that whereas there is a grant passing to William Earl of Portland and his heirs of the Manors of Denbigh, Bromfield, and Tale, and divers other lands in the Principality of Wales, together with several estates of inheritance enjoyed by many of your Majesty's subjects, by virtue of ancient grants from the crown.

That the said Manors, with the large and extensive regalities, powers, and jurisdictions to the same belonging, are of great concern to your Majesty and the Crown of this realm; and that the same have been usually annexed to the Principality of Wales, and settled on the Princes of Wales for their support: And that a great number of your Majesty's subjects in those parts hold their estates by Royal tenure under great and valuable compositions

gave away one, it was to be feared, it would lessen the bounds of the other, since it is observable, that interest and property have an ascendant over duty. That those Manors were formerly Lordships-marches; that, when William the Conqueror had brought England under subjection, but could not subdue the Welsh country, he gave to the Norman Lords some neighbouring lands in Wales, and furnished them with men and arms; and what ground they could get from the Welsh by insurrection, or conquest, these Norman Lords were to hold as Lordships-marches, which were made Boroughs or Palatinates; and what they got or usurped by their power, they maintained by severity or oppression. That under these vassalages the Britons continued until the 27th of Henry VIII's reign, when the statute of Timon was made, and they esteemed it their happiness to be under the English Laws and Government, none having more eminently signalized their constant loyalty to their rightful King, than themselves. But, if his Majesty should think fit to disunite them by this grant, and put them under a foreign subject, it was putting them in a worse posture than their former estate, when under William the Conqueror and his Norman Lords. That the Britons were always men of courage and sincerity, and yet of resentment. That though Henry IV. and Henry V. were martial Princes, and had an hatred against the Britons, because they persevered in their duty to Edward II. who was their rightful though unfortunate King, and made most reproachful laws against them; yet it was worth remark, that those Kings had never peaceable or happy days, till they had reconciled themselves to those great people. That this is a revenue, that belongs to the Prince of Wales; and, in case of want of such, it vests in the Crown rather a usufructure than a property, till a Prince be created, to whose creation the revenue is annexed by these, though unusual words in the law, to him and his heirs, who shall be Kings of England, by the statute of the 21 Jacob. chap. 29. That in the preamble of that statute it was doubted, whether Charles Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall could grant leases of the Duchy lands for three lives, or any longer than his own life; though the statute adds, he had the inheritance in a special form of limitation, differing from the ordinary rule of inheritance of the common law; and therefore it was necessary to have confirmed in Parliament, the use that was made of that statute in this case. That, if the Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall, who had an inheritance in their revenues, could not grant estates without Parliament, for any longer time than their own lives; how then could his present Majesty, who was our King by modern contract, and had but an estate for life in possession in the Crown by the act of settlement, grant away the inheritance and absolute fee of the Principality of Wales? That, if the aid of Parliament was necessary to help in one case, it was more necessary in the other. That it was well known in former reigns there had been frequent acts of resumption, which always passed, when the people groaned under the weight of heavy taxes, and the nation in war. That, if that was a reason for the legislative power to pass a bill of resumption, it was still as good reason for his Majesty not to grant, since the nation was both in a war, and under the heaviest pressure of taxes, history bears testimony of.

ons, rents, royal payments, and services to the Crown and Princes of Wales, and have by such tenure great dependence on your Majesty and the Crown of England, and have enjoyed great privileges and advantages with their estates under such tenure. We therefore most humbly beseech your Majesty to put a stop to the passing this grant to the Earl of Portland of the said manors and lands; and that the same may not be disposed from the Crown but by consent of Parliament; for that such grant is in diminution of the honour and interest of the Crown, by placing in a subject such large and extensive royalties, powers, and jurisdictions, which ought only to be in the Crown, and will sever the dependence, which so great a number of your Majesty's subjects in those parts have on your Majesty and the Crown, by reason of their tenure, and may be to their great oppression in those rights, which they have purchased and hitherto enjoyed with their estates; and also an occasion of great vexation to many of your Majesty's subjects, who have long had the absolute inheritance of several lands (comprehended in the said grant to the Earl of Portland) by ancient grants from the Crown.

The King, in answer to this address, expressed himself thus:

Charles II.

'I have a kindness for my Lord Portland, which he has derived of me by long and faithful services; but I should not have given him these lands, if I had imagined the House of Commons could have been concerned. I will therefore recall the grant, and find some other way of shewing my favour to him.'

The debates about creating a Council of trade by act of Parliament were going on, and it probably would have passed both Houses, when the discovery of a conspiracy turned mens thoughts another way: So that all angry motions were let fall, and the Session ended with greater advantages to the King, than could otherwise be expected.

On the death of the Queen, the Jacobites began to think that the Government and lost the half of its strength, and that things could not be kept quiet at home, when the King should be beyond sea. Some pretended, they were for putting the Princess of Denmark in her sister's place; but this was only a pretence, to which she gave no sort of encouragement: King James lay at the bottom. And therefore, shortly after the Queen's decease, they entered upon schemes to remove the King likewise. The same week wherein he had given them the fullest and most extensive pardon, that ever was known, they were contriving to seize his person. For about this time several meetings and consultations were held by Mr Charnock, Captain Porter, Captain Haugh, Major Matthews, Mr Dennigh, Mr Goodman, and Sir William Perkins, to settle the method of executing this design; and the places, where these Conspirators, or the greatest part of them, met, were Mr Goodman's house in Bread-street, the Chocolate-house in St James's-Street, and the Fountain Tavern by the Temple-Gate. And that 1695-6. they might quiet their minds, which it seems were not perfectly delivered from all sense of guilt and horror at such a barbarous enterprize, they sent over to solicit the late King James to grant them a commission, which they flattered themselves would be sufficient to authorize their attempt, and make it look more like a military action, than a foul murder. But, it seems, it was not thought fit to grant any such commission at that juncture, in which things did not perhaps appear ripe enough for their purpose; at least, it was so delayed, that the Conspirators seemed uneasy to be held so long in suspense, and therefore resolved immediately to execute their designs, notwithstanding their expectations of a commission from St Germain's were disappointed. And now, however weak and impracticable it might seem, they projected a design to attack the Guards, seize the King, and forthwith hurry him to Deal, where a vessel was to be provided to receive, and thence carry him into France; and, in case of resistance, they proposed to destroy him, and then pretend it was done by a random shot. In order to this, they proceeded so far as to view the ground about Turnham-Green, and to fix on a place proper for their design; but they had not time enough to complete this affair before the King embarked for Flanders, and thereby obliged them to defer their intended villany, till his return in the winter.

But the Conspirators could by no means sit down satisfied with being idle in the mean time, and therefore many meetings and consultations were held in various places, where it was considered and debated, what were the most proper and expeditious means of restoring James. And it was agreed on at a meeting at the old King's head in Leadenhall-Street, where were then present the Earl of Aylesbury, the Lord Montgomery, son of the Marquis of Powis, Sir John Fenwick, Sir John Friend, Mr Goodman, Captain Charnock, and Captain Porter, that a trusty messenger should be sent to St Germain's, who should persuade King James to procure eight thousand foot, a thousand horse, and a thousand dragoons, in order to make a descent upon England; with which auxiliary forces the Conspirators, who were then ready to rise in arms and join them, undertook to set the Crown again upon King James's head. The person chosen for this errand to St Germain's was Captain Charnock, who expressed his willingness to undertake the affair, provided they would let him know what assurances he might give that King of their readiness to serve him, in case he came with such a power as they demanded. The Conspirators unanimously assured him, that, if the late King landed, they would serve him with two thousand horse, Charnock replied, that he would be the messenger, but desired they would give him another meeting, that he might be satisfied this was their settled resolution, and such as the late King might depend upon. This was granted, and a second meeting appointed a few days after at Mrs Montjoy's house in St James's-Street, where the Conspirators renewed their assurances, that they were ready to assist and join King James with the abovementioned body of horse, in case of an invasion. Charnock, shortly after went over to France, and communicated to King James 1695-6. James their request. But whether his friends were diffident of the interest and strength of the Conspirators, or whether they were willing to see the issue of another campaign, supposing, if it proved successful, it would greatly facilitate their invasion of England; it is certain, the Conspirators were told by King James, that he was sensible of their fidelity and steadfastness in his interest, for which he thanked them; but as to the assistance, which they desired him to procure, his answer was, that the French King could not, at that time, spare so great a number of his troops as they demanded. This answer not being satisfactory, it was thought necessary to send over a man of quality, who should press the matter with more authority: So the Earl of Aylesbury was prevailed on to go. He was admitted to a secret conversation with the French King: and this gave rise to the invasion; which, though deferred for this time, was very near being executed the next winter, as will presently appear (1).

In the mean time the treasonable commerce went on with St Germain's; for which purpose they maintained boats of their own on the coasts of Kent; all care was taken to support the spirits of the party, and all artifices and methods of application were used to spread a malignant ferment among the people, which might make them uneasy under the Government, and dispose them to a change.

The success of King William's arms, at the siege of Namur, was so far from discouraging them from carrying on their conspiracy, that it seemed rather to push them on to accomplish it with greater expedition. For being jealous, that the next campaign might still increase the reputation of his Majesty's arms, and diminish that of his enemies, they resolved to hasten the execution of their designs; so that the fears, which they entertained of the King's still getting greater advantages in the field, seemed to have given birth to the intended invasion and assassination. In order to accomplish their ends, great stores of arms were bought up and concealed in convenient places; great numbers of horses were provided to mount their troops, which they had lifted. Officers were appointed, and commissions received from King James, by which pretended authority they were to act.

In such a posture were their affairs at home. In the mean time the negotiation was maintained between the Conspirators and King James. And at this time the French Court seemed inclined to comply with their desires, by lending that King a good body of their troops. Messengers went to and fro with packets of letters to concert affairs, and to give intelligence of the forwardness of the invasion on the one side, and the insurrection on the other. The time fixed upon to put the design in execution was very favourable and encouraging; for now there were few regular troops in England or Scotland, his Majesty's forces being almost all employed in carrying on the war against the French King in Flanders. And, as for the militia of the country, the Conspirators had those undisciplined troops in contempt, not imagining, that they could make the least stand against a veteran army. They believed therefore they could make a descent on a weak and almost defenceless country; neither did they apprehend any opposition, that could be made at sea to prevent their invasion; for they knew, that a strong convoy was ready in England, and had received sailing orders to make the best of their way to reinforce Admiral Rooke at Cadiz, whose squadron was looked upon as inferior in strength to that of the French then putting to sea from Toulon.

The French Fleet, which had been so long shut up within Toulon, was now fitting out and ordered round to Brest. Our fleet, that lay at Cadiz, was only a squadron left there, by Ruffel (who was come home with many of the great ships) and therefore, not strong enough to fight the French, when they should pass the Streights. But a large fleet was ordered thither, and would have sailed in December, had it not been kept in our ports, by contrary winds, till February. This was then thought a great unhappiness, but it appeared afterwards, that our preservation was chiefly owing to it. However, we were all this while in great pain, for Rooke who commanded the squadron at Cadiz, and was like to suffer for want of provisions and stores, which this fleet was to carry him; besides the addition of strength this would bring him, in case the Toulon squadron should come about. We were only apprehensive of danger from that squadron, little imagining we could be in any at home, till that fleet was brought about. It is true, the Jacobites talked and writ now with more than ordinary assurance; and advertisements came from many places, that some very important thing was ready to break out. But the King had been so accustomed to alarms, and reports of this kind, that he had now so little regard to them, as scarce to be willing to hearken to those, who brought him such advertisements. He was so much set on preparing for the next campaign, that all other things were little considered by him. But to return to the Plot.

It

(1) If Sir John Fenwick did not slander King James, they at this time proposed a shorter and more infallible way, by assassinating the King; for he said, that some came over from France about this time, who assured their party, and himself in particular, that a Commission was coming over, signed by King James, which they affirmed, they had seen, warranting them to attack the King's person. This, it is true, was not yet arrived; but some affirmed, they had seen it, and that it was trusted to one, who was on his way hither; therefore, since the King was so near going over to Holland, that he would probably be gone before the Commission could be in England; it was debated among the Jacobites, whether they ought not to take the first opportunity to execute this Commission, even though they had it not in their hands: It was resolved to do it, and a day was set for it; but, as Fenwick said, he broke the design; and sent them word, that he would discover it, if they would not promise to give over the thoughts of it: And upon this reason, he believed, he was not let into the secret of the following winter. This his Lady told Bishop Burnet from him, as an article of merit to obtain his pardon. But he had trusted to their word very easily, it seems, since he gave the King no warning to be on his guard; and the two witnesses, he said he could produce to vouch this, were then under prosecution, and outlawed: So that the proof was not at hand, and the warning had not been given as it ought to have been. Burnet, Vol. II. 148.

It must be observed, that two sorts of men, the Papists, and that kind of Protestants, who are nearest to them in principles and affection, were enemies to the King and his Government. Now those Protestants were subdivided into two parties, one of which had the Lord Melfort for their head, the other the Earl of Middleton. The first was the hot and violent sort, who had the Papists generally on their side. These men earnestly desired and laboured to bring back King James as an absolute Conqueror, without any capitulation or agreement. The other party, though disaffected to the Government, and very desirous of that King's return, yet were not transported to that extravagant degree of delusion, as to be willing to sacrifice their religion, rights, and liberties, to the will of an unlimited master; and therefore, in their conferences with the others about the means of restoring King James, they always offered such methods and schemes, as had a shew at least of securing their religion and liberty, in case he prevailed; and those, who thus contended for his restoration on terms and composition, were fiercely opposed by the other faction, who still rejected their overtures, and declaimed loudly against all limitations proposed to hinder despotic power in their Prince. Great heats and animosities rose between these two parties. The first was most acceptable to King James and his Court; but the last were most considerable for their number and interest. To humour therefore the last, the Earl of Middleton, who was sent over to St Germain's to manage their affairs, was made Secretary of State; and the Lord Melfort, as if under some disgrace, was ordered to withdraw from Court, that the other party might believe, that they had the ascendancy, and that their way and method of restoring King James was best accepted and chiefly insisted on; though there is ground to conclude, that all this was nothing but artifice and collusion, the Lord Melfort being still in the secret of King James, and still corresponded underhand with him. And now by this concerted invasion and insurrection it plainly appears, that the violent and biggoted party of the Lord Melfort were in the greatest esteem; that their scheme of bringing back the King without terms was most approved; while the others were imposed on by specious assurances, that the terms and limitations, which they offered, were very agreeable, while there was no manner of care taken, after the intended descent should be made, and the Kingdom over-run by a foreign army, to secure either their religion or their liberties.

The former intended invasions (as hath been related) were always preceded by declarations from King James, promising to maintain the Constitution in Church and State, and protect the rights and liberties of the Subject, and offering pardon for past offences, provided he was not opposed after his landing. But now the scene is changed; no obliging declaration is set forth, nor any promise of pardon is published. He no longer pretended to return upon a Protestant interest, but by the power of a foreign army, wholly composed of old and experienced troops; no English nor Irish, of whom there were then considerable numbers in France, being allowed to share in this enterprize, as being looked upon not so proper to be employed in subduing their own country; and therefore, whatever that deluded party might imagine, it is evident, that nothing less was designed, than an entire reduction of these Kingdoms by a foreign power, the consequences of which must unavoidably have been the utter extirpation of the Protestant religion, and the irrecoverable subversion of our laws and liberties.

About the beginning of February 1695-6, the Duke of Berwick, who was natural son to King James, was dispatched into England to concert affairs with the Conspirators here, and to give them assurance, that King James was ready to make a descent upon England, at the head of an army; and having discharged his commission, and laid the matter so well, that he thought it could not miscarry, he went back to France, and met King James at St Dennis, who was come so far on his way from Paris. He stopped there, and, after a long conference with the Duke of Berwick, he sent him first to his Queen at St Germain's, and then to the King of France, and he himself called for a notary, and passed some act; but it was not known to what effect. When that was done, he pursued his journey, and came post to Calais, to set himself at the head of an army of about twenty-thousand men, that were drawn out of the garrisons which lay near that frontier. At Calais he was met by the Marshal de Boufflers, who came from Flanders to confer with him on this important occasion, and to give such orders and advice, as he judged necessary to render the expedition successful.

There came, every winter, a coasting fleet from all the sea-ports of France to Dunkirk, with all the provisions for a campaign; and it was given out, that the French intended a very early one this year. So that this coasting fleet was ordered to be there by the end of January. Thus transport-ships, as well as an army, were brought together in a very silent manner; and Monsieur Gaberet was come up as high as Calais with a squadron of men of war, which, when reinforced by the conjunction of Du Bari's fleet from Dunkirk, was looked upon as a sufficient convoy.

This was the posture of affairs on the other side of the water. In the mean time the Jacobites on this side were ready to take up arms, to receive and assist King James. The transportation of horse being a matter of great trouble as well as expence, the Conspirators in England engaged to assist him at their landing with several regiments of horse and dragoons; for which purpose commissions had been sent over from King James, and delivered to several of the Conspirators, to empower them to raise men, and, as their officers, to command them. In pursuance of this pretended authority, many troops were lifted, and their under-officers named. Sir John Freind received a commission for a regiment of horse, which was very near completed; his Lieutenant-Colonel, Major, and Captains being named, and the troops almost full. Sir William Perkins had likewise a commission for a regiment of horse, and had engaged a considerable number to serve him in it. He declared, that his own troop was wholly composed of old soldiers; and that several other Gentlemen, well experienced in military affairs, had promised to follow him as Volunteers: Colonel Tempest, as Uxarnock told Porter, had a commission for a regiment of dragoons, which was said to be in great forwardness; Sir John Fenwick had four troops 1695-6. troops ready; Colonel Parker was to command another regiment, and Mr Curwin another. There was one more to be raised in and about Suffolk, where the malecontents boasted they had great interest. Many commissions were delivered to those, who were named for their under-officers, King James having sent them word, that he was ready to make a descent, the Conspirators were very diligent in preparing to join him. Some of them took journeys into several parts of the Kingdom, to acquaint the discontented party, that King James was on the point of invading the nation; and therefore incited them to rise in arms, to give him assistance, and to engage as many of their friends, as they had interest in, to do the same. At the same time, the Conspirators in London were very active, and determined to push on their design to execution.

But, notwithstanding all these preparations, and the various circumstances that seemed to favour the intended invasion, it was resolved, to put nothing to the hazard, till they had made their success sure, by the murder of the King; as if no hopes were left of subduing him any other way. The assassination therefore of King William was concerted and agreed upon by the English Court at St Germain's as a thing of absolute necessity to give success to the invasion, and the next point considered was a fit person to manage an affair of this nature and consequence. Colonel Parker, a person of a dissolute life, a hot and restless temper, and distinguished from others by his remarkable and uncommon wickedness, was, by bloody principles and inveterate hatred to the King and his friends, qualified above all men for this undertaking. He (as hath been said) almost ever since the King's accession to the throne, had been carrying on some design against his life, was engaged in one in the year 1691, and after in the same year in another with Grandoul and Du Mont, and after that in 1693 with Goodman, Porter, and Charnock. This man, though in great esteem with the Conspirators, and perfectly qualified for such a work was not fixed upon for this expedition; for, considering how well he was known in England, they might justly apprehend, that his very being in England might alarm the people, who would presently imagine, that some mischief was in agitation, whenever that violent man appeared in this country. Sir George Barclay therefore was chosen as the most proper person to be intrusted with the conduct of this enterprize. He was a native of Scotland, an experienced officer, of known courage, close and reserved, and of a competent understanding; and withal such a furious bigot in his religion, as to believe, that for the propagation of it any the most dishonourable and inhuman actions might lawfully be committed. This Gentleman, having received his commission from King James, and from Mr Carrol, Secretary to his Queen, had eight hundred pounds to provide men horses, and to discharge other expences, in conducting and carrying on this conspiracy; though he afterwards complained of the smallness of the sum for accomplishing of so great an undertaking, having first given out, that he was gone to Paris to be cured of the foul disease, left St Germain's on or about the 10th of December 1695, in order to his embarkation for England. He was brought over, together with Major Holms, by Captain Gill, and landed in Romney marsh about the beginning of January following. Upon his arrival at London, he applied himself to the persons, in whom he had reason to confide, and such as he had the greatest assurance to believe would be ready to engage in this desperate design. These were Harrison alias Johnson, a Priest; Captain Charnock, Captain Porter, and Sir William Perkins. Sir George Barclay had all the encouragement that could be, to impart his design to them, who before had shewn a forward inclination to attempt the King's person.

These were the principal persons whom Sir George addressed himself to. To these he communicated the business, which he came over about, that is, the assassination of the King; and acquainted them, that, as he was sent by the late King James to conduct and accomplish this business, so he had brought over with him the King's commission for his warrant and authority. Charnock and Porter were assured by him, that he had such a commission, and Sir William Perkins and Harrison saw and read it. He likewise acquainted them, that about twenty officers and troopers out of King James's guards were ordered to come over, and were to be employed in this affair, as was observed before. These persons readily complying with this design, to facilitate the invasion and restoration of King James, Sir George sets them immediately to work, to engage as many more bold and desperate fellows, as would make up a number sufficient for that purpose, which, as they judged, ought to be at least forty. This the Conspirators cheerfully undertook, and with great diligence endeavoured to procure the men, whom he desired. Harrison demanded of Blaire, who some time after visited him in his lodgings at Somerjet-House, whether he knew any soldiers or men of courage, for that was their phrase for ruffians and cut-throats; 'for said he, something may be done in a little time, that may prove an introduction to King James's restoration.' Blaire answered, That he knew some such persons, but then desired to be informed, how the business could be effected. The other replied, after some discourse about burning the victualling office, to retard the going out of the English fleet, that he had been told by an able and experienced soldier, that with an hundred good horse he could put an end to the war in a fortnight's time. Blaire answered, That then it must be done in some dishonourable way, which he durst not so much as harbour in his thoughts. The Priest, perceiving the squeaminess of the soldier, shrunk up his shoulders, and so the conversation ended. But, some time after, when Blaire objected to the assassination as a wicked design, that had no authority from God or man to support it; Harrison acquainted him, that there was a sufficient warrant, and that himself had seen it; and then demanded of him, if he thought it proper, that it should be shewn to every body. Blaire replied, That he did not imagine, that such a thing had been in King James's nature, and then took his leave.

However Harrison attempted Richard Fisher with more success; for having told him, that King James had sent over a commission by Sir George Barclay to kill the Prince of Orange, Fisher declared his readiness to embark in this enterprize, and about the 3d of February he was introduced 1695-6. introduced by Harrison into the company of Sir George Barclay, having first desired him, in case he knew Sir George, to take no notice of him. Harrison acquainted Sir George Barclay, that this was the Gentleman he promised to bring to him; that he might confide in him, and speak freely to him. Upon which Sir George immediately proposed to him the assassinating of his Majesty. Fisher, without hesitation, consented, and they presently entered upon debate about the best manner of accomplishing their purpose; and, in order to it, Fisher undertook to provide five horses and arms for himself and four more. In the mean time Charnock, Porter, and Sir William Perkins lost no time, but laboured with great application to engage the number of assassins, for which they had undertaken. Porter's quota was seven men and as many horses; Charnock's six or seven; Sir William Perkins undertook for five horses, three to be mounted by men of his own, and the other two by such men as the Conspirators should procure. Then Sir George Barclay said, that Lowick and others, who were lately arrived from France, would likewise join with them and complete the number. And now having succeeded in the first step, and a sufficient number being undertaken for, they had many conferences in different places about the best way of putting their design in execution.

The places, where they met and held their consultations, were Captain Porter's lodgings in Norfolk-street, the Globe-Tavern in Hatton-Garden, the Nag's-Head in St James's-Street, the Cock in Bow-Street, the Old-Griffin in Holbourn, the Sun-Tavern in the Strand, &c. But the place, which Sir George frequented, and whither many of the Conspirators came to receive orders from him, was the Piazza in Covent-Garden.

At their several debates various methods were proposed of executing their purpose. One way suggested was to attack the Guards, and in the mean time to kill the King, as he went on some Sunday from Kensington to St James's chapel; which was offered one time in this manner, that six men on foot should be posted in the little house at Hyde-Park-Gate, who should issue out, and, by shutting the gate, make a stop, and then the Conspirators might fall on and attack the Guards with sword in hand. Another time it was proposed to shoot one of the leading horses, whereby his Majesty's coach might be forced to stay in its passage through the gate, and then to assault and murder him by one party, while another engaged the Guards. Another proposal was to attempt the King's person, when they should be informed that he was gone to Mr Lattin's house at Richmond, a place where the King sometimes retired for the air and recreation. The reason of this proposal was, that during his stay there he was usually but weakly guarded. At another time they discoursed of seizing the King in his palace at Kensington by night, which was to be done by securing the garden with about forty men, who were to be provided with ladders for that purpose. Some insisted, that their design would be best effected by laying an ambuscade near the King's house at Richmond, where a number of foot should be posted in a neighbouring wood, ready to issue forth, and attack him as he passed by in his coach, while the rest of the Conspirators assaulted the Guards, to prevent their giving him any assistance. 1695-6.

Though this method was warmly contended for by some, and well enough liked by Sir George, yet they were at last controuled, and the proposal was rejected. For the scheme, which the greatest part approved, and in favour of which Sir George Barclay did at length declare, whose orders the rest were obliged to obey, and which was at last agreed upon among them all, as the final result of their debates, was this: They resolved to attack the King on his return from Richmond in the evening after his hunting, it being his frequent practice to go thither on Saturdays for his diversion. The place, which they chose for this bloody business, was the lane between Turnham-Green and Brentford; and the particular part of that lane agreed upon was the end next to Turnham-Green, through which the King used to pass in his return from Richmond.

The execution of their design was projected and resolved upon in the following order: The Conspirators were to be formed into three parties, Sir George Barclay, the Commander in chief, was, with a chosen party of eight or ten, to assault the coach, by discharging a blunderbuss or musketoon loaded with six or eight balls, and their other fire-arms, to murder the King, and all that were with him in the coach; while the other two parties, of which one was to be commanded by Charnock and Porter, the other by Brigadier Rockwood, were to attack the King's Guards with sword in hand on either side of the lane. And that they might act with great circumspection, and be yet further satisfied, that this was a proper place, wherein to execute their desperate design, they sent King, Porter, and Knighly, to survey the place they had fixed upon.

Accordingly, these three persons rid the next day to Turnham-Green, and after having with great attention surveyed the place, and the nature of the ground on each side the water, they returned to the rest of the Conspirators, who were then at the Nags-Head Tavern in St James's-street to impart to them their observations. The report they made was so pleasing to the rest of their company, that they were all confirmed in their opinion, and abundantly satisfied in their choice of the ground. Thus had these men agreed upon the scene, where to act their tragedy, and concerted the manner of effecting it! That their design might be carried on and accomplished with great caution and security against any contingency, they appointed two orderly men, Chambers and Durant, to lodge near the guards at Kensington, and to attend constantly there, that they might be ready to give the Conspirators notice whenever the King went abroad. Chambers was appointed to bring his intelligence to Charnock, and Durant his to Sir George Barclay. Chambers had orders to advertise them when the King, and Durant was to inform them when the Guards went forth; and Sir George Barclay and Charnock undertook to convey timely notice to the rest of the Conspirators, that they might all assemble at the time and place appointed, and every man take the post assigned him.

It was further agreed and resolved upon for the accomplishing of their purpose, that when they should receive intelligence that the King 1695-6. was gone towards Richmond, to drop out of town by three or four in a company, the better to avoid suspicion, and afterwards, for the same reason, to disperse themselves in small parties in the several inns marked out for them about Brensford, and Turnham-Green, and the neighbouring places, where they might be disposed of with the most convenience and the least observation, and so without any alarm and disturbance might wait for the King's return from Richmond, and then be all ready to execute their design. Moreover, care was taken, that, when the King was at Richmond, a trusty person should wait at Kew-Ferry, who should give notice, when the Guards returned thither to wait for the King, to the end that every man might prepare himself, and be in readines.

Having thus fixed on the place, provided their men, and agreed on the order and method of executing their conspiracy, they at last appointed the time of doing it; Saturday the 15th of February 1695-6 was the first day that was agreed upon; and then, if Durant and Chambers should bring them intelligence from Kensington, that the King was gone to Richmond, on that morning they determined to make haste to their posts appointed at Turnham-Green, and to attack the Guards, and assault the King at his return.

It was but a few days before the 15th of February, on which day the Conspirators resolved to execute their design, when some of them began to reflect with horror upon it, and resolved to ease their unquiet minds, and to prevent the execution of the plot by a timely discovery.

The first of the Conspirators, who discovered the treason, was Captain Fisher, who came to the Earl of Portland on the 11th of February, and acquainted him with the design of taking away the King's life, and named several of the persons, who were concerned in it; but he could not then inform the Earl, in what manner it was concerted, nor what day was appointed for it. But he assured his Lordship, that, as soon as he should be informed more particularly, he would wait upon him, and give him further satisfaction. Accordingly, the 13th of February, Fisher returned, two days after, to the Earl, and acquainted him, that the 15th of February was the day agreed upon by the Conspirators to attempt his Majesty's life, and then told him in what manner, and in what place, they intended to do it.

The second, who made the discovery, was Mr Pendergrafs, an Irish officer, who knew nothing of the affair till Thursday the 13th of February; for that day he came to London out of Hampshire, being sent for by Captain Porter, who imparted to him the design of assassinating the King, and endeavoured to engage him in it. Though Pendergrafs was exceedingly startled at such a proposal, he seemed to comply, and promised to make one of the party; but, the very next day in the evening, he went to the Earl of Portland, not knowing that Fisher had been with him before on the same errand, and told him, that he came to reveal to him an important secret, namely, a design against his Majesty's life. He told the Earl that indeed he was a Roman Catholic; but that he did not think, that any religion could justify so great a wickedness; and therefore, from principles of Christianity and Probity, he thought himself obliged, by revealing the matter, Numb. XXI. Vol. III.

to prevent the King's falling into the hands of the Conspirators. But he acquainted him at the same time, that the Conspirators were his friends; and that from one of them he had received great obligations; and therefore, though he thought himself bound in duty and conscience to make this discovery, to preserve his Majesty's life, yet he likewise thought himself under obligations of honour and gratitude not to betray his friends; and therefore declared, that his resolution was not to make known their names, nor to appear an evidence against them. He then desired Lord Portland, as he tendered his Majesty's life, to prevail with him not to go to Richmond on the morrow, assuring him, that the Conspirators had prepared all things to assault him in his return. It ought to be remembered, for the reputation of this Gentleman; as to the credibility of his testimony, that the meer abhorrence of such a design was the only motive, that induced him to make it known to the Court.

The King being informed of the discovery, which Fisher and Pendergrafs had made to the Earl of Portland, received but little impression from it. He was not easily brought to credit these informations, till a variety of circumstances, in which the discoveries agreed, convinced him of the whole design; and it was with great difficulty, that he was prevailed with by the Lord Portland to lay aside his going to Richmond, that Saturday, and remain in his palace at Kensington.

The next man, who voluntarily gave information of this conspiracy, was Mr de la Rue, a Frenchman, who declared, That he had frequented the Company of the Conspirators, and made himself intimate with them, on design, when this horrible scheme was ripe for execution, by a timely discovery to defeat it. He applied himself to Brigadier Levison, and acquainted him with the intended villainy some few days after. Fisher and Pendergrafs had been on the same design with the Earl of Portland; but not one of the three was in the least acquainted with the intentions of either of the others, to reveal the conspiracy. And though de la Rue gave his information without knowing, that Fisher and Pendergrafs had done the like; yet his story so fully confirmed that of the other two, agreeing exactly with them in all the material particulars, that the King, notwithstanding his great aversion to believe this plot, which so nearly concerned his own life, was, by this concurrent testimony of la Rue, at last persuaded of the truth of it.

On Friday, the 21st of February, at night, the King admitted Pendergrafs and de la Rue severally into his presence, and heard them relate what they had told the Lord Portland, concerning the conspiracy. Pendergrafs discovered the plot in general, to prevent his Majesty's falling into the hands of the Conspirators; but withal declared, as he had done before to the Lord Portland, that it was his settled resolution not to mention names, or, at any time, to become an evidence against them. He continued in this resolution with great steadfastness, till the King used such convincing arguments, as prevailed with him to recede from it. The King told him, That he had indeed shewn himself a man of probity and honour: That he had great obligations to him for the timely care, which he had 1695-6. had taken to reveal a design, that so nearly concerned his life. But he shewed him withal, that, unless he went further in his discovery, and made him acquainted with the names of the Conspirators, he would not put him in a condition of preserving himself against them. That the detection of the truth in general might indeed render him suspicious of all men, but would be no security against any, who intended to take away his life; and that the Conspirators might change the method and order of their design, as well as the time and place of execution. And therefore that Mr Pendergrafs, by discovering the conspiracy, while he concealed the names of the Conspirators, would fall short of his own intention, which was to preserve the King's life; it being impossible, that his Majesty could be in safety, unless the desperate undertakers of this design against him were known and secured. By this method of reasoning Pendergrafs was at last overcome; and being convinced of the absolute necessity of going further in this discovery, to enable the King to provide for his safety, he wrote down the names of many of the Conspirators, which he delivered to the Earl of Portland, but not till the King had given his honour, that he should not, unless he pleased, be used as an evidence against them.

On Saturday, the 15th of February, the Conspirators concluding, that the King, according to his custom, would go to Richmond to hunt, they had prepared all things, and were ready to mount for the execution of their project; but having received an account, that the King did not go abroad that day, they were obliged to wait for another opportunity; and therefore they resolved to perpetrate their treason on the Saturday following.

On Friday, the 21st of February, Sir George Barclay, Sir William Perkins, Porter, and Charnock, who were the principal Conspirators concerned in the assassination, met at the Sun-Tavern in the Strand, where they had a long discourse concerning their disappointment, the Saturday before. Some of them were afraid, that the secret had taken air, and their plot was discovered to the Government. On the other hand, some believed, that the design was not revealed, and used this argument for their opinion, that, if the business had been discovered, they should not have been there assembled, as they then were. Upon which, the diffidence and jealousy of the others being removed, it was again resolved, that, if the King went abroad to hunt the next Saturday, they would then endeavour to accomplish their design, in the way and method, which they had fixed upon for the Saturday before.

The same Friday in the evening, the Conspirators, who belonged to Sir George Barclay's party, met at the two Black-Posts in Maiden-Lane, where Harris, King, Richardson, Cassels, Maxwell, and Hundford, then were. Captain Counter came to them, and said, that they must be sure to be all in a readiness the next morning; and therefore ordered them by no means to stir out. Upon which Cassels, after having used a dreadful imprecation, said, he resolved to have the plunder of the field, crying out, To-morrow is the day, boys! Upon which King said, if it did not succeed on the morrow, he would entertain no further thoughts about it. Hundford demanded? How they should make their escape after the execution of their design? 1695 6. Cassels replied, that he must keep with the party, to which he was ordered. The like answer Sir George Barclay gave to those, who asked him the same question; that is, when they had killed the King, they should keep together till they came to Hammer-smith, and then disperse and go into town by several ways and in small companies, where they would have no need of lying long concealed; for the invasion would immediately follow, and then they should be at liberty. But, notwithstanding this, some of the Conspirators, who reflected more coolly upon the affair, and the danger that attended it, were dissatisfied in their minds, that no better provision was made to secure their retreat.

The next day, being Saturday the 22d of February, which was the second day agreed upon for the execution of the design, Porter's party, as they were appointed, came to him to receive their orders. First came de la Rue, and Porter told him, that all parties were ready to march in the afternoon, provided the King went out a hunting; an account of which they expected from Chambers and Durant, who were posted at Kensington. Soon after came Cranburn, Keys, Pendergrafs, and King, the last of whom belonged to Sir George Barclay's party. Pendergrafs was chosen out of Porter's number to be one of the eight, who, under Sir George, were to assassinate his Majesty. King came to Porter with a message from Sir George Barclay. Then Porter, taking a piece of paper, wrote down a list of his men, which he sent by Cranburn, whom he called his Quarter-master, to Captain Charnock. After a short stay Cranburn returned, and brought back the paper, which he carried, and at the foot of Porter's list was added the list of Charnock's men, both which made up about eighteen. Then one of the Conspirators told Porter, that he thought their number had been greater, meaning the parties of Charnock and Porter. To which Porter answered, that they had been disappointed of five or six. And indeed Kenrick excused himself upon the account of his arm, which he pretended was broke. Sherburn asked too many questions to be trusted; and Plowden, though he appeared, the Saturday before, did not, according to his promise, appear now; and one or two more recommended by Lowick had failed them. Then Porter declared, that these men, with those of Sir George Barclay, would make up forty; which King declared were enough of all conscience to do the business. Cranburn at his return acquainted them likewise, that Chambers had sent intelligence to Charnock, that the King was to go out a hunting between ten and eleven o'clock, which was communicated and received with great joy; and then Porter declared, that Pendergrafs was to be one of the eight, who were to attack the King's coach; and said aloud, that he had a special piece for him, that would carry eight balls. Upon which King in a jocular manner said to Pendergrafs, 'I hope you will not be afraid of breaking the glass windows.' In the mean time Major Holmes was very diligent in getting ready Sir George Barclay's party. He sent Harris to Counter's lodgings, to receive orders; who told him, that he was to be of Rookwood's party; and Rookwood, being at the same time there, gave Harris a list of names, and told him laughing, 1695-6. that he would make him his Aid de Camp. In the list was Harri's own name, the names of Hare, Huntford, and Blackburn, with Captain Rookwood's name at the top. Then Rookwood desired him to get those men ready, which he did accordingly.

All things were now prepared, and the Conspirators ready to mount, and pass, to avoid observation, out of town by two or three in a company, and to quarter in the inns about Turnham-Green and Brentford, where they were billeted, and had orders to wait till the King's return from Richmond, and then to make their attack in the order agreed on. But on a sudden, to their mortification, notice was given, that the King did not go abroad that day. This account was given by Chambers to Charnock, and the news of it was likewise conveyed to Porter and his party. Soon after Kays came to them, who were now gone to dine at the Blue-Polls in Spring Garden, and told them, that the Guards were returned, and the King's coaches were come back to the Mause; and that it occasioned great wondering among the people, that the King should two Saturdays successively put off his diversion of hunting. This struck a sudden damp and consternation among the Conspirators, who now concluded their design was discovered, and every one began to think of providing for his own security. But, notwithstanding their danger, they did not part till they had drank several disloyal healths. Durant had given the same intelligence to Sir George Barclay, who, upon their information, sent word to his party, that the King, not intending to go abroad that day, there would be no occasion for their service; and soon after Sir George, looking on the design as at an end, took care to withdraw, and conceal himself.

As none of the Conspirators were seized, that night, they soon recovered their fright, and quieted themselves. But, the next night, a great many of them were taken in their beds, and, the day following, the whole discovery was laid before the Privy-council.

All this while King James was waiting at Calais for some tidings of that on which he chiefly depended; for, upon the first notice of the assassination, he was resolved to have set sail, many regiments being embarked, and the artillery and stores ordered on board: So near was the matter brought to a crisis, when it broke out by the discovery made by the persons above-named. Nay, so confident were they in France of a successful expedition, that the Duke of Orleans urged it as an argument to the Duke of Savoy to make his separate peace, before the total overthrow of the Confederates, which must of necessity attend the restoration of King James. Upon the first news of King James's coming to Calais, the Duke of Wurtemberg dispatched one of his Aids de Camp to King William; to give him notice of it, and to acquaint him, that the Duke had stopped all the ships in the harbour and canal of Ofend, as well as of Bruges, in order to transport the forces under his command for his service; and that, in case he did not quickly hear from him, he would run the hazard of bringing them over. This Messenger, narrowly escaping the French at sea, got to the English Court on February the 22d; and immediately after the King received other expresses from the Duke of Bavaria and Prince Vaudemont, who were then at Brussels. And now it appeared how fortunate it was that the winds had been so long at South-west, and had detained our ships in port (which had been much lamented) for by that means we had a great fleet at Spithead ready to sail: And we had another fleet, designed for the summer's service in our own seas, quite ready, though not yet manned. Many brave seamen, seeing the nation was in such visible danger, came out of their lurking-places, in which they were hiding themselves from the press, and offered their service; and all people shewed so much zeal, that, in three days, Russel, who was sent to command, stood over to the coast of France, with a fleet of above fifty men of war. The French were amazed at this; and, upon it, their ships drew so near their coasts, that he durst not follow them in such shallow water, but was contented with breaking their design, and driving them into their harbours. King James stayed for some weeks there. But, as the French said, his malignant star still blasted every project, that was formed for his service.

The Court of France was much out of countenance with this disappointment; for that King had ordered his design of invading England, to be communicated to all the Courts, in which he had Ministers: And they spoke of it with such an air of assurance, as gave violent presumptions, that the King of France knew of the conspiracy against the King's Person, and depended upon it; for indeed, without that, the design was impracticable, considering how great a fleet we had at Spithead; nor could any men of common sense have entertained a thought of it, but with a view of the confusion, into which the intended assassination must have cast us.

They went on in England seizing the Conspirators; and a proclamation was issued for apprehending those that absconded, with a promise of a thousand pounds reward, to such as should seize any of them, and the offer of a pardon to every Conspirator that should take any of the rest. This set all people at work, and in a few weeks most of them were apprehended (1). Only Barclay was not found, who had brought the Proclamation for taking the Conspirators.

(1) The Conspirators named in the proclamation were,

James Duke of Berwick,
Sir George Barclay, Major Lewis,
Captain George Porter,
Captain Stow,
Captain Walbank,
Captain James Courtney,
Lieutenant Sherburn, Brice Blaire,
—Dinant,
—Chambers,
—Beij,
George Higgins, and his two brothers, sons to
—Sir Thomas Higgins,
—Davis,
—Cardell Goodman,

—Cranburn,
—Kays,
—Pondgrafs,
—Bryerly,
—Trenwar,
Sir George Maxwell,
—Durant, a Flaming,
—Knightly,
Lieutenant King,
—Hobbes,
Sir William Perkins,
—Rookwood.

It is said, that more than one of the Conspirators shared the thousand pounds reward with their friends, who took them for that purpose, there not being evidence against them sufficient to convict them.

The military men would not engage on other terms; they thought, by the laws of war, they were bound to obey all orders, that run in a military stile, and no other; and so they imagined, that their part in it was as innocent, as the going on any desperate design, during a campaign: Many of them repined at the service, and wished that it had not been put on them; but, being commanded, they fancied that they were liable to no blame nor infamy, but ought to be treated as prisoners of war.

Immediately after the King's proclamation was published, George Harris, one of the persons, who was sent out of France by King James himself, to obey the orders of Sir George Barclay, and was actually engaged in the assassination, surrendered himself to Sir William Trumbull, and confessed the double design of the assassination and invasion, though he was not able to tell the particular circumstances, that attended them. Among those that were taken, Porter and Pendergrafs were brought in. Porter had been a vicious man, engaged in many ill things; and was very forward and furious in all their consultations: The Lord Cutts, who, as Captain of the Guards, was present, when the King examined Pendergrafs, but did not know his name, when he saw him brought in, pressed him to own himself, and the service he had already done; but he claimed the promise of not being forced to be a witness, and would say nothing: Porter was a man of pleasure, who loved not the hardships of a prison, and much less the solemnities of an execution; so he confessed all; and then Pendergrafs, who had his dependance on him, freely confessed likewise: He said, Porter was the man who had trusted him; he could not be an instrument to destroy him; yet he lay under no obligations to any others among them. Porter had been in the management of the whole matter: So he gave a very copious account of it all, from the first beginning. And now it appeared, that Pendergrafs had been but a very few days among them, and had seen very few of them; and that he came and discovered the conspiracy, the next day after it was opened to him.

When by these examinations the matter was clear and undeniable, the King communicated it, in the following speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

*The King's speech to the Parliament on account of the plot.
Feb. 24.
Tr. H. C.

I Am come hither this day upon an extraordinary occasion, which might have proved fatal, if it had not been disappointed by the singular mercy and goodness of God; and may now, by the continuance of the same providence, and our own prudent endeavours, be so improved, as to become a sufficient warning to us, to provide for our security against the pernicious practices and attempts of our enemies.

I have received several concurring informations of a design to assassinate me; and that our enemies, at the same time, are very forward in their preparations for a sudden invasion of this Kingdom; and have therefore thought it necessary to lose no time in acquainting my Parliament with those things, in which the safety of the Kingdom and the public welfare are so nearly concerned, that I assure myself, nothing will be omitted on your part, which may be thought proper for our present security.

I have not been wanting to give the necessary orders for the fleet; and I hope we have such a strength of ships, and in such readiness, as will be sufficient to disappoint the intentions of our enemies.

I have also dispatched orders for bringing home such a number of our troops, as may secure us from any attempt.

Some of the Conspirators against my person are already in custody; and care is taken to apprehend so many of the rest, as are discovered; and such other orders are given, as the present exigency of affairs does absolutely require at this time for the public safety.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

Having now acquainted you with the danger, which hath threatened us, I cannot doubt of your readiness and zeal to do every thing, which you shall judge proper for our common safety. And I persuade myself, we must be all sensible how necessary it is in our present circumstances, that all possible dispatch should be given to the business before us.

Upon this the two Houses immediately agreed to wait on the King, that very evening, at Kensington with this address.

Die Lune 24 Feb. 1695.

WE your Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, having taken into our serious consideration what your Majesty hath been pleased to communicate to us this day, think it our duty, in the first place, to give your Majesty most humble thanks for having acquainted your Parliament with the great danger your Sacred Person hath been so nearly exposed to, and the design of an invasion from our enemies abroad. We heartily congratulate your Majesty's happy preservation, and thankfully acknowledge the signal providence of God in it; and at the same time declare our detestation and abhorrence of so villainous and barbarous a design. And, since the safety and welfare of your Majesty's dominions do so entirely depend upon your life, we most humbly beseech your Majesty to take more than ordinary care of your Royal Person. And we take this occasion to assure your Majesty of our utmost assistance to defend your Person, and support your Government against the late King James, and all your other enemies, both at home and abroad; hereby declaring to all the world, that, in case your Majesty should come to any violent death (which God forbid!) we will revenge the same upon all your enemies and their ' zeal for your Majesty's service; we will give

' all possible dispatch to the public business.
' And we make it our desire to your Majesty ' to seize and secure all persons, horses, and ' arms, that your Majesty may think fit to ap' prehend upon this occasion.'

To this address the King answered:

' My Lords and Gentlemen,

' I thank you heartily for this kind address.
' On my part you may be assured, that I will ' do all, that is within my power, for the con' servation of this Kingdom, to which I have ' so many obligations. I will readily adven' ture my life, for the preservation of it, and ' recommend myself to the continuance of your
' loyalty and good affection.'

The same day the Commons ordered a bill to be brought in, to empower his Majesty to secure and detain all such persons, as he should suspect were conspiring against his Person and Government; as also a bill, that, whenever it should please God to afflict these realms by the death of his present Majesty, the Parliament then in being should not be dissolved thereby, but should continue until the next heir to the Crown in succession, according to the act of Parliament, should dissolve the same; and, if there should be no Parliament then in being, that the last preceding Parliament should immediately convene and sit. As the Parliament thus wisely provided against that confusion and disorder, which might happen by the cessation of Parliaments, and all Commissions, on the King's decease; so nothing could have been imagined more effectual for the security of the King's life against the malice and violence of his enemies; since by this means all hopes of escape and impunity were cut off, in case they should succeed in their attempts. They likewise voted an address to his Majesty, to desire him to issue his Royal proclamation to banish all Papists from the cities of London and Westminster, and ten miles from the same; and that he would give instructions to the Judges going the circuits, to put the laws in execution against Papists and Nonjurors. And, as the greatest test of their loyalty, they drew up this form of Association, to be subscribed by all the Members.

An Association signed by the Commons. Pr. H. C. III. 21.

' Whereas there has been a horrid and detestable conspiracy formed and carried on by
' Papists and other wicked and traitorous persons, for assassinating his Majesty's Royal
' Person, in order to encourage an invasion
' from France, to subvert our religion, laws,
' and liberty; We, whose names are hereunto
' subscribed, do heartily, sincerely, and so' lemnly profess, testify, and declare, that his ' present Majesty King William is rightful and ' lawful King of these realms: And we do
' mutually promise to engage to stand by and ' assist each other to the utmost of our power,
' in the support and defence of his Majesty's ' most Sacred Person and Government, against
' the late King James and all his adherents.
' And in case his Majesty come to any violent ' or untimely death (which God forbid!) we ' do hereby further freely and unanimously
No. 21. Vol. III.

1695-6. ' oblige ourselves to unite, associate, and stand
' by each other, in revenging the same upon ' his enemies and their adherents, and in sup' porting and defending the succession of the ' Crown, according to an act made in the first ' year of the reign of King William and Queen
' Mary, intituled, An act declaring the rights
' and liberties of the Subject, and settling the suc- ' cession of the Crown.'

This Association was the three following days signed by all the Members, who came to the House; and, because some others had absented themselves upon pretence of health or business, but in reality to avoid setting their hands to the Association, it was ordered, on the 27th of February, ' That such Members, who had not ' already, should in sixteen days sign it, or de' clare their refusal, notwithstanding their leave
' to be absent.' On the appointed day, March 16, the names of such Members were called over, as were absent upon the last call of the House; and, several of them being still absent, the Speaker was ordered to write to those, who were in the country, and had not signed the Association, or declared their refusal to do so, to know what they would do, and return their answer by the first opportunity; and at the same time the Clerk of the House was ordered to attend such Members, as were ill in town, with the Association, in order to their signing the same, or receiving their answer or refusal. The absent Members seeing themselves so pressed, and the nation at this time in so great a ferment against the disaffected, thought it prudent to yield to the times, and either to subscribe the Association, or promise to do it upon their first coming up to town, though it were against their principles to own King William to be rightful and lawful King. However, the Association was on the 3d of April presented to the King by the Commons in a body, with this request, ' That ' his Majesty would order both that, and all ' other Associations by the Commons of Eng- ' land, to be lodged among the records in the ' Tower, there to remain as a perpetual memo' rial of their loyalty and affection to his Ma' jesty.' Whereupon the King told them,
' That he took this as a most convincing and ' acceptable evidence of their affection. And,
' as they had freely associated themselves for ' his and their common safety, he did heartily
' enter into the same Association, and would be ' always ready with them, and the rest of his ' good subjects, to venture his life against all,
' who should endeavour to subvert the religion,
' laws, and liberties of England.' And he prom' ised them, that this, and all other Associations, should be lodged among the records in the Tower. The next day, the Commons made a resolution, ' That whoever should by word or ' writing affirm, that an Association entered in-
' to by any Member of this House, or any ' other person, was illegal, such person should ' be deemed a promoter of the designs of the ' late King James, and an enemy to the laws
' and liberties of this Kingdom.'

The Lords resolved on an Association as well as the Commons. The motion was much opposed by the Earl of Nottingham, as that of the Commons had been by Sir Edward Seymour and Mr Finch. Their objections turned chiefly upon this, that rightful and lawful were words, N n n

1695-6, that had been laid aside in the beginning of this reign; that they imported one, who was King by descent, and so could not belong to the present King. They said, that the Crown and the Prerogatives of it were vested in him, and therefore they would obey him, and be faithful to him, though they could not acknowledge him their rightful and lawful King. Great exceptions were also taken to the word revenge, as not of an evangelical sound; but that word was so explained, that these were soon cleared. Revenge was to be meant in a legal sense, either in the prosecution of justice at home, or of war abroad. And the same word had been used in that Association, into which the nation entered, when it was apprehended, that Queen Elizabeth's life was in danger by the practices of the Queen of Scots. At last the Association was carried in the House of Lords, with this difference from that of the Commons, that, instead of the words rightful and lawful King, these words were inserted, 'That King William hath the right by law to the Crown of these realms; and that neither King James, nor the pretended Prince of Wales, nor any other person, hath any right whatsoever to the same.' This was done to satisfy those, who said, they could not come up to the words rightful and lawful. And, the Earl of Rochester offering these words, they were thought to answer the ends of the Association, and so were agreed to. Ninety-two only of the Commons, and fifteen of the Peers, refused to sign voluntarily (1).

The Association signed all over England.

An act to enforce the signing of it. Pr. H. C. III. 23.

The Association was carried from the Houses of Parliament over all England, and was signed by all sorts of people, very few only excepted. The Bishops also drew up a form for the Clergy, according to that signed by the House of Lords, with some small variation; which was so universally signed, that not above an hundred over all England refused it.

Soon after this a bill was brought into the House of Commons, declaring all men incapable of public trust, or to serve in Parliament, who did not sign the Association. This passed with no considerable opposition; for those, who had signed it of their own accord, were not unwilling to have it made general; and such as had refused it, when it was voluntary, were resolved to sign it, as soon as the law should be made for it. This bill was intitled a bill for the better security of his Majesty's Person and Government, and contained these heads: First, 'That such, as should refuse to take the oaths to his Majesty, should be subject to the forfeitures and penalties of Popish recusants convicted.' Secondly, 'To inflict a penalty on such, as should by writing or otherwise declare, that King William was not lawful and rightful King of these realms; or that the late King James, or the pretended Prince of Wales, or any other person, than according to the act of settlement of the Crown, had any right to the Crown of these realms.' Thirdly, 'To ratify and confirm the Association entered in to by all his Majesty's good subjects, for the preservation of his Majesty's Person and Government.' Fourthly, 'That no person should be capable of any office or post of trust, civil or military, who should not sign the Association.' And, Fifthly, 'That the same penalties be inflicted on such as come out of France, as upon those, that go thither.'

About the same time an order passed in Council for reviewing all the commissions in England, and for turning out of them all those, who had not signed the Association, while it was voluntary; since this seemed to be such a declaration of their principles and affections, that it was not thought reasonable, that such persons should be any longer either Justices of peace, or Deputy-Lieutenants.

The Session of Parliament was soon brought to a conclusion. A fund was created, upon which the sum of 2,564,000*l.* was to be raised, which the best judges did apprehend was neither just nor prudent. A new Bank was proposed, called the Land-bank, because the securities were to be upon land: This was the main difference between it, and the Bank of England: And, by reason of this, it was pretended, that it was not contrary to a clause in the act for that Bank, that no other Bank should be set up in opposition to it. There was a set of undertakers, who engaged that it should prove effectual, for the money for which it was given: This was chiefly managed by Foley, Harley, and the Tories; it was much laboured by the Earl of Sunderland; and the King was prevailed on to consent to it, or rather to desire it, though he was then told by many, of what ill consequence it would prove to his affairs: The Earl of Sunderland's excuse for himself, when the error appeared afterwards but too evidently, was, that he thought it would engage the Tories in interest to support the Government (2).

The Commons resolved, First, 'That a fund redeemable by Parliament be settled in a national Land-bank, to be raised by new subscriptions.' Secondly, 'That no person be concerned in the Bank of England, and in the national Land-bank, at the same time.' Thirdly, 'That the duties upon coals and culm, and upon tonnage of ships,' (which by several petitions and 1696. The most remarkable acts passed this Session, besides what have been mentioned, are these:

Am: passed this Session. A severe act was passed, for voiding all the elections of Parliament-men, where the elected had been at any expence in meat, drink, or money to procure votes. This act was strictly penned. Abuses in elections were grown to most intolerable excesses, which threatened even the ruin of the nation.

Another act passed against unlawful and double returns; for persons had been often returned, plainly contrary to the vote of the majority; and in Boroughs, where there was a contest, between the select number of the Corporation, and the whole Populace, both sides had obtained favourable decisions, as that side prevailed, on which the person elected happened to be; so both elections were returned, and the House judged the matter. But, by this act, all returns were ordered to be made, according to the last determination of the House of Commons: These were thought good securities for future Parliaments. Happy had it been for this nation, if the other act, against bribing at elections, had proved as effectual as this was.

An act, for the more easy recovery of small tithes, was also passed for three years, but made perpetual afterwards by Queen Anne.

To prevent marriages without licence or banns, an act was passed, by which the Minister, in such case, forfeits 100*l.* and the person so married, 10*l.* This was chiefly with a view to secure the stamp-money. For, upon every licence or certificate of marriage, there was a duty laid of five shillings.

It was customary in Wales, for widows and younger children, to claim a share of their husbands and fathers effects, called their reasonable part, notwithstanding these effects were otherwise disposed of by will or deed. As this occasioned great troubles, disputes, and expences, an act was now passed, abolishing that custom, and enabling the inhabitants of Wales to dispose of all their personal estate, as they shall think fit. 1696.

Though an act was passed this Session, for the further regulating elections of Members of Parliament, and preventing the irregular proceedings of Sheriffs and other officers elected, and in returning such Members: Yet another bill was brought in to regulate elections, which passed both Houses, but to which the King refused to give the Royal assent. Upon this, the Commons shewed some resentment against those that advised the King not to pass the bill, and, on the 24th of April, the question was put, that whosoever advised his Majesty, not to give his assent to that bill, was an enemy to his country. But, as it was perceived, by the warmth of those that were for the affirmative, that it was intended to make a difference between the King and Parliament, a negative was put upon the question by one hundred and forty-nine voices, two hundred and nineteen to seventy; however it was ordered, that the Speaker should with the votes print the question, together with the names on both sides (1).

Three days after, the King came and closed the Session, with the following speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

‘YOU have shewn so great concern for my Person, and zeal for my Government, and have done so much for the preservation of the one, and for the strengthening of the other, by the good laws, which have been made, and by the supplies you have provided for the several occasions of this year, that the late designs of our enemies are, by the blessing of God, like to have no other effect, than to let them see, how firmly we are united; and to give me occasion to acknowledge your kindness, and to assure you of all the returns, which a Prince can make to his people.’

The Royal assent denied to a bill about elections.

Secondly, That a duty be laid upon tobacco-pipes: And, Thirdly, That a further duty be laid upon all stone and earthen ware. Which resolutions were ordered to be inserted in the bill for settling the national Land-bank. Accordingly, the act was passed under the title of an act, continuing to his Majesty certain duties upon salt, glass wares, stone and earthen wares, and for granting several duties upon tobacco-pipes and other earthen wares, for carrying on the war with France, and for establishing a national Land-bank, and for taking off the duties upon tonnage of ships, and upon coals. The subscription was to be 2,564,000*l.* for the interest of which at 7 per cent. was to be raised, out of the above-said duties, 179,480*l.* This Bank was to lend out 500,000*l.* a year upon land securities, at 3*l.* 10*s.* per cent. per annum. In case the subscription was not full by the 1st of August 1696, the Bank was to cease and determine.

(1) Besides this bill, there were others that were begun, but not finished, as a bill for regulating printing and printing-presses. Secondly, A bill for reversing a judgment given against Sir William Williams, 2 Jac. Fourthly, Another to regulate the trade of Africa. Fifthly, A bill to confirm the Earl of Torrington's grant. Sixthly, Two bills to vest in the Crown all forfeited estates in England and Ireland, and to vacate all grants made thereof. Seventhly, A bill to prevent stock-jobbing. And, Eighthly, A bill for preventing Papists from disinheriting their Protestant heirs.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The necessity of affairs requiring my absence out of the Kingdom for some time, I do earnestly recommend to you, that in your stat ons you will be assisting to those, whom I shall leave to administer the Government; and that you will be careful in preserving the public peace of the Kingdom.'

Then the Lord Keeper, by his Majesty's command, prorogued the Parliament till Tuesday the 16th day of June.

*The Conspirators

Thus ended this memorable Session. After most of the Conspirators, who had not fled beyond sea, were either taken or come in voluntarily, and all the examinations were over, some of them were brought to their trials. Mr Robert Charnock was begun with. He was one of the two Fellows of Magdalen College, who in King James's time had turned Papist, and was a hot and active agent amongst them. He was a man of good parts, and, next to Sir George Barclay, was the chief manager and promoter of the intended assassination. This was so fully proved against him, that he was found guilty. He shewed great presence of mind, with temper and good judgment, and made as strong a defence as the matter could bear. Endeavours were used to persuade him to confess all he knew; for he had been in all the plots from the beginning. His brother was employed to deal with him, and he seemed to be once in suspense; but the next time, that his brother came to him, he said, that he could not save his own life, without doing that, which would take away the lives of so many, that he did not think his own life worth it. This shewed a greatness of mind, which had been very valuable, had it been better directed. Thus this matter was understood at that time. But, many years after, the Lord Somers gave Bishop Burnet a very different account of it. Charnock, it seems, sent an offer to the King, of a full discovery of all the consultations and designs of his party, and desired no pardon, but only that he might live in some easy prison; and, if he was found to prevaricate in any part of his discovery, he would look for the execution of the sentence. But the King apprehended, that so many persons would be found concerned, and thereby be rendered desperate, that he was afraid to have such a scene opened, and would not accept of his offer. With Charnock were tried Lieutenant King, and Thomas Keys, formerly a Trumpeter, and lately Captain Porter's servant, who had little to say for themselves; so that, upon a full hearing of the evidence, they were all three found guilty of high-treason, and executed at Tyburn on the 18th of March. Before the executioner did his office, the malefactors delivered each a paper to the Sheriffs, wherein they confessed the crime which they were accused of, but endeavoured to palliate it, and at the same time to justify both King James, the Jacobites, and Roman Catholics. Charnock particularly owned, 'That, to facilitate King James's invasion of England, himself and some others did agree to attack the Prince of Orange, and his Guards. That, as for any Order or Commission of King James's for assassinating the Prince of Orange, he neither saw nor heard of any, but had had frequent assurances of that King's having rejected such proposals, when they had been offered. That he had heard, there was a Commission arrived for levying of war, which it was natural to believe, if the King was in such readiness to come over, as was reported; but that he never saw it. And, as to what regarded the body of the Roman Catholics, he must do them the justice, that they had no manner of knowledge of this design, nor did he believe it was communicated to any other party of such as were reputed the King's friends, but carried on merely by a small number, without the advice, consent, or privity of any parties whatsoever.' King's paper was to the same purpose: But the way, that they took to vindicate King James, rather fastened the imputation more upon him. They did not deny, that he had sent over a Commission to attack the Prince of Orange, which, as Porter deposed, Charnock told him he had seen. If this had been denied by a dying man, his last words would have been of some weight. But, instead of denying that, which was sworn, he only denied, that King James had given a Commission for assassination. And it seems, great weight was laid on that word; for all the Conspirators agreed in it, and denied, that King James had given a Commission to assassinate the Prince of Orange. This was an odious word, and perhaps no person was ever so wicked, as to order such a thing in so crude a manner. But the sending a Commission to attack the King's person was the same thing upon the matter, and was all that the witnesses had deposed. Therefore their not denying this in the terms, in which the witnesses swore it, plainly implied a confession, that it was true. But some, who had a mind to deceive themselves or others, laid hold on this, and made great use of it, that dying men had acquitted King James of the assassination. Such slight colours will serve, when people are engaged beforehand to believe as their affections lead them.

The next, who were tried, found guilty, Perkins condemned, and executed on the 3d of April for the same complicated crime of the assassination and invasion, were Sir John Freind, and Sir William Perkins. Freind had risen from mean beginnings to great credit and much wealth. He was employed by King James, and had all this while adhered firmly to his interests. His purse was more considered than his head, and was open on all occasions, as the party applied to him. While Colonel Parker was formerly in the Tower (as has been related), upon information of an assassination of the King designed by him, he furnished the money, that corrupted the keepers, and helped him to make his escape. He knew of the assassination, though he was not to be an actor in it. But he had a commission for raising a regiment for King James, and he had entertained and paid the officers, who were to serve under him. He also joined with those, who had sent over Charnock in May 1695, with the message to King James. Upon all this evidence, Freind was condemned. Sir William Perkins was a Gentleman of estate, who had gone violently into the passions and interests of the Court in King Charles II's time: He was one of the six Clerks in Chancery, and took all the oaths to the Government, rather than

He not only consented to the design of the assassination, but undertook to bring five men, who should assist in it; and he had brought up horses for that service, from the country; but had not named the persons; so that this lay yet in his own breast. He was not to have acted in the business himself, for he had likewise a commission for a regiment, and therefore was to have reserved himself for that service. He had also provided a stock of arms, which were hid under-ground, and were now discovered. Upon this evidence he was condemned. Great endeavours were used both with Sir John Freind and him to confess all they knew. Freind was more sullen, as he knew less; for he was only applied to and trusted, when they wanted his money. Perkins fluctuated more; he confessed the whole thing, for which he was condemned, but would not name the five persons, whom he was to have sent in to assist in the assassination. He said, that he had engaged them in it, and therefore could not think of saving his own life by destroying theirs. He confessed, that he had seen King James's Commission. The words differed a little from those, which Porter had mentioned; but Porter did not swear, that he saw it himself, and only related what Charnock had told him concerning it. Yet Perkins said, they were to the same effect. He believed, it was all writ with King James's own hand, he having seen his writing often. He owned, that he had raised and maintained a regiment, but he thought he could not swear against his officers, since he himself had drawn them into the service; and he affirmed, that he knew nothing of the other regiments. He sent for the Bishop of Ely, to whom he repeated all these particulars, and seemed much troubled with a sense of his former life, which had been very irregular. The House of Commons sent some to examine him; but he gave them so little satisfaction, that they left him to the course of the law. His tenderness, in not accusing those whom he had drawn in, was so generous, that this alone served to create some regard for a man, who had been long under a bad character. In the beginning of April, Freind and he were executed together. At their execution, they delivered their confessions to the Sheriffs. Sir John Freind, though he denied his knowledge of the invasion and assassination, yet seemed to own himself guilty, in endeavouring to justify himself by saying, 'That the cause, he suffered for, he firmly believed to be the cause of God and true religion, and agreeable to the laws of the land, which he had ever heard to require a firm duty and allegiance. That as no foreign, so neither any domestic power can alienate our allegiance; for it was altogether new and unintelligible to him, that the King's subjects can depose and dethrone him on any account, or constitute any, that have not an immediate right to his place; and that, as they ought not to do this, so, when it was done, to assist him in the recovery of his right was justifiable, and their duty. He professed himself a Member of the Church of England, which he heartily besought God Almighty to bless and preserve; to deliver this sinful nation from the guilt of rebellion, blood, and perjury; to comfort the distressed King, restore him to his right, and his misled subjects to their No. 21. Vol. III.

allegiance; and to bless his Royal Consort 1696. and his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, that he might grow in stature and in favour with God and man.' Sir William Perkins confessed, 'That he was privy to a design upon the Prince of Orange, but was not to act in it; and he was fully satisfied, that very few or none knew of it, but those, who undertook to do it. That he had seen a Commission from King James to levy war against the Prince of Orange; but, as for any Commission particularly levelled against his Person, he neither saw nor heard of any such. That he thought it for his honour to say, he was entirely in the interest of King James, being always firmly persuaded of the justice of his cause, and looked upon it as his duty, both as a subject and an Englishman, to assist him in the recovery of his Throne, which he believed his Majesty to be deprived of, contrary to all right and justice; in which opinion he took the laws and constitution of his country for his guide. And, lastly, that he died in the communion of the Church of England, in which he was educated.' A very remarkable instance of the boldness of the Jacobites, They are appeared on this occasion. Freind and Perkins publicly absolved. had not changed their religion, but still called themselves Protestants; so three of the Non-juring Clergymen, Mr Collier, Mr Snatt, and Mr Cooke, waited on them to the place of execution; where they all three joined to give them the absolution of the Church, as it stands in the office of visitation of the sick, and accompanied the ceremony with a solemn imposition of hands. The Court was extremely offended at this conduct of theirs, which seemed to justify the conspiracy, since the dying persons owned the ill designs, in which they had engaged, and expressed no sort of repentance for it. Fourteen of the Bishops therefore, who happened to be then in London, published a declaration, 'wherein they censured the performance of this office of the Church, without a previous confession made, and abhorrence expressed by the prisoners of the heinous crime, for which they died, as extremely insolent and without precedent in the manner, and altogether irregular in the thing, being a manifest transgression of the Church's order, and profane abuse of the authority of Christ, since Mr Collier, and Mr Snatt, and Mr Cooke must either look on the persons absolved as impenitents or martyrs.' The Lord Chief Holt, likewise on the 7th of April, represented to the Grand Jury, in the Court of King's-Bench, the pernicious practices of those three absolving Priests, and the Jury delivered a presentment against them, setting forth, That they were enemies to his Majesty and his Government, promoters and encouragers of the assassination and invasion, and a scandal to the Church. But though a bill of high misdemeanour was found against them, and Cooke and Snatt were committed to Newgate; yet, through the lenity of this reign, no manner of punishment was inflicted on them; and Jeremy Collier, who kept out of the way, with great assurance published several papers, wherein he endeavoured to justify his practice, with respect to manner, form, and occasion.

On the 21st of April, Brigadier Rookwood, Apr. 21. Major Lowick, and Mr Charles Cranburn, three Burnet.

1696. other Conspirators, were brought to their trial, and were the first, who had the benefit of the statute made this very Session, to regulate trials in cases of high-treason. But neither the copy of the indictment, which was delivered to them, nor the advantage of being defended by Sir Bartholomew Shower, and two other eminent Lawyers, did avail them much; for the evidence against them was so plain and positive, that they were all three found guilty, and received sentence accordingly. Roskwood and Lewick were Papists; they expressed their dislike of the design, but insisted on this, that, as military men, they were bound to obey all military orders; and they thought that the King, who knew the laws of war, ought to have regard to this, and forgive them. Great intercession was made by some Noblemen for the life of Lewick, but in vain. Cranburn called himself a Protestant, but was more sullen than the other two; to such a degree of fury and perverseness had the Jacobites wrought up their party. They were all three executed on the 29th of April.

Mr Knighly and Mr Cooke (son of Sir Miles Cooke, one of the six Clerks in Chancery) were the two last that were tried this year. Knighly confessed all, and upon that, though he was condemned, he had a reprieve, and was afterwards pardoned. Cooke was tried on account of the intended invasion; for he was not charged with the assassination. His trial was considered as introductory to that of the Earl of Aylesbury (who had been committed to the Tower) for the evidence was the same as to both. Porter and Goodman were two witnesses against him. They had been with him at a meeting in a Tavern in Leadenhall-Street, where Charnock received instructions to go to France with the message to King James. All, that was brought against this, was, that the master of the Tavern, and two of his servants, swore, that they remembered well when that company was at the Tavern, for they were often coming into the room where they sat, both at dinner-time, and after it; and that they saw not Goodman there; nay, they were positive, that he was not there. On the other hand, Porter deposed, that Goodman was not with them at dinner, but that he came to that house after dinner, and sent him in a note; upon which he, with the consent of the company, went out and brought him in. And then it was certain, that the servants of the house were not in that constant attendance; nor could they be believed in a negative, against positive evidence to the contrary. Their credit was not such, but that it might be well supposed, that, for the interest of their house, they might be induced to make stretches. The evidence was believed, and Cooke was found guilty, and condemned. He obtained many short reprieves, upon assurances, that he would tell all he knew. But it was visible, that he did not deal sincerely, and his punishment ended in a banishment.

As soon as the news came to Flanders, that the conspiracy was happily discovered, the King safe, and England freed from the apprehensions of an invasion, the Prince of Vaudemont and the other Generals bethought themselves of making some attempt, by way of revenge, upon the French, for their intended invasion of England. In order to which, having drawn together a body of troops from several garrisons, the Earl of Atblone, and Lieutenant-General Coborn marched from Namur with forty squadrons, thirteen battalions, fifteen pieces of cannon, and six mortars. While the Earl, with the greatest part of these forces, invested Dinant, Coborn advanced with the rest of the troops and all the artillery to Givet, where the enemy had laid up a large magazine; and, having got his batteries in readiness by the 16th in the morning, he began to fire into the town with bombs and red-hot bullets, which set both the forage and houses on fire. At the same time a detachment of soldiers were commanded to enter the town with large flambeaux in their hands; which they performed with great bravery, firing the cazerns and granaries, where the oats and other magazines lay; so that the whole town and magazine were entirely consumed; and all this executed with the inconsiderable loss of nine or ten men.

Not long after Sir Cloudfly Shovel sailed out of the Downs with several men of war and bomb-vessels, and being come to Calais on the 3d of April, Captain Benbow, notwithstanding the vigorous opposition from the enemies boats and half-gallies, threw between three and four hundred bombs, most of which fell in the town, and among the imbarcations in the pier, and set fire to the town in three or four places, and to some vessels in the port. Though the success of this bombardment did not answer either the experience or expectation of the English, yet the damage was not so inconsiderable as the French gave out; it being certain, that several houses were burnt and spoiled, besides the Church and Convent and some part of the cazerns (1).

The Republic of Venice was the last of the States in Europe, not engaged in the war against England, that would acknowledge King William. After Russel had appeared with a great fleet in the Mediterranean, and the Republic saw a general peace could not be far off, they thought of sending an embassy to London. On the 11th of April this year, arrived, as Ambassadors Extraordinary from that State, Signior Soranzo and Signior Venier, and, after making a splendid entry on the 22d, they had their first public audience the 1st of May. Soranzo the eldest of the Ambassadors was knighted, and, according to the custom on the like occasion, the King presented him with his sword.

Before the King went abroad, he conferred the following honours and preferments.

George Hamilton, third son of Duke Hamilton, for his military services in Ireland and Flanders, was created Earl of Orkney, in the Kingdom of Scotland.

Sir John Lowther, on the 1st of May, was created Baron Lowther of Lowther, and Viscount Lowdale in the County of Westmoreland; and the same day Sir John Thompson, Bart. was raised to the dignity of a Baron of this Kingdom by the stile and title of Baron of Haversham.

(1) It is remarkable, that the French have raised a cross and oratory near a shell, which to this day sticks in the market-place at Calais, says Byer, Vol. III. p. 172.

At the same time his Majesty constituted Sir Thomas Littleton one of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury; Mr Christopher Musgrave, Clerk of the Ordnance; and Mr James Lowther, Clerk of the Delivery of the Ordnance; and conferred the honour of Knighthood on Theodore Jansen, an eminent Merchant of the City of London, for the zeal, which he had on all occasions expressed for the Government, particularly in the business of the Bank of England. Not long after the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, or the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President of the Privy-council, the first Commissioner of the Treasury, or Lord Treasurer, the first Commissioner of the Admiralty, or Lord Admiral, the two Principal Secretaries of State, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the time being, and the Earls of Bridgewater and Tankerville, Sir Philip Meadows, William Blaitwayte, John Pollexfen, John Locke, Abraham Hill, and John Meibum, Esquires, were declared Commissioners of trade and plantations. Mr Poype was made Secretary to this Board.

The King goes abroad.

On the 1st of May, the King declared in Council, that he had appointed the same persons to administer the Government during his absence, who had discharged that trust the last year. The next day the King went from Kenington to Margate, and on the 3d of May embarked on board his yacht for Holland; but, the wind, which was then South South-east, turning in the evening to the Eastward, and there being an appearance of a storm, he came on shore again. Two days after, the wind being more favourable and the weather fair, he went on board the Elizabeth, Vice-admiral Aylmer Commander, and on the 7th landed at Orange-Polder, and about midnight arrived at the Hague.

Campaign abroad, chiefly carried on. Burnet. Boyer.

The summer passed over, both in Flanders and on the Rhine, without any action. The discovery of the plot, and the proceedings of the Parliament upon it, took up so much time, that the King could not prevent the enemies taking the field before him. But the common scarcity of money kept both armies quiet. All the funds given for this year's service proved defective, but that of the Land-bank failed totally; and the credit of the Bank of England was much shaken. About five millions of clipped money was brought into the Exchequer; and the loss that the nation suffered, by the re-coining of the money, amounted to two millions, and two hundred thousand pounds. The coinage was carried on with all possible haste; about eighty thousand pounds was coined every week: Yet still this was slow, and the new money was generally kept up; so that, for several months, little of it appeared. This stop, in the free circulation of money, put the nation into great disorder: Those who, according to the act of Parliament, were to have the first payments in milled money, for the loans they had made, kept their specie up, and would not let it go, but at an unreasonable advantage. The King had no money to pay his army, so they were in great distress, which they bore with wonderful patience: By this means, the King could undertake nothing, and was forced to lie on the defensive: Nor were the French strong enough to make an impression in any place; the King had a mighty army, and was much superior to the enemy, yet he could do nothing;

and it passed for a happy campaign, because the French were not able to take any advantage from those ill accidents, that our want of specie brought us under; which indeed were such, that nothing but the sense, all had of the late conspiracy, kept us quiet and free from tumults. It now appeared, what a strange error the King was led into, when he accepted of so great a sum, to be raised by a Land bank: It was scarce honourable, and not very safe at any time; but it might have proved fatal at a time, in which, money was like to be much wanted, which want would have been less felt, if paper credit had been kept up: But one Bank working against another, and the Goldsmiths against both, put us to great straits: Yet the Bank supplied the King in this extremity, and thereby convinced him, that they were his friends in affection, as well as interest.

On the other hand, France was very uneasy under so long and so destructive a war. The country was exhausted, and they had neither men nor money. Their trade was sunk to nothing, and public credit was lost. The creation of new offices, which always was considered as a resource never to be exhausted, did not work as formerly: Few buyers or undertakers appeared. The French King's health was thought declining; he affected secrecy and retirement; so that both the temper of his mind, and the state of his affairs, disposed him to desire a peace. Accordingly, this summer he made some steps towards it; and the straits, to which both armies were reduced, seemed to favour his negotiations. Before the King's arrival at the Hague, Monsieur Callieres was sent with propositions to the States, for settling the preliminaries of a treaty, at the same time that d'Avaux was pressing the King of Sweden to offer his mediation. The King of France addressed himself first to the Dutch, because he supposed, that they could not but be weary of a tedious war, which had almost ruined their trade, the only source of their riches, and even subsistence, and would therefore sooner hearken to peace, than either the Emperor or the King of England. It is true, the Hollanders had an absolute dependence upon his Britannic Majesty, not only because he was their Stadtholder, but also because, since their first settlement, they always found it, and esteemed it their interest to keep closely united to England, in order to maintain a balance between the Houses of Bourbon and Austria, and preserve themselves from being crushed by either. Yet, as the French King was at last resolved to acknowledge King William, (which resolution he took soon after the intended invasion miscarried) so he believed, that the Dutch would not coldly entertain the proposals, which he designed to make them, since, by removing this great obstacle, the way seemed to lie open to a general peace.

The States of Holland finding by the French King's proposals, and his offers to deliver up so many places, that there was room for an honourable and lasting peace, they gave Callieres a favourable reception, but yet refused either to grant him a passport, except by the concurring allowance of King William, or to treat without His and the consent of their other Allies. This was no more than Callieres expected; for though, at the treaty of Nimeguen, the French Plenipotentiaries found a way to draw the Dutch to a

1696. separate peace, by making them jealous of the Prince of Orange; yet he was persuaded, that the Hollanders were by this time too sensible of their former mistake, to suffer the French to play the same game over again. However, Callieres having positive orders from his Master not to acknowledge King William, till he had good assurances of the peace, he found out an expedient, which was, that the States and he should not come to a final conclusion; but, if they found reason to agree upon any point, that the same should be communicated to their Allies. To this the Dutch readily consented; and, amongst other particulars, demanded, as preliminaries of the treaty, the restitution of Lorrain, and of the towns of Strasburg and Luxemburg. Callieres granted both in his Master's name, but, upon condition, that Lorrain should be restored to the Duke of that name, on such terms only as had been agreed to at Nimwegen. This was opposed by the President Canon, who took care of the Duke of Lorrain's interests in Holland, under pretence, that, when his Master entered into the grand Alliance, the Confederates engaged never to conclude a peace, till he had full satisfaction done him; urging, that, if the Duke's dominions were not restored to him, but upon the terms of the peace of Nimwegen, he should rather be a loser than a gainer by the Confederacy, since he could have made a better bargain with the French King, before he entered into the war. But as, in most alliances, great Potentates seldom regard the concerns of those petty Princes, whom they have engaged in their quarrel, when they have no more need of them; so the Allies, after they had spoken once or twice in the Duke of Lorrain's behalf, did not think fit to insist any longer upon that affair; though Canon gave in several memorials, which were some time supported by the Imperial Ministers, whose Master was desirous to prolong the conclusion of the treaty. On the other hand, that spirit of chicanery, and injustice, that had reigned so long in the French Court, still appeared in every step, that was taken towards a treaty; for they made use of equivocal terms in every paper, which was offered in their name. The States-General had felt the effects of these in former treaties too sensibly, not to be now on their guard against them. But the French still returned to them; and, when some points seemed to be quite settled, new difficulties were still thrown in. It was urged by them, that the Popish religion must still continue at Strasburg; and that the King of France could not in conscience yield that point. It was also pretended, that Luxemburg was to be restored in the same state, in which it was when the French took it. These variations did almost break off the negotiation; but the French would not let it fall, and yielded them up again. So that it was visible all this was only an amusement, and an artifice, by this shew of peace, to get the Parliament of England to declare for it; since, as a trading nation must grow weary of a war, so the party, which they had among the English, would join in with the inclination, that was now become general, to promote the peace. For, though our affairs were in all respects, except that of the coin, in so good a condition, that the nation felt itself grow richer by the war, yet, during each campaign, we ran a greater risk than our enemies did; for all our preservation hung on the single thread of the King's life, and on that prospect the party, that were averie to the Government, had great hopes, and acted with much spirit during the war, which there was great reason to think must sink with a peace.

To make the Spaniards the more willing to put an end to the war, the Duke of Vendosme, who this year commanded the French forces in Catalonia, resolved to make them feel the power of his Master's arms, by attacking them in their camp near Ostalrick. In order to this he passed the river Ter, and understanding, that the Spanish civility, commanded by the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, had advanced out of the lines to observe him, fell upon them with great vigour. The Spaniards, seeing none but horse appear against them, resolutely stood their ground, and forced some of the French squadrons to retire. But, when they saw the number of the enemy increase, and a strong body of infantry come up to support them, they retreated in very good order under the cannon planted on their lines; where the French, eager of pursuit, met with such a warm reception, as quickly obliged them to retire in their turn. In this action the Spaniards lost near three hundred men, and the French about two hundred. Both the King and Queen of Spain were about this time so ill, that, as is usual upon such occasions, it was suspected they were both poisoned. The King of Spain relapsed often, and at last remained in that low state of health, in which he seemed to be always rather dying than living. The Court of France were glad of his recovery, being not then in a condition to undertake such a war, as the Dauphin's pretensions must have engaged them in.

The campaign on the Rhine was still more considerable than that in Catalonia. The French indeed, in the beginning of the spring, boasted their passing the Rhine, and forced Prince Lewis of Baden to intrench himself to avoid an engagement. But now, towards the end of the year, the Prince in his turn crossed the Rhine near Mentz, and, being joined by the Hessian troops, advanced to Neuwied, where the French were so strongly intrenched, that all he could do was to cannonade them for several days. It was at the same time so contrived, that General Thungen should have passed the Rhine not far from Philipsburg, in order to have attacked the French in the rear; but they, having notice of that design, detached the Marquis d'Uxelles to disappoint it. So that the Germans, after they had got some booty, and divers hostages for contribution, repassed the Rhine towards the beginning of October, and then marched into winter quarters.

The principal affair of this year, in relation to the grand Confederacy, was managed in Italy. During the winter the Court of France renewed their intrigues with the Duke of Savoy, to engage him in a separate peace. The Pope's Nuncio, and the Venetian Envoy, seconded the designs of that Crown, their Masters being desirous of sending the Germans out of Italy, and taking the Duke out of the necessity of depending on those, whom they called Heretics. The management in the business of Cesal looked so dark, that the Lord Galeazzo, the King's General and Envoy there, apprehended there was something mysterious under it. But the Duke would not own, that he was in any negotiation, till he 1696, should have received the advances of money, that were promised him from England and Holland; for he was much set on heaping up treasure, even during the war; to which end he had debased his coin so, that it was not above a sixth part in intrinsic value of what it passed for. He was always beset with his Priests, who were perpetually complaining of the progress, which Heresy was like to make in his dominions. He had indeed granted a very full edict in favour of the Vauds, restoring to them their former liberties and privileges, which the Lord Galway took care to have expressed in the most emphatical words, and passed with all the formalities of law, to make it as effectual, as laws and promises can be. Yet every step, that was made in that affair, was merely extorted from the Duke by the intercession of the King and the States-General, and by the Lord Galway's zeal. But the French were grown so weary of the war, and found the charge of it so heavy, that they made the Duke such large and advantageous offers, that he resolved to accept them, notwithstanding his strict engagements of honour to the Allies. However he wanted not plausible reasons to justify his conduct in this point; for though England and Holland had ever punctually paid in the subsidies, which they had promised, and even something more; yet the Emperor and King of Spain were greatly in arrears in their contributions and supplies. Indeed the Allies did not fail to assure him, that they would procure him conditions at the general treaty, as much, if not more, advantageous, than those, which France offered him at present. But those were loose and distant promises, and these of France certain and at hand, and supported besides by threats from that Crown to invade the rest of his country next summer with a formidable army. However, though the Duke urged the probability of the effects of this threatening, to justify his conduct to the Allies; yet it is certain, that a stronger motive inclined him to a separate peace, and that was the marriage of his eldest daughter to the Dauphin's eldest son. It was not safe to conclude this treaty at Turin, where the Duke was narrowly observed by the Lord Galway; and therefore, to escape the sagacity of that Minister, he went towards the close of the winter, with a small retinue of his own naming, to our Lady of Loretto, concealing a political journey under the pretence of a religious vow. This gave no small umbrage to the Lord Galway, who knowing him to be more a statesman than a bigot, and being refused to accompany him, sent spies after him. But, notwithstanding all their vigilance, they could never get the least notice of the treaty of peace, which the Duke signed at Loretto, by the mediation of the Agents of Rome and Venice, and a private messenger from the Marshal de Catinat. By this treaty the French restored to the Duke all the new conquests, which they had made, as also Pignerol demolished; gave him four millions of livres towards the reparation of the damages, which he had sustained during the war; engaged to assist him with eight thousand foot and four thousand horse, to be maintained at the charge of the King of France; and that a marriage between the Duke of Burgundy, and the Princess, his daughter, should be forthwith treated of, to be consummated as soon as they should be of age. As for the Princess's portion, it was agreed, that the Duke should give her two hundred thousand crowns of gold, towards the payment of which, he was to give a discharge for one hundred thousand crowns of gold, which remained due by France to the House of Savoy, as a part of the Duchess Royal's portion; and the remainder the French King promised to remit, in consideration of this present treaty, of which the Pope and Venetians were guarantees, and which was soon after ratified in France (1).

As soon as the Duke was returned from Loretto, his chief care was to conceal this engagement, not only from the Ministers and Generals of the Allies, but even from his own. The Marquis de St Thomas was the only person, whom he had entrusted with this important negotiation, and who, in a disguise, had taken many journeys to Pignerol, to confer either with Count de Thesse, Governor of that place, or with Marshal de Catinat, who came thither incognito upon the same account. But because it is almost impossible for a Minister of State to absent himself from Court, without being missed, the Marquis de St Thomas's frequent disappearing gave no small suspicion to the Ministers of the Allies, who caused him to be so diligently observed, that his clandestine journeys to Pignerol were at last discovered. Though this was a convincing proof of the Duke of Savoy's holding intelligence with the enemy, yet they managed him very tenderly, and never took notice of the matter. But, not long after his return from Loretto, the King, having received information of the separate treaty concluded there, acquainted the Lord Galway with it, who immediately communicated this advice to the other Ministers of the Allies, and began his expostulations with the Duke, shewing him the principal articles, which he had concluded with France. The Duke was extremely surprized at this discovery, but persisted in denying it, till the French, advancing to his assistance, enabled him to throw off all disguise, without fearing the resentment of his Allies. For, to cover this defection from the Allies, it was further agreed, that Catinat should draw his army together, before the Duke could bring his, to make head against him; and that he should

(1) Lambert in his Memoirs (I. p. 1.) says, it was believed that France caused it to be reported, that the Duke's pretence, for making a separate peace, was King William's declaring to the Count de la Tour, that the giving Pignerol to the Duke of Savoy should not be insisted on. This was only to cover the true spring of that peace, which was negotiated by surprise. The success of the Assassination-plot, in 1696, was thought so certain, that about the time it was to be executed, the Court of France sent a person of distinction to the Duke of Savoy, who represented to him, that King No. 21. VOL. III.

William was just then killed. That he knew him to be the support of the Grand Alliance, which would be now entirely broken, and therefore the Duke ought to take care of himself. That France had a great regard for him, and would grant him advantageous terms. The Duke was surprized at this news, which the other perceiving, told him with an air of assurance, that he must give an immediate and positive answer. The Duke desired half an hour to consider, which being granted, he walked into his closet, and the time being elapsed, he accepted the offers of France.

1696. should be ordered to attempt the bombardment of Turin, that so the Duke might seem to be forced, by the extremity of his affairs, to take such conditions as were offered him. Accordingly, towards the end of May, Marshal de Catinat came down from the mountains of Savoie into the plains of Turin, with an army of near fifty-thousand men, and much superior in number to the Confederates. The Duke of Savoie still dissembled; and, as if there had been no intelligence between him and the Court of France, under pretence of defending his places, he put all his own infantry into them, and sent all the Confederate forces to the camp at Montcallier, which he fortified by drawing a line from the Doero to the Po, in order, as was pretended, to secure his capital city against a bombardment.

Of all the officers in the French army, the Marshal de Catinat alone was acquainted with the treaty, which occasioned some disputes between him and the Grand Prior. The Duke, the better to cover his design, sent out daily German parties to harrafs the French foragers, which generally returned with advantage. This the Grand Prior bore with great impatience, and had often desired leave of the Marshal to charge them, but had still been denied. Provoked by these refusals, and ascribing the General's conduct either to want of courage or experience, in the height of his zeal for the French King's service, he acquainted him with Catinat's proceedings, in a letter subscribed by most of the other subaltern Generals. The King smiled at this information, and sent an answer, that the Marshal had obeyed his orders, and that, in a short time, the event would fully justify his conduct. The Grand Prior questioned the King's meaning, of which he had no longer reason to doubt, when, on the 12th of July, a truce was concluded for a month, and afterwards continued to the 15th of September. The Duke of Savoie endeavoured to obtain the consent of the Allies to this suspension of arms; but, though they still refused it, yet they behaved themselves so, as if they had in effect accepted it. The Duke had demanded so much time, that he might, at least with some shew of honour, disengage himself from his Confederates; for, as early as the month of June, he had begun to throw off all disguise; and having communicated to the Ministers of the Allies, the proposals which France made him, and represented the great superiority of the enemies army, he owned his inclination to accept them, palliating his breach of the treaty of Confederacy with several plausible reasons. Moreover, he wrote to most of the Potentates concerned in the Grand Alliance, to ask their consent; but though every one of them positively refused it, yet he did not stop here, but signed again openly the treaty, which he had secretly concluded some months before. The Allies, on their part, left no means untried to bring him back to their interest. They made him offers more advantageous than the former; and Count Mansfield, whom the Emperor had sent express on this important affair, proposed a match between the King of the Romans and the Princess of Savoie, with an augmentation both of troops and subsidies. But all the Count's eloquence, which he exerted on this occasion, was to no purpose, for the Duke remained firm in his former engagement. Prince Eugene, who commanded the Imperial troops, though nearly related to the Duke, was extremely provoked at this unexpected change; and Prince Connercy, a youth of a violent spirit, was so enraged at it, that he sent a challenge to the Duke, who would have met him sword in hand, but was with great difficulty prevented by some of his Courtiers, who happened to be informed of the challenge. This quarrel was soon after made up, and these two Princes parted very good friends. In this interval, the French hostages for the treaty, the Count de Tressé, and the Marquis de Bouffle, arrived at Turin, with magnificent equipages; and at the same time the Count de Tano and the Marquis d'Aix, were sent by the Duke to Catinat's camp upon the same account.

One of the chief reasons, which made the Duke of Savoie conceal his separate peace with so much precaution, was (as has been noted) his design of getting the remaining part of the subsidies due to him from the Confederates. He was particularly informed of a considerable remittance from England to Genoa, which he wanted to have had in his own coffers; but, the Lord Galway being acquainted in time with his new engagements, he stopped that money, of which he afterwards made use in the Milanese, for the payment of the troops under his command, and of some Bavarians and Brandenburgers, which he took into the English service. It is reported, that some of the subaltern Generals of the Allies had formed a design to seize on the City of Turin, of which they were already in possession; and at the same time to secure the Duke's person, in order to force him to break with France. Of this he was informed, but seemed little to mind or fear it; for, though he durst not go to the camp at Montcallier, yet he passed and repassed daily by the Spanish and German guard, as he went out of Turin, and often viewed their incampment on the glacis of that city. After all, such an enterprize might easily have been executed, but to go through with it would have been almost impossible, considering the weakness of the Confederates, and the strength of the French, who, by the help of the inhabitants and the Duke's troops, would quickly have made themselves masters of all the places in Piedmont, and shamefully turned out the intruders. Accordingly, this project was disdainfully rejected by the Lord Galway, and the other Generals in chief, who had more wisdom than to violate the rights of sovereignty in so unwarrantable a manner.

When the news of these proceedings reached Flanders, King William was incamped at Gembours, where President de la Tour, the Duke of Savoie's Envoy, notified to him the separate peace, which his Master had made with the French King, and that the forces of the Allies were to depart his country within a limited time, or be forced to it by his troops assisted by those of France; but that it was in the power of the Confederates to make a neutrality, which should include all Italy, within the same time. The King, who was justly concerned, that the Duke should by letter have excused the matter to the Emperor, King of Spain, and the Electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg, and not to himself, received Count de la Tour's message with great coldness, and with his usual reservedness turned the discourse to other subjects.

1696. treaty, made a solemn resignation of all manner of pretensions to Savoy, and the Duke's territories, whilst the troops of the Allies began to retire out of a country, where they were already looked upon as enemies; and to provide for the security of the Milanese, which the French forces, in conjunction with those of Savoy, were to attack, in order to force the Spaniards to accept of the neutrality, that was offered them and the rest of the Confederates. The Duke followed them close, and, upon the expiration of the truce, entered the Milanese at the head of the French and his own troops, by virtue of his Commission of Generalissimo from the French King; and four days after laid siege to Valentia. Thus, by an adventure not to be paralleled in history, the same General commanded two contending armies in one campaign. Nay, it is remarkable, that the Duke, before the Allies departed his territories, gave the orders to them, and at the same time to the French, both parties acknowledging him for their chief; a strain of policy unknown even to his ancestors, though they shewed themselves inconstant enough between the Houses of France and Austria upon several occasions.

The siege of Valentia was rather a political than a formal attack. For though the Duke of Savoy, who had all honours paid him as Generalissimo, was for making a vigorous attempt upon the place, because it was agreed, that all the conquests made on the Spaniards should remain in his possession; yet, Catinat having private orders from the French King not to oblige the Duke any further than his interest seemed to require it, being unwilling to suffer a Prince, who had been already so troublesome a neighbour to France, to increase his power in Italy, he prolonged this siege as much as possible, in order to give the Allies time to come in and accept the neutrality, which was the chief thing, the French King had in view. Mean while the treaty was carrying on by the Prince of Fundi for the Emperor, the Marquis de Leganez on the part of the Spaniards, the Lord Galway for King William, and the Marquis de St Thomas for the Duke of Savoy; and many conferences were held, before they could be brought to any conclusion. But though the Savoyards in good earnest, and the French in appearance, were so eager to take Valentia; yet Catinat, for the reason beforementioned, having formed the attacks on the strongest side, and the garrison, which consisted of near seven thousand men, Germans, Spaniards, and French Protestants, making an obstinate resistance; the besiegers, after thirteen days of open trenches, and the loss of two thousand men, had made no considerable progress; when unexpectedly the Marquis de Leganez's messenger brought the King of Spain's acceptance of the neutrality of Italy. In this the Spaniards made a hasty step; for, had they staid a little longer, the great and continual rains, which began to fall as soon as the treaty was signed, would certainly have obliged the French to raise the siege, and forced the Duke of Savoy to give them winter-quarters in Savoy. By this treaty it was agreed, 'That there should be a neutrality or suspension of arms till a general peace. That the Imperial and French troops should depart out of Italy, and return into their own countries. That in lieu of winter-quarters, which the Princes of Italy were otherwise obliged to allow the Imperialists, they should furnish them with three hundred thousand crowns, that is to say, one third before their retreat, and the remainder at a time prefixed, upon sufficient security: And that, as soon as the Imperialists should begin to march off with some part of their troops, the French proportionably should do the like.' Thus by the intrigues and artful negotiations of France was concluded the particular peace of Italy; which undoubtedly was a great step towards a general one, through the advantage, which that Court reaped from this neutrality; since by it they not only saved great sums of money, but were at liberty to turn their united forces against the rest of the Confederates. Indeed an accident, which fell out not long before, seemed to embroil the Princes of Christendom in new contests; and that was the death of John Sobieski, the Third of that name, King of Poland, who died of an apoplectic fit, in the 70th year of his age. His decease, as it usually happens in elective Kingdoms, was attended with much confusion among his subjects, and great animosities between the Competitors for his Crown.

Thus ended the war in Piedmont, after it had lasted six years: Pignerol was demolished; but the French, by the treaty, might build another fort at Fenestrella, which is in the middle of the hills, and so would not be so important as Pignerol was, though it might prove an uneasy neighbour to the Duke of Savoy. The Duke's daughter was received in France as Duchess of Burgundy, though not of the age of consent; for she was but ten years old.

This year proved also fatal to Mary Anne of Austria, Queen-Mother of Spain, who died of a cancer in her breast. Her death was as considerable a loss to the Confederates in general, as to the Spaniards in particular, considering her prevailing influence over the Spanish councils, to make them take such resolutions, as were conformable to the interests of the common cause. She was daughter to the Emperor Ferdinand III; was born in 1634, and married in 1649 to Philip IV, King of Spain.

Our affairs at sea went well, with relation to trade. All our merchant fleets came safely home, and we made no considerable losses. On the contrary, we took many of the French privateers; which now gained little in a way of war that, in some of the former years, had been very advantageous to them. Upon the breaking out of the conspiracy, orders were sent to Sir George Rooke at Cádiz, to bring home the squadron under his command. The Spaniards murmured at this; tho' it was reasonable for the English to take care of themselves, in the first place. Sir George's arrival, the latter end of April, dissipated the fears that the Brest and Toulon squadrons might join and intercept him. For the Toulon squadron had also orders to come about; and they got into Brest and other harbours, before Sir George, being joined by some other men of war from the Downs, was ready to meet them. He left the French coasts, and, on the 23d of May, went into Torbay; from whence he set out for London, to assist at the Admiralty-board, having resigned the command to the Lord Berkley. About three weeks after, Lord Berkley sailed towards Ushant, to insult the coast of France. To that end, he commanded the Burford and Newcastle with a fire-

The fleet anchored near Belle-Isle; and the boats were immediately manned, and ordered to land upon Horeah, one of the islands called The Cardinals; which they did, and burnt the town. They had the like success on Hoddicke, another of those islands. Three English and two Dutch men of war, with the long boats, and other ships, and seven-hundred soldiers and mariners, were sent to join the men at Guoy, who, with their assistance, destroyed twenty villages, took as many small vessels, and killed and carried off one thousand six hundred horses and black cattle. Mean while, Sir Martin Beckman, with the bomb-vessels, and ten men of war, under the command of Captain Mees, arrived before St Martin's, a trading town on the isle of Rhee. About two thousand bombs and carcasses were fired with such success, that the greater part of the town was burnt, or miserably shattered. The French, recovering their surprize, brought cannon and mortars to the shore, and fired upon the English, who, contenting themselves with the mischief they had done, sailed away towards Olonne; where they had but little success, through a mistake in the situation of the place. These losses, though not considerable in themselves, put the French affairs into great distraction; and the charge which they were at, in defending their coast, was much greater than ours, in attacking it. But it is very probable, that much greater advantages might have been made, if the fleet had not been so divided, that faction appeared in every order, and in every motion. Nor did the King study to remedy this, but rather kept it up, and seemed to think that this was the way to please both parties; though he found, afterwards, that, by all his management with the Tories, he disgusted those who were affectionate and zealous to him; and that the Tories had too deep an alienation from him, to be overcome with good usage. Their submission, however, to him gained their end, which was to provoke the Whigs to be forward and uneasy.

Du Bart's success at sea. The French thought the mischief done upon their coast to be, in some measure, repaired by the famous Du Bart, who, with eight men of war, and four privateers, fell in with a great fleet of Dutch merchant-ships, homeward bound from the Sound, under convoy of six or seven frigates; and, having taken the frigates, and burnt four of them, destroyed about thirty merchant-men, and took several of the rest. This was the state of affairs at home and abroad this summer.

Affairs of Scotland. Burnet. The 8th of September, the Parliament of Scotland met at Edinburgh; and the Lord Murray, Secretary of State, and lately created Earl of Tullibardine, was appointed the King's Commissioner. Scotland was now falling under great misery, by reason of two successive bad harvests, which exhausted that nation, and drove away many of their people; the greatest number went over to Ireland. The Parliament was very thin, to whom the Commissioner made a speech on the occasion of their meeting; as did likewise the Lord Pelwarth, Chancellor of Scotland. Two days after the King's letter was read, and then all the Members signed an Association, the same in substance with that in England. They resolved to give the King a supply of 1,440,000*l*.

Scots, to be raised by a land-tax, and an additional excise, for maintaining the standing forces both by sea and land. And, considering the danger this Kingdom was in by the late conspiracy, they ordered an act to be brought in, for securing their religion, lives, and properties, in case his Majesty should come to an untimely death; and another for obliging all in public trust to sign the Association. These acts being passed, which were great checks upon the enemies of the Government, the Parliament, on the 12th of October, was adjourned to the 8th of December.

On the 30th of May, the Lord Capel, Lord Deputy of Ireland, dying after a long sickness, the Council, in pursuance of an act made in the 33d year of King Henry VIII, elected the Lord Chancellor Porter to be Lord Justice, and Chief Governor of that Kingdom, till the King's pleasure was known. The Irish Parliament met at Dublin, the 29th of June, according to their last adjournment. In the Lords House the King's Commission was read, appointing the Lord Chief Justice Haly to be their Speaker; and the Commons, at the same time, having expelled Mr Sanderfon, the only Member of the House, who had not signed the Association, adjourned to the 4th of August; upon which day Sir Charles Porter, Lord Chancellor, and the Earls of Montrath and Drogheda, now appointed Lords Justices and General Governors of Ireland, signified the King's pleasure to the Parliament, that they should farther adjourn themselves.

On the 8th of December, Sir Charles Porter was seized with a fit of an apoplexy, and died immediately.

The King, being weary of a campaign, that afforded him no opportunity for action, left the army towards the latter end of August under the command of the Elector of Bavaria, and went to his usual diversion of stag-hunting about his palaces of Dieren and Loo. On the 14th of September, he set out from Loo, accompanied by the Duke of Zell (a Prince, whom he ever respected as a father, and loved as a brother) and the next day went to Cleves, where he was magnificently entertained by the Count of Brandenburg, who were come thither on purpose to receive his visit. Having spent two days at this agreeable place, the King and the Duke of Zell went back to Loo, where three days after he was followed by the Elector of Brandenburg, in return of his visit at that court. Having staid three weeks longer at this place, the King went to the Hague, and embarked on board the William and Mary yacht, attended by a squadron of men of war under the command of Vice-admiral Aylmer. Two days after he landed at Margate, and arrived the same evening at Kenfington.

The Parliament, after several prorogations, being met at Westminster on the 20th of October, the King made the following speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Have called you together as soon as was possible; and I think it a great happiness, that this year has passed without any disadvantage abroad or disorder at home, considering our great disappointment in the funds given

The King's speech. P. 11. C. 111. 25.

1696. 'given at your last meeting, and the difficulties, which have arisen upon the recoining of the money.

'This is so convincing a proof of the good disposition of my army, and of the steady affections of my people, that I cannot but take notice of it with great satisfaction. Our enemies have not been without hopes; that such a conjuncture might have proved fatal to us. But, as they have failed in those expectations, so I am fully persuaded, that your unanimous proceedings in this Session will make them for ever despair of an advantage from any disagreement among ourselves.

'It must be confessed, that the business, which you have before you, will be very great, because of the necessity of supplying former deficiencies, as well as making provisions for the next year's service.

'And, upon this occasion, it is fit for me to acquaint you, that some overtures have been made in order to the entering upon a negotiation for a general peace. But I am sure we shall agree in opinion, that the only way of treating with France is with our swords in our hands; and that we can have no reason to expect a safe and honourable peace, but by shewing ourselves prepared to make a vigorous and effectual war. In order to which, I do very earnestly recommend to you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, that you would consider of raising the necessary supplies, as well for maintaining the honour of Parliaments in making good the funds already granted, as for carrying on the war the next year; which I think ought not to be less than what was intended to be raised for that purpose the last Session.

'I must also put you in mind of the civil list, which cannot be supported without your help; and the miserable condition of the French Protestants does oblige me to mention them to you again.

'My Lords and Gentlemen,

'It may deserve your consideration, whether there do not still remain some inconveniencies relating to the coin, which ought to be remedied. And I hope you will find out the best expedients for the recovery of credit, which is absolutely necessary, not only with respect to the war, but for carrying on of trade.

'I am of opinion, that there is not one good Englishman, who is not intirely convinced, how much does depend upon this Session; and therefore I cannot but hope for your unanimity and dispatch in your resolutions, which at this time are more necessary than ever for the safety and honour of England.'

those Princes shewed to Parliaments, on almost all occasions, was a proof of their disposition to get rid of them, and rule without them, whenever it was in their power; as the complacency and temper in King William's speeches were proofs that he looked upon himself as the Father of his People, who could not well avoid making him suitable returns of duty and affection. Accordingly the House of Commons unanimously voted, That they would support his Majesty and Government against all his enemies both at home and abroad; and that they would effectually assist him in the prosecution of the present war against France, and that an humble address should be prepared to be presented to his Majesty pursuant to the said resolution. This address, being drawn up by Mr Mountague, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was presented to the King by the whole House, on the 23d of October, and was as follows:

May it please your most excellent Majesty,

THIS is the eighth year, in which your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, have assisted your Majesty with large supplies for carrying on a just and necessary war, in defence of our religion, preservation of our laws, and vindication of the rights and liberties of the people of England, which we have hitherto preserved, and by the blessing of God, upon your Majesty's conduct and good government, will stedfastly maintain and entail upon our posterity.

'This hath cost the nation much blood and treasure, but the hopes of accomplishing so great and glorious a work have made your subjects cheerfully support the charge. And to shew your Majesty and all Christendom, that the Commons of England will not be amused or diverted from their firm resolutions of obtaining by war a safe and honourable peace, we do, in the name of all those we represent, renew our assurances to your Majesty, that this House will support your Majesty and your Government against all your enemies both at home and abroad; and that they will effectually assist you in the prosecution and carrying on the present war against France.'

To this the King returned the following answer:

Gentlemen,

'The continuance of your zeal and affection is the thing in the world I value most; and I will answer it by all the ways I can think of; and will make your good, and the safety of the nation, the principal care of my life.'

These assurances of affection on the one side, of loyalty on the other, and of mutual confidence in both, being given, the Commons entered upon the three great affairs, recommended to them from the Throne; namely, the further remedying the ill state of the coin; the providing a supply for the next year's service; and the restoring of public credit; all which had a near dependence upon each other, and made the difficulties more intricate.

As to the coin, the Commons resolved, that they would not alter the standard of gold or silver in fineness, weight, or denomination; and because

on the
speeches.

Whoever was consulted in forming and drawing up of King William's speeches, the wisdom and spirit of them are his own; and there are in them a temper and complacency, which cannot but affect all that heard or read them, let the necessity of his affairs oblige him ever so often to call upon his Parliament for supplies, towards carrying on a war in which he engaged by their advice. The difference between this Government and that of the Princes who reigned immediately before him, may be conceived in part even by their speeches. The little deference 1696. because the circulation of guineas has been obstructed of late, by reason of the want of other coin, and the act made the last Session to take off the obligation of coining gold, a bill was passed, which received the Royal assent, for leave to import guineas, and coin gold at the Mint. While guineas, for want of silver money, were current at thirty shillings, the Dutch and other foreigners imported as many as they could find into England, and laid them out in the most merchantable wares; by this means they made a gain of their guineas, of as much as the then currency of them was, above their real value, which was so much loss to the English, and, to prevent this inconvenience, the bill against importing guineas was past. But, now that the value of guineas was reduced to little more than the real value, that reason against bringing them in ceased. Two other acts were also passed; one for the further remedying the ill state of the coin, and the other, for encouraging the bringing wrought plate into the Mint to be coined. By these acts, the hammered money and plate were to be received at five shillings and four pence an ounce.

The supply for 1697.

As to the supply, the Commons having considered the state of the war for the year 1697, both in relation to the navy and land-forces, which, at their desire, had been laid before them, they granted the sum of two millions, three hundred and seventy-two thousand, one hundred and ninety-seven pounds for the maintenance of forty-thousand seamen, and of two marine regiments, and for the ordinary of the navy, and the charge of the registry of seamen; and the sum of two millions, five hundred and seven thousand, eight hundred and eighty-two pounds, for the maintaining eighty-seven thousand, four hundred and forty men, to be employed in England and beyond the seas; and for the extraordinary service of the office of ordnance, the pay of the general officers, and the charge of the transports, hospitals, and other contingencies of the war. Besides which, they voted the sum of 125,000*l.* for making good the deficiency in recoinning the hammered money, and the recompence to be given for bringing plate into the Mint (1).

To raise the sums granted for the prosecution of the war, the Commons had recourse to the most equal of all impositions, a general poll-tax, laying a duty upon all persons according to the true value of their real and personal estates, professions, employments, &c. So that none were exempt from the tax, but such as received alms; and at the same time they laid three shillings in the pound upon land (2).

The public credit restored. Burnet. Pr. H. C.

But the great difficulty was to find a way to restore public credit. All tallies and funds settled by Parliament, especially such as were remote, were exchanged for ready money at a very great loss, and the Government was obliged to make excessive discounts and allowances to bring treasure into the Exchequer. This great loss of credit, which was like to have proved fatal to our affairs abroad the last summer, arose chiefly from two causes: The deficiencies of all the Parliamentary funds (particularly the unhappy project of the Land-bank, which totally failed, and did not produce one penny of above two millions and an half, with which it was charged) and the recoinning of the silver. It is easy to imagine what freights the nation was in, when the notes of the Bank of England, which had been a great help to the public, were discounted at twenty, and tallies at forty, fifty, or sixty per cent. The Government had contracted a great debt; and these arrears were put upon the funds of the revenue, which had been granted, but for five years, and that term was now expiring. Great numbers of tallies were on funds very remote, and many had no funds at all. Hereby the trust and good opinion of the people were so far lost, that those few, who had any money to lend, shewed the greatest backwardness imaginable to bring it into the Exchequer, when they could employ it in stock-jobbing to so great advantage upon the Royal Exchange; and therefore all loans to the Government were procured on exorbitant premiums.

All men were amazed, and wondered what measures the Parliament would take, in such perplexing difficulties, hardly believing it possible to find out any expedient, that could be effectual to repair so great a mischief. The enemies of the Government had now the satisfaction of seeing it sufficiently distressed, since our affairs could not be more embarrassed than they were at this juncture. And, as the wisest men without doors were at a loss how to cure this evil, so the malecontents concluded, that it never would be cured, and therefore considered the Government as desperate, and triumphed in the expectation of a sudden revolution. But this Parliament, which was principally animated by the wisdom, sagacity, and eloquence of Mr Mountague, Chancellor of the Exchequer, being fully convinced, that the restoration of public credit was a point of the utmost importance, instead of being discouraged by the difficulty of effecting it, were rather excited to undertake the work with greater zeal and application. They were made sensible, that one great spring of this mischief, was the deficiencies of several aids and duties, which neither had been nor ever would be sufficient to answer the principal and interest charged upon them; and that these deficiencies, and the remoteness of the course of payments, were the true reasons, why the owners of such tallies were frequently necessitated, for the procuring of ready money, to dispose of them at a great loss; by which means the public credit was extremely weakened, commerce interrupted, and other public and private affairs exceedingly perplexed. The Commons therefore came to a resolution, 'That a supply be granted to make good the deficiencies of Parliamentary funds;' and afterwards ordered an

(1) For raising this sum, a duty of six-pence per ounce was laid upon all plate, that should not be brought in; and a duty of twenty per cent. upon all paper, pasteboard, vellum, and parchment imported, and 17*l.* 10*s.* upon the same goods made in this Kingdom, or in stock, for the term of two years.

(2) A duty of 15*s.* per cent. was also laid upon leather for three years. The old subsidy of tonnage and poundage was also doubled (dying wares excepted) for two years and three quarters, and an additional aid of one shilling in the pound upon land.

1696. an estimate to be laid before them of what sums were wanting to satisfy and discharge all the principal and interest due on the several funds, and, the computation being made, the whole amounted to five millions one hundred and sixty thousand four hundred pounds. In order to discharge this immense arrear, the Commons continued divers duties arising not only by the customs, but by continued and additional impositions; paper and parchments, births and marriages; windows; the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, after the day on which they would otherwise have expired, to the 1st day of August 1706; and appointed all the monies, which should arise, and be brought into the Exchequer from any of these taxes or duties thus continued, to be the general fund for making good all the deficient ones, by the satisfaction and payment of the principal and interest due thereupon. And that all occasion of complaint might be removed, and equal provision made for all, the Parliament directed, that all monies arising from the duties, appropriated for the general fund, should be distributed and applied to pay principal and interest upon every one of the deficient funds, in proportion to the sum, of which they were deficient; and that all the money, which should be in such a due proportion distributed, should be paid out to all, who were intitled to receive the same, in such course and order, as if the same were monies really arising by the respective deficient funds, and that without being diverted, misapplied, or postponed. Besides, to remove all doubts about the security intended to be given, in case, on the 1st of August 1706, or within three months then next ensuing, the whole produce of the several funds and revenues appropriated for a general fund, together with other grants then in being, should not be sufficient to discharge the sum of 5,160,400 l. intended to be discharged, that then what was deficient, should be made good out of such aids or revenues, as should be granted in the next Session of Parliament. Thus in one Session the Parliament not only raised a supply of above five millions, for the service of the next year, but also provided a sufficient security for a debt of five millions more. Nor was this all, for the Parliament likewise took into consideration, by what means they might support the credit of the Bank of England, which was now ready to sink.

To this end, it was agreed to engraft upon the capital stock of the Bank 800,000 l. more by new subscriptions, at eight per cent. interest, to be paid by tallies and Bank notes. Accordingly, a million was subscribed and paid in that manner (1). This expedient came from Mr Moun- tague; and though many persons, who were interested in it, could not presently apprehend the reasonableness of it, yet the advantages, which they afterwards received, fully convinced them, that no other way could have been found to restore their lost credit. For, the value of two hundred thousand pounds in Bank notes being sunk by the new subscriptions, the rest, as it was reasonable to believe they would, began presently to rise in worth; and so likewise did the tallies, after so many as amounted to eight hundred thousand pounds were paid in to enlarge the Bank. Upon this the credit of the Bank recovered immediately, till in a few weeks their notes, which bore no interest, were equal with money, and their bills, that bore interest, better than money. And by this means the face of affairs was quickly much changed for the better; credit began to revive, and money to circulate on moderate terms; foreign exchange was less to our disadvantage, and soon after to an equality; and whatever hardships the people had undergone by reason of the war, and the recovery of the silver money, which could not but occasion many complaints; yet the greatest part ascribed this to the necessity of affairs, and began to hope, both from the prospect of a peace, and the wisdom of those at the helm, that they should enjoy more favourable times.

Another evil of no less difficulty or importance than the loss of credit, and which was the chief one of the causes of that loss, remained still to be removed, the great scarcity of money. The Parliament, to prevent disappointments by settling funds, which might be deficient, came to a resolution, 'That the supplies for the service of the year 1697 should be raised within the year.' But how could above five millions be raised

(1) The proportion was four fifths of the subscriptions in tallies, and one fifth in Bank notes, and an interest of eight per cent. was allowed, as well for such tallies, that should be brought in to enlarge their stock by new subscriptions, as for those tallies, which the Company was then possessed of, provided they did not exceed the value of those Bank notes, which should be paid in upon this engraftment on their stock; and, for securing the payment of this interest of eight per cent. the additional duty on salt was afterwards granted and appropriated. The time of the continuance of the Bank of England they thought fit to extend to the year 1710, and resolved likewise, 'That, before the day were fixed for the beginning the new subscriptions, the old stock be made one hundred per cent.; and that what should exceed that value, should be divided among the old Members. That all the interest due on those tallies, which should be subscribed into the Bank stock, at the time appointed for subscription, to the end of the last preceding quarter on each tally, be allowed as principal. That liberty be given by Parliament to enlarge the number of Bank bills, to the value of the sum, which should be so subscribed, over and above the 1,200,000 l. provided they be obliged to answer such bills at demand; and, in default thereof, to be answered by the Exchequer out of the first money due to them. That no other Bank be erected, permitted, or allowed by act of Parliament within this Kingdom, during the continuance of the Bank of England. That, on such new settlement, the Bank of England be exempted from all manner of Parliamentary taxes. That no act of the Corporation should forfeit the particular interests of any person concerned therein. That provision be made for the effectual preventing the officers of the Exchequer, and all other officers and receivers of the revenue, from diverting, delaying, or obstructing the course of payments to the Bank. That care be taken to prevent the altering, counterfeiting, or forging any Bank bills or notes; as likewise against the defacing, raising, or altering any indorsement upon any such bill or note. That the estate and interest of each Member in the stock of the Corporation be made a personal estate. And, lastly, that no contract or agreement, made for any Bank stock to be bought or sold, be valid in law or equity, unless the said contract be actually registered in the books of the Bank within seven days, and actually transferred within fourteen days next after the making such contract.'

1696. raised within the year, while the silver money was called in and recoining; and there was not current coin enough in the nation to answer the occasions of trade, and scarcely the conveniences and necessities of life? This vote of Parliament seeming impracticable, the enemies of the Government made themselves merry with it; and many, even of the King's best friends, imagined, that the Parliament by this rather expressed their zeal and willingness, than their ability to support the state, and maintain the present settlement. But the Parliament made money without bullion, and distributed great quantity of coin without the help of the Mint. This was done, by authorizing the Lords of the Treasury to issue out bills from the Exchequer at several times, to the value of above two millions; which bills were first appointed to be brought in and sunk upon the poll-tax. But, before the Session ended, the Parliament being convinced by the first collection of that duty, that it would prove very deficient, they appointed the Exchequer bills to be brought in on any other of the King's revenues, excepting the land-tax; and allowed an interest of seven pounds twelve shillings a year upon the second issuing the bills of the Exchequer; whereas at first they bore no interest. By this the Parliament laid a good foundation for paper-money to supply the place of our silver coin; for so many payments were at this time to be made into the Exchequer, that, when the people had assurance given them, that the Exchequer notes should be received back again in the payment of the King's taxes, they were very well satisfied to take them, at first indeed at a small discount, but not long after at an equality. A great number of these notes were only for five or ten pounds, which answered the necessities of commerce among the meaner people, for the common conveniences of life; and that those, who had advanced money in loans on any part of the King's revenue, might not be obliged to receive it back in notes, that were under the value of money, to strengthen the reputation of these bills, the Parliament authorized the Lords of the Treasury to contract with any Corporation or numbers of private men, and to allow them a competent premium, provided they obliged themselves to exchange those notes for ready money, when tendered to them for that purpose: Which the Lords of the Treasury did accordingly. The credit of the Exchequer notes being thus secured, they daily rose nearer to par, till at last they exceeded the value of money; and whereas the Trustees, with whom the Government had contracted to exchange them, were at first allowed ten per cent. as a premium, they were afterwards contented to do it for four. These bills, which the people were satisfied to receive, because they knew the Exchequer would receive them again as so much ready money, so well supplied the want of money till new coin was issued from the Mint, that trade and commerce were maintained, and mutual payments made so as to answer the necessities of the Government and the people. This project was likewise owing to Mr Mountain, as well as that of recoining the money, which those very men, who envied most his success in the House of Commons, and growing power at Court, were afterwards contented to call a fortunate temerity.

Whilst the Commons were employed in settling the funds for the supplies and arrears, they received a message from the King, importing, 'That, his Majesty finding himself under great difficulties for want of money to supply the occasions of the civil list, he had thought it necessary to remind the House of that part of his speech, which related to that head, desiring, that speedy care might be taken to make effectual provision for it.' Upon this it was resolved, that a supply of 515,000*l.* be granted for the support of the civil list; to be raised by a duty of six-pence per bushel upon malt for three years and a quarter (1).

The great business of this Session, which held longest in both Houses, was a bill relating to Sir John Fenwick, who had been concerned in the late assassination and invasion plot. This affair was of such a nature, that it deserves to be related in a particular manner. Fenwick, endeavouring to fly over into France under the borrowed name of Thomas Ward, was seized at New Romney in Kent with Robert Webster, Attorney, and from thence brought up to London, and, on the 11th of June 1696, committed prisoner to the Tower, and afterwards to Newgate. As soon as he was apprehended, he wrote the following letter, with a black lead pencil, to his Lady, but directed to Mrs Farrar, her woman at the Lady Carlisle's.

'What I feared is at last happened. Had I come alone, I had done it; but the other was betrayed from London. It is God's will; so we must submit. I know nothing can save my life, but my Lord Carlisle's going over to Him [King William] backed by the rest of the family of the Howards to beg it; and offering, that I will live abroad all his time, where I cannot hurt him; and that I will never draw sword against him. I must leave it to you what else to say. All friends must be made; my Lord Devonshire may perhaps by my Lady; my Lord Godolphin and my Lord Pembroke by my Lady Montgomery; Mr Nelson by the Archbishop of Canterbury; my Lord Arran might engage his brother Selkirk to use his interest with Keppel. I believe, if my Lord Carlisle would go, it were best; before my trial; or else they will cut me short for want of time. If he can prevail with him for a pardon, he will procure it as well before my trial as after; at least, he may prevail for a reprieve till some can come over to him. My Lord also will have an opportunity to engage

Benjamin,

(1) Because the impositions already laid did not fully answer the sums voted, the Commons resolved, that towards the supply granted for carrying on the war, and for the support of the civil list, over and above the duties already payable, a further duty be laid upon all cyder, perry, liquors called sweets, mum, wine, and upon all goods made of or mixed with wool, silk, or hair. And that, for making good the deficiency of the provision for payment of the interest of the transport-debt for the reducing of Ireland, a duty of four pounds per annum be laid upon all hawkers and pedlars for one year; and that every hawker and pedlar, travelling with an horse, ass, or mule, should pay four pounds more per annum, for each horse, ass, or mule he should so travel with.

1696. ' Bontinck, [the Earl of Portland] and get my Lord of Essex to join with him. I cannot think what else to say, but the great care must be the Jury. If two or three could be got, that would starve the rest, that or nothing can save me: Money, I know, would do it; but alas! that is not to be had, nor shall I get enough for Counsel. I beg of you not to think of being shut up with me: I know it will kill you; and besides, I have no such friend as you to take care of my business, though it would be the comfort of my life, the little time it lasts, to have you with me. And I have this only comfort now left, that my death will make you easy. My dearest life, grieve not for me, but resign me to God's will. You will hear, as soon as they bring me to town, where they put me, and then I would have a servant or somebody with me. I am interrupted, so I can say no more now. Engage Sir John Lowther, the new Lord, who has more interest than any body. Let my Lord Scarsdale engage Fermaine, to engage Overkirk for me. Speak to my Lord Arlington. If my trial could be put off till the King comes back, there would be more opportunity to solicit him.' (1) This letter, being delivered to Mr Webber, the companion of Sir John Fenwick's flight, was intercepted by the Mayor of Remney, and brought to the Lord Justices. Sir John, who was ignorant of the miscarriage, at the first examination before their Excellencies, denied every thing, which he was charged with. But, the Lords Justices producing his letter, and telling him, he was not of the same mind, when he wrote it, Sir John was confounded, and made no reply, being utterly silenced by such a confession of his guilt, attested under his own hand.

Fenwick's design of getting a jury, or making friends to the King for a pardon, being found impracticable, there was another expedient suggested by the Earl of Peterborough, who, though he had been a great instrument in the Revolution, yet, to gratify his private repentment, advised Sir John to set up a counter-plot, by impeaching several of the King's best friends, as guilty of conspiring against him. Accordingly Sir John, in his private treaty with the Duke of Devonshire, desired an assurance of life, upon his promise to tell all he knew. But the King refused that, and would have it left to himself to judge of the truth and the importance of the discoveries, which he should make. So, resolving to cast himself upon the King's mercy, he sent him a paper, in which, after a bare account of the consultations among the Jacobites (in which he took care to charge none of his own party) he said, that King James and those, who were employed by him, had assured him, that the Duke of Strevensbury, the Earl of Marlborough, the Lord Godolphin, and Admiral Russel were reconciled to him, and were now in his interests, and acting for him: That the Earl of Bath was to betray Phymouth into the hands of the French King, and that Commissary Crawd had sent over to France a list of the forces in England. This was a discovery, that could signify nothing but to give the King a jealousy of those persons; for he did not offer the least shadow or circumstance, either of proof or of presumption, to support this accusation. The King, not being satisfied with this, sent an order for bringing him to a trial, unless he made fuller discoveries. He desired to be further examined by the Lords Justices, to whom he, being upon oath, told some more particulars; but he took care to name none of his own side except those, against whom evidence was already brought, or who were safe and beyond sea. Some few others he named, who were in matters of less consequence, that did not amount to high-treason. He owned a thread of negotiations, which had passed between them and King James, or the Court of France. He said, that the Earl of Aylebury had gone over to France, and had been admitted to a private audience of the French King, in which he had proposed the sending over an army of thirty thousand men, and had undertaken, that a great body of Gentlemen and horses should be brought to join them. It appeared by his discoveries, that the Jacobites in England were much divided; some of whom were called Compounders, and others Noncompounders. The Compounders desired securities from King James for the preservation of the religion and liberties of England; whereas the others were for trusting him upon discretion, without asking any terms, putting all in his power, and relying intirely on his honour and generosity. These seemed indeed to act more suitably to the great principle, upon which they all insisted, that Kings have their power from God, and are accountable only to him for the exercise of it. Dr Lloyd, the deprived Bishop of Norwich, was the only eminent Clergyman, who went into this scheme; and therefore all that party had, upon Sancroft's death, recommended him to King James to have his nomination for Canterbury. Fenwick put all this in writing, upon assurance, that he should not be forced to witness any part of it. When that was sent to the King, all appearing to be so trifling, and no other proof being offered for any part of it, except his own word, which he had stipulated should not be made use of, sent an order to bring him to his trial. But, as the King was slow in sending this order, so the Duke of Devonshire, who had been in the secret management of the matter, was for some time in the country. The Lords Justices delayed the matter till he came to town; and then the King's coming was so near, that it was respited till he arrived. By these delays Sir John gained his main design, which was to practise upon the witnesses. His Lady began with Captain Porter, who was offered, that, if he would go beyond sea, he should have three hundred guineas in hand, more to be remitted to him upon his first landing in France, with an assurance of King James's pardon, and likewise an annuity

(1) In this letter Sir John Fenwick pretends to have a very great affection and tenderness for his Lady, Aunt to the Earl of Carlisle, mentioned in this letter; but it may well be suspected, that his distress, and the need of her relations assistance to get him out of it, if possible, had that effect on his passion, which was diverted not long before by an amour with Mrs Laffels an actress, who appeared in mourning, as if she had been his relict after his death.

1696. annuity of three hundred pounds a year, of which Fenwick was to pay one hundred. Captain Porter hearkened so far to the proposition, that he drew those, who were in treaty with him, together with the Lady herself, who carried the sum, which he was to receive, to a meeting, where he had provided witnesses, who should overhear all that passed, and should, upon a signal, come in, and seize them with the money; which was done, and a prosecution upon it was ordered. The practice was fully proved, and the persons concerned in it were censured and punished. So Captain Porter was no more to be dealt with. Mr Cardell Goodman, who had been an actor, was the other witness. First, they gathered matter to defame him, in which his course of life furnished them very copiously. But they trusted not to this method, and betook themselves to another, in which they prevailed more effectually. They persuaded him to go out of England; and by this means, when the last orders were given for Fenwick's trial, there were not two witnesses against him; so that by the course of law he must have been acquitted. The whole was upon this kept intire for the Session of Parliament. Admiral Russel therefore, on the 6th of November, acquainted the House of Commons, that his Majesty had given leave to lay before them the several papers, which had been given in by Sir John Fenwick, in the nature of informations against himself and several other persons of quality; and he desired, that those papers might be read, that so he might have an opportunity to justify himself; or, if he did not, that he might fall under the censure of the House.

The Papers being read, Fenwick was immediately ordered to be brought before the House; and, being interrogated by the Speaker concerning his inclinations to discover the designs and practices of the enemies of the Government, he answered, that he did not know but what he should say might hurt himself; and therefore desired, that he might have some security, that his confession should not rise up against him in a Court of Judicature; adding, that he would not offend either the King or the House. The Speaker ordered him to withdraw; after which the House debated, whether they should acquaint him with their having his papers of informations. But they did not think fit to do it, because they thought these papers were a contrivance, and made by others for him; that the best way, to get the truth out of him, would be for him to tell his own story; and that, if the House should let him know they had those papers, he would only refer to those papers, as he had lately done, when he was examined by the King and Council. It was also debated, whether there should be any threatening words used to him; but they thought that not proper, since his confession ought to be free and natural. It was also mentioned, whether they should take notice of his Majesty's consent. But that was not thought fit neither, as being derogatory to the privileges of the House. Sir John being called in again, the Speaker acquainted him, that, the House having considered his excusing his making a discovery, they thought he had no reason to apprehend, that the King should be angry with him for making any discovery to the House; this being the proper place to enquire of all things, that relate to the King and Government, especially his Majesty's safety. That as to what he stood upon, that he should not be prejudiced by what he should discover there, they took notice he had already, notwithstanding what he said, discovered it to the King and Council: That he had no reason at all to apprehend, that he should suffer any thing, if he made a full and clear discovery: That no man, who dealt candidly with this House, ever did. That it was in his power to deserve the favour of the House: That it was required by the House, that he should make a discovery; and that this was the last time he was like to be asked to do it. Sir John insisted upon his former excuses, namely, his fear of the King's displeasure, and of accusing himself; which being once more over-ruled, he then demanded time to recollect himself, urging the close restraint, which he had been under in prison, and the badness of his memory. To this the Speaker made answer, that the House thought it a matter of great moment to the King and whole nation, that those, who were their enemies, should be discovered as soon as possible; and, this being within his knowledge, the House did not think it fit to give him time; but that, if they found by his discovery, that he dealt candidly with them, and had told them as much as he knew upon his memory, they would consider of his request of giving him time for the rest. Then Sir John addressed himself in these words to the House: 'When I first spake to the Privy-counsellor, I proposed to him, whether I might have a pardon without being an evidence against any man; and, in that case, I would serve the King so as to tell him all I knew. It was upon honour, that I did it to him, and he took the words in writing from me, and sent them to the King in Flanders. The King's answer was, that he made no objection as to my being an evidence, nor his giving me a pardon; but that I could expect no pardon till he knew what I could say. Upon that I was encouraged to do what I did for his Majesty's service; and I have found in all my business since, whatever I do or say, the answer is, It is not satisfactory, and I am where I was. When this was done, there was a message sent to me from the Lords Justices, that this was not satisfactory, and I must tell all I know. Now, when a man hath told all he knows, and this must be still the answer, it is very hard. The King's answer was, that I should more fully make good what I had said. I did afterwards explain what I informed that honourable person, and still it was not satisfactory. I hope I shall not find this from this honourable House. I am upon my life, and I hope this House will consider of it. I know this House is good security, if I had it, but, till I have it, I am under these circumstances, and I may at last be told all is not satisfactory. I desire the House will please to consider of it.' The Speaker having pressed Sir John to make a discovery, and finding by all his answers, that he did nothing but prevaricate with them, a motion was made for leave to bring in a bill to attain him of high-treason; which after a debate was carried in the affirmative, by an hundred and seventy-nine voices against sixty-one. Three days after the bill was presented to the House, and,

1696. and, after a long debate of several hours, the question was put for the second reading, which was also carried in the affirmative by a majority of one hundred and ninety-six votes against one hundred and four. The same day the House ordered, that Sir John Fenwick should have a copy of the bill, and of the order for reading it eight days after; and that Mr Secretary Vernon should then produce the letter written in Kent by Sir John Fenwick, of which he had informed the House. The next day the Speaker having acquainted the House, that he had received a letter from Sir John, wherein he made it his humble petition, 'that he might have the assistance of his Counsel, Sir Francis Pemberton, Sir Thomas Powis, and Sir Bartholomew Shower, and of his Solicitor, Christopher Digbion,' the Commons readily allowed Sir John Fenwick the Counsel he desired, and, after some debate, the Solicitor likewise, though it was intimated, that he was a very great Jacobite, and was suspected to have been concerned in the escape of Goodman. The day before the attainder was to be read a second time, Sir John Fenwick presented another petition, wherein he prayed to be heard by his Counsel against the passing of the bill. Whereupon the House ordered, that he should be allowed two Counsel at the bar of the House to make his defence. The same night William Fuller, the impostor, sent a letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons, importing, 'That no person had been more actually engaged with Sir John Fenwick than himself, it having been his fortune several times to bring letters to him from the late King and Queen at St Germain's, and to carry his answers. That he had also been with Sir John at the private consults of the late King's adherents, so that, if he might be serviceable in detecting his treasons, he should be very ready to serve the Government, and demonstrate his integrity.' The Speaker acquainted the House the next day with the receipt of this letter; but Fuller's character was so well known to the House, that, upon a question for reading of it, it passed by a great majority in the negative.

This done, Sir John Fenwick was ordered to be brought to the bar; but it being a proceeding of that nature, that none of the ancientest Members could readily give precedent of, it was necessary to settle some preliminaries, and the first question was, Whether the mace ought to lie upon the table, when Sir John Fenwick was in the House? or, Whether the Serjeant ought not to stand by him with it at the bar? Mr Smith and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that, Sir John being a prisoner, the mace ought to be at the bar; and then no Member could speak, but the question must be asked by the Chair. And on the other hand Mr Boyle, Mr John Howe, Sir Christopher Mulgrave, Mr Brobertson, Colonel Granville, Sir William Williams, and Sir Thomas Dyke maintained, that the mace ought to be upon the table, because the bill was to be read; that, if the mace was not upon the table, their mouths were muzzled: That they were to act in their highest capacity as Judges, and therefore ought not to pass a vote, that the Judges should not ask questions. After this debate it was carried, that Sir John Fenwick should stand with the mace at the bar; and then a question arose about the reading of the bill. Some Members said, that it could not be read, while the Counsel was present: Others said, that it was not necessary to read it, while Sir John Fenwick was present, he having had a copy of it. But at last it was thought reasonable, it being in the nature of a charge upon him, that it should be read to him, when present with his Counsel. It was alledged, that this was done in the case of indictments, when the copies were delivered to the prisoners; and therefore it should be read only as a matter of form, as a charge, to which he was to answer; but that it could not be reckoned a second reading, according to the rules of the House, the mace being off the table, and so it should be read again, when the Counsel and the Prisoner were withdrawn. Then the Serjeant took the mace, and brought Sir John Fenwick to the bar; and Counsel being admitted for him and for the bill, namely, Sir Thomas Powis and Sir Bartholomew Shower, for the prisoner, Mr Serjeant Gould and Mr Serjeant Lovell, Recorder of London, for the bill, the Speaker opened the matter; and, addressing himself to Sir John Fenwick, laid before him the heinousness of the crime, 'where-with he stood charged, and how destructive it would have been, if it had succeeded, to the very being of this Kingdom. And therefore, that he might not go unpunished, if he was guilty, they had ordered a bill into the House to attain him for high-treason, which had been once read, and would now be read to him at the bar; and then he would hear the evidence against him, and have liberty to make his defence. That, though he could not claim any right thereto, the House, to shew how ready they were to favour him, in giving him any reasonable help, did allow him Counsel to assist him in it. That he was likewise to acquaint those, who were his Counsel, that the House did reckon their own prudence would so guide them, as not to give any just offence to this House. That they ought not to question the power of Parliaments to pass bills of attainder, when they judge it requisite, of which the Commons are more proper Judges than any private person; and therefore they did not allow him to debate that point.' This speech being ended, the Clerk of the House of Commons read the bill, importing, 'That whereas Sir John Fenwick was, upon the oaths of George Porter and Cardell Goodman, indicted of high-treason, in conspiring to assassinate his Majesty's sacred Person, and encouraging the French King to invade this Kingdom; and having obtained his Majesty's favour to have his trial delayed from time to time, upon his repeated promises of making an ingenuous and full confession of his knowledge of any design of conspiracy against his Majesty's Person or Government, and of the persons therein concerned; he had so far abused his Majesty's great clemency and indulgence, that, instead of making such confession, he had contrived false and scandalous papers as his informations, reflecting on the fidelity of several noble persons, divers Members of the House of Commons, and others, only by hearsay, and contriving thereby to undermine the Government, and create jealousies between the King and his subjects, and to stifle the real conspiracy. And that whereas Cardell Goodman,

1696. 'one of the witnesses against the said Sir John Fenwick, to prove the said treason, lately and since the several times appointed for the trial of the said Sir John Fenwick, at one of which times the said Sir John Fenwick had been accordingly tried, had it not been for the expectation of the said discoveries so often promised by him, was withdrawn, so that the said Gowdman could not be had, to give evidence upon any trial: Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the said Sir John Fenwick be, and is hereby convicted and attainted of high treason, and shall suffer the pains of death, and incur all forfeitures, as a person attainted of high treason.'

The bill being read, and the King's Counsel, the Serjeants Gould and Levell, having, according to the Speaker's directions, opened the evidence, which they had for proving the charge, they were answered by the Counsel for the prisoner, who alledged, 'That, if the others would only call in evidence to prove the suggestions of the bill, they were ready to answer; but, if they called any evidence to prove Sir John Fenwick guilty of the conspiracy by living witnesses, they took upon them to say they were not ready for that, since they did not know, whether they should be allowed the liberty of producing witnesses.' Being ordered to withdraw, the House debated the same a long time, not without many of the Members making large excursions from the matter in dispute; which made the Lord Cutts rise and say, 'That he thought it a misfortune, that a matter of this nature had held them so long; and he conceived it a thing to be wished, that every Gentleman, who spoke upon this occasion, would apply himself more closely to substance, and less to forms. That he meant to forms, considered merely as forms, for it ought to be true reason, that was convincing to them, and they ought not to tie themselves up to any forms upon this occasion, but such as were grounded upon reason. That really he had not heard any thing, that fell from any Gentleman, that shewed his doubt of the nature and aggravating circumstances of the crime of the prisoner; but that it had consisted with the great candor and justice of this House, to shew their favour to the prisoner in allowing him Counsel. That, when the Counsel said they were unprepared, if they meant they would prepare themselves for more grounds of difference and chicanery, he would not give them further time. That he could not perceive there was any reality of argument in it, and that there was in reasoning, as in religion, sometimes a form without power.' After many other speeches, the Speaker read these two questions: First, That the Counsel for Sir John Fenwick be confined to make their proof to what was suggested in the bill: And secondly, That Sir John Fenwick be allowed further time. But, neither of these questions being allowed to be put, he then proposed, That Sir John Fenwick be allowed further time to produce witnesses in his defence, against the charge of high-treason; and that he give in a list of his witnesses to the Speaker: Which question was put, and passed in the affirmative. Afterwards the Speaker put another question, That the Counsel, in managing the evidence against Sir John Fenwick, be allowed to produce evidence touching the allegations in the bill, and the treason, for which he had indicted: Which being likewise carried in the affirmative, and Sir John Fenwick acquainted from the Chair, that the House allowed him three days longer to make his defence, he being withdrawn, the Commons resolved, that the bill for attainting him of high-treason be read a second time, on Monday the 16th of November.

Accordingly, on that day, the House proceeded further on this matter. The King's Counsel produced their evidence, which was first Captain Porter, who gave an ample relation of what he knew concerning Sir John's guilt; and who, notwithstanding the Counsel for the prisoner strenuously opposed it, was further examined about his being tampered with by Carney, in order to take off his testimony in relation to the conspiracy. Then the King's Counsel produced the records of Clumax's conviction, and proceeded to Gowdman's examination, taken under the hand of Secretary Vernon, which they desired might be read. This was strongly objected to by the prisoner's Counsel, as a thing not to be allowed, and impracticable, the law requiring persons to appear, and give their evidence visa voce. Upon this, the House entered into a warm debate, but at length it was carried by two hundred and eighteen voices against a hundred and forty five, that Gowdman's information should be read; and that, afterwards, some of the Grand Jury should give an account upon what evidence they found the bill of indictment, that was brought in against Sir John Fenwick.

The next evidence, that was produced, was the record of the conviction of Mr Cowen; and, when the Counsel on both sides had spoken to it, and the House debated the same, it was carried by a hundred and eighty-one voices against a hundred and ten, that the said record should be read, and the King's Counsel allowed to examine witnesses, as to what was sworn by Gowdman at Cowen's trial. This being over, as also some questions concerning Sir John Fenwick's letter, it was resolved, That the Counsel for the prisoner might, if they had witnesses to examine on his behalf, do it that night; but that, as to their observations, the House would give them time till next morning. They, having nothing but a record to produce, accepted of this; and, on the 27th of November, made as good a defence, as their client's cause would admit; but at length being to withdraw, and the prisoner still declining to deal more clearly and candidly, in respect to his accusation of several persons of quality; it was resolved, That Mr Secretary Vernon should give in his evidence, in reference to Sir John's getting his trial delayed by offers of informations, and that in the presence of Sir John and the Counsel on both sides.

Here the Counsel having nothing to say, they were discharged from their farther attendance at that time; and, according to the order of the day, the bill being read a second time, and afterwards opened by the Speaker, and no Members rising to speak, he asked, What time should put the question of commitment? This occasioned a very long and warm debate about the extraordinary method of proceeding; the power and justice of Parliaments compared with other inferior 1696. inferior Courts of Judicature, with several precedents of former bills of attainder, and other arguments, that fell in; but upon the whole matter, towards eleven at night, it was carried by an hundred and eighty-two voices against an hundred and twenty-eight, that the bill should be committed. On the 20th of the same month, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, and several words having been offered as amendments, importing Sir John's being guilty, they were at last agreed on to be added to the bill. It was also proposed to the consideration of the said Committee, Whether the Lords Spiritual should stand in the enacting part. But, upon looking into several acts of attainder, it appeared they were mentioned in all of them in the enacting part; and so they were left to stand in the bill by general consent.

Methuen's speech for the bill.

On the 25th of November, the bill was read the third time, and the debate ran as high as it had done five days before, about the commitment.

Mr Methuen, who stood up first, took notice,

That the greatest part of the former debate had run upon two things; on the one side, the inconvenience of bills of attainder, or at least the having them so frequent; on the other side, that it is necessary to have them sometimes, that no persons might think they were out of reach, if they could evade the laws, that were made to punish ordinary offenders. That he thought both these points too general, and that this bill, as every other, ought to have its fate upon the particular circumstances of the case before the House. That whoever gave his affirmative to this bill, ought to be convinced, that Sir John Fenwick was guilty of high-treason; and also that there are extraordinary reasons, why the nation did prosecute him in so extraordinary a manner. And that he thought neither of those was sufficient alone. That if, between the indictment and trial, Goodman should have died, and there had been no other reason for attainting Sir John Fenwick but only the want of his evidence, he should not have thought it a sufficient reason, though the House should have had an opportunity of being informed of this particular evidence, and believed him guilty. That, if Sir John Fenwick did not appear guilty, he did not think any reason of state could justify this bill, though Sir John had prevaricated, and behaved himself to the dissatisfaction of every body; and therefore he thought there must be both these. That, the House having heard the evidence, he would not repeat it, but rather come to those things, that distinguished Sir John Fenwick's case; only he must take notice, that they had given Sir John liberty to make his defence, and had fully heard him; which had altered the reason of a great many precedents cited from the Lord Chief Justice Coke and other authors. That what distinguished this case was the great danger, which the nation was in from this Conspiracy, which he found, by the general opinion of all persons, was not thought yet at an end; and that there seemed likewise to be an opinion as general, that Sir John Fenwick could have contributed to their safety by a discovery. That the next circumstance was, that Sir John Fenwick knowing the expectation the nation had from him, that he could have contributed to their safety, had made use of that to put off his trial, and at last had made such a paper, as tended to the creating of new dangers. That, by this means, Sir John Fenwick, against whom there were two witnesses, when he was indicted, had delayed his trial, so that now there was but one; and there was a violent presumption, that this person was withdrawn by the practices of Sir John Fenwick's friends. That there was in his opinion as great a consideration as any of these; that the public resentment of the nation for such his behaviour was the only means, which Sir John's practice had left the House to prevent the danger, that yet remained; and it seemed necessary for their safety to come the next best way to what he would have done for them by his discovery. That there had been great doubts raised against the evidence, which had been given, not so much whether it be such evidence, as ought to incline the Commons to believe him guilty; but whether it be such as they should hear in the capacity they were in? And whether, after it was found such as it was, that is to say, not such as would convict him upon another trial, they might so far credit it, as that it should influence them to give their vote for this bill of attainder? That it was said, that the Commons were trying of Sir John Fenwick, that they were Judges and Jury, and they were obliged to proceed according to the same rules, though not the method of Westminster-Hall, secundum allegata & probata. But that the state of the matter, as it appeared to him, was, that they were in their Legislative power making a new law for the attainting of Sir John Fenwick, and for exempting his particular case from being tried in those Courts of Judicature, and, by those rules, which they had appointed for the trial of other causes; and trying of it themselves (if they would use that word, though improperly) in which case the methods differed from what the laws made by themselves require in other cases; for this was never to be a law for any other. That, this being the state of the case, it quite put the Commons out of the methods of trials, and all the laws, that are for limiting rules for evidence at trials in Westminster-Hall and other Judicatures; for it must be agreed, that the same rule of evidence must be observed in another place, as well as Westminster-Hall, that is, in impeachments; and that it had always been so taken. That the notion of two warrants being necessary had so much gained upon some Members of the House, that they had said, That this was required by the laws of nature, the universal law of nations, nay, by the eternal laws of God. That, if it was so, there would be no doubt, but it would oblige the Commons; but he thought, that the reason, why any man deserves to be punished, is, because he is criminal, let his crime be made evident any way whatsoever; for whatsoever makes the truth evident, is, and is accounted in all laws to be evidence. That the rules for examining whether any person is guilty or not, and the evidence, that is allowed as sufficient, is different in all nations. That the trials in England differ from those of all other nations, not only that the offenders are tried by a Ju-1696. ry, which is particular to this nation, but that the witnesses are to be produced face to face before the persons accused; and besides they had made laws that there should be two witnesses in cases of high-treason, wherein they were the envy of all other nations. That the evidence, which is to be given against the criminals, differs in the same nation, when the offence differs. That there is a difference between the evidence, that will convict a man of felony, and the evidence, that is to convict a man of treason; and that the evidence to convict a man of the same crime has been different in the same nation in different times. That by the common law of England, that evidence was sufficient to convict a man of any crime, which was sufficient to make the Jury believe the person guilty. That thus, before the statute of Edward IV., a man might be convicted of treason by one witness, though that statute was made upon great reasons, and appears to be for the public good by the general approbation it has received; but that he did not think in their proceedings here they were bound by it. That some Members argued thus: Shall we, who are the supreme Authority (as we are part of it) go upon less evidence to satisfy ourselves of Sir John Fenwick's guilt, than any other Court? And we shall resort to this extraordinary way in this case? To this he answered, that, if it did shake the manner of trials below, he should be very unwilling to do it; but he did take it clearly, that it could not make the least alteration in the proceedings of any Court, but, on the contrary, he thought there was no stronger argument for their resorting to this extraordinary way, than that of the care and caution, with which their law had provided for the defence of the innocent; for, if they considered all those laws, that had been made for that purpose, it was plain it must have been in the view of their ancestors, that many criminals might by this means escape. That their laws are made for ordinary trials, and for those things, that happen usually; but that there is no Government in the world, where there is not resort to extraordinary power in cases, that require it. That the English Government indeed had this advantage, that they could keep to rules, which others cannot. That in a very wise Government [that of Venice] all the ways of punishing crimes of this nature are extraordinary. That persons are condemned there not only unheard, but before they are legally accused; and that is thought necessary there, which would not be endured here; and yet that Government has continued for many hundred years, and no endeavours have been made to alter it, though so many families have suffered by it.

That the next argument was from the precedent, which the Commons were about to make; and that they had been told, What ever the other precedents had been, what they did now would be a precedent for them and their posterity. To this he replied, That, if this precedent should appear to posterity to be a precedent of an innocent man, or a person, whose guilt did not plainly appear; and this bill should be carried by a prevailing party, he did agree it was a very ill precedent. But if the case be, that this precedent would appear to posterity, upon the truth of the thing, to be a precedent made of a man most notoriously guilty; of a man, who had deserved this extraordinary way of proceeding, and this general resentment of the nation; and that nothing could have hindered this man from the common justice of the nation, but his having endeavoured to elude it in this matter; and if it appeared, that the Commons would not be put off so, but that their indignation made an example of this man, he should not be sorry it should appear to posterity; but he believed posterity would (as he thought they ought) thank them for it. That, for his own particular, while he was innocent, he should not think his life in danger to be judged by four hundred English Gentlemen, and the Peerage of England, with the Royal assent. That, when he reflected, he could not be of opinion, that the Government could have procured a Parliament to have passed a bill of attainder against my Lord Russell, or Mr Cornish, or even Mr Colledge; he did not think all the power of the Government could have prevailed to have done that, although they could prevail to have them condemned by the forms of law. That here he saw, that a great many Gentlemen had opposed every step of this bill, for making an ill precedent, though these Gentlemen did believe in their private consciences, that Sir John Fenwick was guilty. That he could not see, that any person could be in danger by such a bill; and therefore the conclusion, which he made for himself, was, That he was convinced in his conscience, that Sir John Fenwick was guilty of high-treason; and that there were reasons so extraordinary to support this bill of attainder, that he did not see how any person, who was so convinced, could refuse to give his affirmative to this bill.

This speech was answered by Sir Godfrey Copley, who, after a short preamble, said, *That it is the custom and law of this nation to require two positive witnesses to prove treason; and though he thought, without the utmost necessity, it was not prudent to deviate from that rule, yet he would not argue from thence, that the Commons were tied up to it, it being certain, that the Legislative authority, which has power to abrogate all laws now in being, cannot be tied up to any rules of human prescription; but there are the eternal rules of equity and justice, and right reason and conscience; and these he thought are unalterable, and never to be swerved from; and therefore he would take the liberty to see how far agreeable their proceedings were to these rules. That he looked upon it as a fundamental breach of these rules for an accusation to be given in against a man behind his back by he knows not whom, or by any, with whom he is not confronted and brought face to face. That he was one of those, who looked upon Sir John Fenwick to be guilty, of which there was a proof by one witness, and to this they had added an indictment, that was proved. But that he thought that to be so far from giving strength to the evidence, that, in his opinion, the injustice, which attended it, made the scales lighter than they were before. For, if any bill or writing sworn behind a* man's

1696. "man's back may be used as part of evidence, he did by parallel reason argue, that the like may make up the whole at one time or other; and then the information of every two profligate Knaves before a Secretary of State, or a Justice of Peace, should be sufficient without any living testimony, to make a man run the hazard of his life. That he was not at all convinced of the necessity of the proceeding; but as he thought those, who brought this matter to the House of Commons, wiser than himself, so he would not examine what reason they had to do it, though it was so little agreeable to him, that he wished it had not come thither. That it was not to be supposed, that the Government was in hazard by such a man as Sir John Fenwick, who was fast in Newgate; neither was it to be expected, that a man, who had been six months in prison, and nobody come to him, might make such a discovery, as might be worth their while. But, said he, suppose you had a man of invention and practice, what a spur do you put to it? May not a man of parts, when he has no other way to save himself; may not be form such a plot, as, should it gain belief, might make the best subjects in England tremble? He added, that it was not for Sir John Fenwick's life, that he argued, not thinking it of so great value to deserve so long and solemn a debate in this House, nor the consideration of so great an Assembly after this manner; but that, if this method of proceeding be warranted by an English Parliament, there is an end of the defence of any man living, be he never so innocent. That he had heard it mentioned, on the other side, that King James attainted [in Ireland] a great number of persons in a catalogue, in a lump. That he was not afraid of what arbitrary Princes did, nor an Irish Parliament; but he was afraid what should be done here, and was concerned for the honour of their proceedings, that it might be a precedent to a future Parliament in an ill reign, to do that, which he was satisfied the Commons would not now do (1)."

After these, and many other speeches, the question was put for passing the bill; and, the House dividing upon it, one hundred and eighty-nine were for the bill, and one hundred and fifty-six against it. Being then carried in the affirmative, the bill was sent up to the Lords for their concurrence. The Lords took a very extraordinary method to force their absent members to come to town. They sent messengers for them, to bring them up; which seemed to be a great breach on their dignity; for the privilege of making a proxy was an undoubted right belonging to that Peerage; but those, who intended to throw out the bill, resolved to have a full House.

The bill met with great opposition; and the debates were the warmest, and lasted the longest, of any that had ever been.

The substance of the arguments in the House of Lords, brought against this way of proceeding by bill of attainder, was, that the law was all men's security, as well as it ought to be their rule: If this was once broke through, no man was safe: Men would be presumed guilty, without legal proofs, and be run down, and destroyed by a torrent: Two witnesses seemed necessary, by an indisputable law of justice, to prove a man guilty: The law of God given to Moses, as well as the law of England, made this necessary: And, besides all former ones, the law, lately made for trials in cases of treason, was such a sacred one, that it was to be hoped, that even a Parliament would not make a breach upon it. A written deposition was no evidence, because the person accused could not have the benefit of cross-interrogating the witness; by which much false swearing was often detected: Nor could the evidence, given in one trial, be brought against a man, who was not a party in that trial: The evidence, that was offered to a Grand Jury, was to be examined all over again, at the trial; till that was done, it was not evidence. It did not appear, that Fenwick himself was concerned in the practice upon Porter: What his lady did, could not be charged on him. No evidence was brought, that Goodman was practised on; so his withdrawing himself could not be charged on Fenwick. Some very black things were proved against Goodman, which would be strong enough to set aside his testimony, tho' he were present; and that proof, which had been brought in Cooke's trial, against Porter's evidence, was again made use of, to prove, that, as he was the single witness, so he was a doubtful and suspected one: Nor was it proper, that a bill of this nature should begin in the House of Commons, which could not take examinations upon oath. These were the arguments used by the Lords, as well as the Commons, against the bill.

On the other side, Bishop Burnet being convinced, that Fenwick was guilty, and that the method of proceeding by way of attainder, was not only lawful, but, in some cases, necessary, and having, moreover, by his search into Parliamentary proceedings, on such occasions, when he wrote the History of the Reformation, seen further into those matters than otherwise he should ever have done, he thought it incumbent upon him, when his opinion determined him to the severer side, to open his reasons in justification of his vote; which he did, to this effect:

The nature of Government required, that the Legislature should be recurred to, in extraordinary cases, for which effectual provision could not be made by fixed and standing laws. Our common law grew up out of the proceedings of the Courts of law: Afterwards this, in cases of treason, was thought too loose; so the law, in this this point, was limited, first, by the famous statute in King Edward III's time; and then, by the statute of King Edward IV'th's time, the two witnesses were to be brought face to face with the person accused; and the law, lately made, had brought the method of treason to a yet further certainty. Yet, in that, as well as in the statute of Edward III, Parliamentary proceedings were still excepted. And, indeed, tho' no such provision had been expressly made in the acts themselves, the nature of Government puts always an exception in favour of the Legislative authority. The Legislature was, indeed, bound to observe justice and equity, as much, if not more, than the inferior Courts; because the supreme Court ought to set an example to all others. But they might be cause to pass over forms, as occasion should require. This was the more reasonable among us, because there was no nation in the world, besides England, that had not recourse to torture, when the evidence was probable, but defective. That was a mighty restraint, and struck a terror into all people; and the freest Government, both ancient and modern, thought they could not subsist without it. At present, the Venetians have their Civil Jurisdictions, and the Grisons have their High Courts of Justice, which act without the forms of law, by the absolute trust, that is reposed in them; such as the Romans reposed in Dictators, in the time of their liberty. England had neither torture, nor any unlimited Magistrate in it's constitution; and therefore, upon great emergencies, recourse must be had to the supreme Legislature. Forms are necessary in subordinate cases; but there is no reason to tie up the supreme one by them. This method of attainder had been practised among us at all times. It is true, what was done in this way at one time, was often reversed at another; but that was the effect of the violence of the times, and was occasioned often, by the injustice of those attainers. The attainers of inferior Courts were, upon the like account, often reversed: But, when Parliamentary attainers went upon good grounds, though without observing the forms of law, they were never blamed, not to say condemned. When poisoning was first practised in England, and put in a pot of porridge in the Bishop of Rocheſter's house, this, which was only felony, was, by a special law, made to be high-treason; and a new punishment was appointed by act of Parliament. The poisoner was boiled alive. When the Nun of Kent pretended to visions, to oppose K. Henry VIII'th's divorce, and his second marriage; and said, If he married again, he should not live long after it, but should die a villain's death; this was judged in Parliament to be high-treason; and she and her accomplices suffered accordingly. After that, there passed many attainers in that reign, only upon depositions, that were read in both Houses of Parliament. It is true, these were much blamed; and there was great cause for it: There were too many of them; for this extreme way of proceeding is to be put in practice but seldom, and upon great occasions; whereas many of these went upon slight grounds, such as the suffering some passionate and indecent words, or the using some embroidery in garments and coats of arms with an ill intent. But that, which was indeed execrable, was, that persons in prison were attainted, without being heard in their defence. This was so contrary to natural justice, that it could not be enough condemned. In King Edward VI'th's time, the Lord Seymour was attainted in the same manner, only with this difference, that the witnesses were brought to the bar, and there examined; whereas formerly they proceeded upon some depositions, that were read to them. At the Duke of Somerset's trial, which was both for high-treason and for felony, in which he was acquitted of the treason, but found guilty of the felony, depositions were only read against him; but the witnesses were not brought face to face, as he pressed they might be. Upon which it was, that the following Parliament enacted, that the accusers (that is, the witnesses) should be examined face to face, if they were alive. In Queen Elizabeth's time, the Parliament went out of the method of law, in all the steps of their proceedings against the Queen of Scots. It is true, there were no Parliamentary attainers in England during that long and glorious reign, upon which those, who opposed the bill, had insisted much; yet that was only, because there then was no occasion here in England for any such bill. But in Ireland, where some things were notoriously true, which yet could not be legally proved, that Government was forced to have, on many different occasions, recourse to this method. In King James I's time, those, who were concerned in the Gun-powder plot, and chose to be killed, rather than taken, were by act of Parliament attainted after their death; which the Courts of law could not do, since, by our law, a man's crimes die with himself; for this reason, because he cannot make his own defence, nor can his children do it for him. The famous attainer of the Earl of Strafford, in King Charles I's time, has been much and justly censured, not so much because it passed by bill, as because of the injustice of it. He was accused for having said, upon the House of Commons refusing to grant the subsidies, which the King had asked, That the King was absolved from all the rules of Government, and might make use of force to subdue this Kingdom. These words were proved only by one witness, all the rest of the Council, who were present, deposing, that they remembered no such words, and were positive, that the debate ran only upon the war with Scotland; so that though this Kingdom, singly taken, must be meant of England, yet it might well be meant of that Kingdom, which was the subject then of the debate. Since then the words were capable of that favourable sense, and that both he, who spoke them, and they, who heard them, affirmed, that they were meant and understood in that sense, it was a most pernicious precedent, first to take them in the most odious sense possible, and then to destroy him, who said them, upon the testimony of one single exceptionable witness. Whereas if, upon the Commons refusing to grant the King's demand, he had plainly advised the King to subdue his people by force, it is hard to tell, what the Parliament might not justly have done, or would not do again in the like case. In King Charles II's time some of the most eminent of the Regicides were attainted, after they were dead; and in King James's time the Duke of Monmouth was attainted by bill. These last attainers had their first beginning in the House of Commons. Thus it appeared, that, these last two hundred years, not to mention much antienter precedents, the

1696. nation had upon extraordinary occasions proceeded in this Parliamentary way by bill. There were also many precedents of this method. And whereas it was said, that an ill Parliament might carry these too far, it is certain, that the nation, and every person in it, must be safe, when they are in their own hands, or in those of a Representative chosen by themselves. As, on the other hand, if that be ill chosen, there is no help for it; the nation must perish, for it is by their own fault. They have already too many precedents for this way of proceeding, if they intend to make an ill use of them. But a precedent is only a ground or warrant for the like proceeding upon the like occasion. Two rules were laid down for all bills of this nature; first, that the matter be of a very extraordinary nature. Lesser crimes had better be passed over than punished by the Legislature. Of all the crimes, that can be contrived against the nation, certainly the most heinous one is, that of bringing in a foreign force to conquer us. This ruins both us and our posterity for ever. Distractions at home, how fatal soever, even though they should end ever so tragically, as ours once did in the murder of the King and in a military usurpation, yet were capable of a crisis and a cure. In the year 1660, we came again to our wits, and all was set right again. Whereas there is no prospect, after a foreign conquest, but of slavery and misery. And, how black soever the assassinating a King must needs appear, yet a foreign conquest is worse; it is assassinating the Kingdom; and therefore the inviting and contriving that must be the blackest of crimes. But, as the importance of the matter ought to be equal to such an unusual way of proceeding, so the certainty of the facts ought to be such, that, if the defects in legal proof are to be supplied, yet this ought to be done upon such grounds, as make the fact charged appear so evidently true, that though a Court of law could not proceed upon it, yet no man could raise in himself a doubt concerning it. Antiently treason was judged as a felony still is, upon such presumptions, as satisfied the Jury. The law has now limited this to two witnesses brought face to face. But the Parliament may still take that liberty, which is denied to inferior Courts, of judging this matter, as an ordinary Jury does in a case of felony. In the present case there was one witness viva voce, upon whose testimony several persons had been condemned, and had suffered; and these neither at their trial, nor at their death, disproved or denied any circumstance of his depositions. If he had been too much a libertine in the course of his life, that did not destroy his credit as a witness. In the first trial this might have made him a doubtful witness; but what had happened since had destroyed the possibility even of suspecting his evidence. A party had been in interest concerned to inquire into his whole life, and in the present case had full time for it; and every circumstance of his deposition had been examined; and yet nothing had been discovered, that could so much as create a doubt. All was still untouched, sound, and true. The only circumstance, in which the dying speeches of those, who suffered on his evidence, seemed to contradict him, was concerning King James's Commission; yet none of them denied really what Porter had deposed, when was, that Charneck told him, that there was a Commission come from King James for attacking the Prince of Orange's Guards. They only denied, that there was a Commission for assassinating him. Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins were condemned for the confederacy now given in evidence against Sir John Fenwick. They died not denying it. On the contrary they justified all they had done. It could not be supposed, that, if there had been a tittle in the evidence that was false, they should both have been so far wanting to themselves and to their friends, who were to be tried upon the same evidence, as not to have declared it in the solemnest manner. These things were more undeniably certain than the evidence of ten witnesses could possibly be. Witnesses might conspire to swear a falsehood; but, in this case, the circumstances took away the possibility of a doubt. And therefore the Parliament, without taking any notice of Geoffrard's evidence, might well judge Fenwick guilty; for no man could doubt of it in his own mind. The ancient Romans were very jealous of their liberty; but how exact soever they might be in ordinary cases, yet, when any of their citizens seemed to have a design of making himself King, they either created a Dictator, to suppress or destroy him, or else the people proceeded against him in a summary way. By the Porcian law, no citizen could be put to death for any crime whatsoever; yet such regard did the Romans pay to justice, even above law, that, when the Campanian legion had perfidiously broke in upon Regium, and pillaged it, they put them all to death for it. In the famous case of Catalin's conspiracy, as the evidence was clear, and the danger extreme, the accomplices in it were executed, notwithstanding the Porcian law. And this was done by the order of the Senate, without either hearing them make their own defence, or admitting them to claim the right, which the Valerian law gave them, of an appeal to the people, yet that whole proceeding was chiefly directed by the two greatest asserters of public liberty, that ever lived, Cato and Cicero. And Cæsar, who opposed it on pretence of it's being against the Porcian law, was for that reason suspected of being in the confederacy. It appeared afterwards, how little regard he had, either to law or liberty, though, upon this occasion, he had made use of the one to protect those, who were in a plot against the other.

This last expression was much repented by those, who were against the bill, as carrying a severe reflection upon them for opposing it; and indeed the Bishop, though he only offered what reasons occurred to him to justify his voting for the bill, fell under a great load of censure on this occasion.

In conclusion, the bill passed by a small majority of seven voices only, there being sixty-eight for it, and sixty-one against it (1).

The

fellows) entered their protest, which they grounded on the following reasons: "1. Because bills of attainder are contrary to the Magna Charta."

1696-7. The bill, soon after, received the Royal assent; and, at the same time, passed an act to attain such persons as were concerned in the late conspiracy, who had fled from justice, unless they came in within a limited time, and also for continuing several others of the Conspirators in custody. Sir John Fenwick made all possible application to the King for a reprieve; and, as a main ground for that, and, for an article of merit, he alledged, that he had saved the King's life two years before. It seems, he pretended, that, when the Jacobites, after Charnock's return from France, had resolved to assassinate the King, before he went to Heiland; and had acquainted him with their design; that, he assured them, he would discover it, if they did not promise to lay it aside. But, as this fact could not be proved, so it could confer no obligation on the King, since he had given him no warning of his danger; and, according to his own story, had trusted the Conspirators words very easily, when they promised to pursue their design no further; which he had no reason to do. So that this pretension was not much considered. But he was pressed to make a full discovery; and, for some days, he seemed to be in some suspense, what course to take. He desired to be secured, that nothing, which he confessed, should turn to his own prejudice. The House of Lords sent an address to the King, intreating, that they might be at liberty to make him their promise; and that was readily granted. He then farther desired, that, upon making a full confession, he might be assured of a pardon, without being obliged to become a witness against any other person. To this the Lords answered, That he had to do with men of honour; and that he must trust to their discretion: That they would mediate for him with the King, in proportion as they should find his discoveries sincere and important: His behaviour to the King, hitherto, had not been such, as to induce the Lords to trust to his candor; it was much more reasonable, that he should trust to them. Upon this, all hopes of any discoveries from him were laid aside; and Sir John Fenwick prepared himself to die. He desired the assistance of a Divine; and the Government offered him the choice of any Clergyman, that had taken the oaths; or, if that would not do, of any of the Bishops, who had dissented about the bill of attainder; all whom he would not admit. Then three or four Nonjuring Clergymen were offered him; but they would not come to him, pretending a fear that the oaths would be tendered to them. Dr White, the Nonjuring Bishop of Chichester, was, at last, offered him. In this, and several other matters, Bishop Burnet did him such service, that Sir John wrote him a letter of thanks. He was beheaded on Tower-Hill, on the 28th of January; and died very composed, and in a much better temper than was to be expected, for his life had been very irregular. At the place of execution, he delivered a paper, in writing, to the Sheriff; wherein he did not deny the facts that had been sworn against him; but complained of the injustice of the procedure; and left his thanks to those who had voted against the bill. He owned his loyalty to King James, and to the Prince of Wales, after him; but mentioned the design of assassinating King William, in terms full of horror. The paper was supposed to have been drawn by Bishop White, and the Jacobites were much provoked with the last-mentioned paragraph (1).

During

against persons in prison, and who are therefore liable to be tried by common law, are of dangerous consequence to the lives of the subjects, and may tend to the subversion of the laws of the Kingdom. 2. Because the evidence of Grand Jury-men, of what was sworn before them against Sir John Fenwick, as also the evidence of the Petty Jury-men, was admitted here; both which are against the rules of law, besides, that they disagreed in their testimony. 3. Because the information of Goodman in writing was received, which by law was not admitted, and the prisoner, for want of appearing face to face, (as is by law required) could not have the advantage of cross-examining him. And it did not appear by evidence, that Sir John Fenwick, or any person employed by him, had any way persuaded Goodman to withdraw himself; and it would be of very dangerous consequence, that any person so accused should be condemned; for by this means a witness, who should be found insufficient to convict a man, shall have more power to hurt a man by his absence, than if he were produced viva voce against him. 4. Because, if Goodman had appeared against him, he was intamous in the whole course of his life, and could not be a good witness, especially in cases of blood. 5. Because in this case there was but one evidence, viz. Porter, and he a very doubtful one. Lastly, Because Sir John Fenwick was so inconsiderable a man, as to endangering the peace of the Government, that there was no necessity of proceeding against him in so extraordinary a manner. The year following a pamphlet was published in justification of that bill, under the title of, A Letter to a Friend, in vindication of the proceedings against Sir John Fenwick, by bill of attainder, with some remarks on his printed paper.

(1) The paper was as follows:

* Speaking nor writing was never my talent, I shall therefore give a very short but faithful account; first of my Religion, and next what I suffer most innocently for, to avoid the calumnies I may reasonably expect, my enemies will cast upon me when dead, since they have most falsely and maliciously aspersed me, whilst under my misfortune.

* As for my Religion, I was brought up in the Church of England, as it is by law established, and have ever professed it; though I confess, I have been an unworthy Member of it, in not living up to the strict and excellent rules thereof; for which I take shame to myself, and humbly ask forgiveness of God. I come now to die in that Communion, trusting as an humble and hearty penitent to be received by the mercy of God, through the merits of Jesus Christ my Saviour.

* My Religion taught me my loyalty, which I bless God is untainted; and I have ever endeavoured in the station, wherein I have been placed, to the utmost of my power to support the Crown of England in the true and lineal course of descent without interruption.

* As for what I am now to die, I call God to witness, I went not to that meeting in Leadenhall-Street, with any such intention, as to invite King James by force to invade this nation; nor was I myself provided with either horse or arms, or engaged for any number of men, or gave particular consent for any such invasion, as is most falsely sworn against me.

* I do also declare in the presence of God, that I knew nothing of King James's intending coming to Calais, nor of any invasion intended from thence, till 1696-7. During Fenwick's affair, a design was carried on against the Duke of Shrewsbury, which, but for its singular circumstances, hardly deserves to be mentioned. There was one Matthew Smith, nephew to Sir William Perkins. He had been Captain of an Independent Company at Windfor, and commanded all the time of King William's being there, when he first came to England. Upon the disbanding of the Independent Companies, he received a Commission in the Duke of Norfolk's regiment; but was soon after dismissed the service; which threw him into the disaffected party. But he pretended, that, when he found, that King James's interests were no way to be supported, but by invasions from the French, and by assassinations of the King, his duty to his country, and the horror of such attempts, made him resolve, as much as in him lay, to disappoint such designs. Accordingly, he applied himself to the Duke of Shrewsbury's office, pretending, that he could make great discoveries; and that he knew all the motions and designs of the Jacobites. He sent many dark and ambiguous letters to that Duke's Under-Secretary, which were, more properly, to be called amusements, than discoveries (1): For he gave only hints and scraps of stories; and, though he had got a promise not to be made a witness, yet he never offered any other witness, nor told where any of those, whom he informed against, were lodged, or how they might be taken. He was always asking more money, and boasting what he could do, if he were well supplied; and he seemed to think he never had enough. It is true, before the conspiracy broke out, he had given such hints, that, when it was discovered, it appeared he must have known much more of it, than he thought fit to tell. The Duke till it was publicly known. And the only notion I had, that something might be attempted, was from the Thoulon fleet coming from Brest.

I also call God to witness, that I received the knowledge of what is contained in those papers, that I gave to a great man, that came to me in the Tower, both from letters and messages, that came from France; and he told me, when I read them to him, that the Prince of Orange had been acquainted with most of those things before.

I might have expected mercy from that Prince, because I was instrumental in saving his life; for, when, about April 1695, an attempt against him came to my knowledge, I did partly by dissuasions, and partly by delays, prevent the design; which I suppose was the reason, that the last villainous project was concealed from me.

If there be any person, whom I have injured in word, or deed, I heartily pray their pardon, and beg of God to pardon those, who with great zeal have sought my life, and brought the guilt of my innocent blood upon this nation, no treason being proved upon me.

I return my most hearty thanks to those noble and worthy persons, who gave me their assistance by opposing this bill of attainder, without which it had been impossible I could have fallen under the sentence of death. God bless them and their posterity; though I am fully satisfied they pleaded their own cause, while they defended mine.

I pray God to bless my true and lawful Sovereigns King James and the Queen, and Prince of Wales; and restore him and his posterity to this Throne again, for the peace and prosperity of this nation, which is impossible to prosper till the Government is settled upon a right foot.

And now, O God, I do with all humble devotion commend my soul into thy hands, the great maker and preserver of men, and lover of souls; beseeching thee, that it may be always dear and precious in thy sight, through the merits of my Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

(1) These letters were published by Smith himself, in 1697, under the title of Memoirs of secret services. He begins with minutes of the 2d of September 1694, with the Duke of Shrewsbury, informing him that King James designed to invade England in the spring of the year 1693; but that a difference happened between the Jacobites here, which arose upon occasion of that King's Declaration of the 17th of April 1693, by which the Papists were put out of hopes of command, in case that King should be restored. That this Declaration was obtained by a party called Compounders, who promised, upon the granting that declaration, to restore King James in a very short time. That this King was very much averse to the signing it; that it was drawn here in England, and carried over by the Lord Middleton, who declared, that, upon King James's landing, that the Lord Melfort, and his consent to the declaration, the Compounders would perform their promise. That the French King was wrought upon by the interest, which the Compounders made with one of his Secretaries (who was a public enemy to the Lord Melfort, and to his way of proceeding) to persuade King James to sign that declaration, notwithstanding his disinclination to it. That the Compounders made several terms with that King, and some of them were to be made Trustees, as they styled themselves, of the nation, for King James's performance of what he had promised in that declaration. That upon this the Jacobites divided into factions, the one styled Compounders; the other, called Melfordians, who joined with the Papists to restore their King without terms, with sword in hand. That, upon the Compounders's failure of promise as to the time of restoring the King, he took himself to be acquitted from standing to that declaration drawn up by them; and now hearkened to the Melfordians; and, though Melfort was publicly laid aside, yet he still acted behind the curtain, and nothing was valued, unless recommended by him, while Middleton was only the shadow of a Secretary. That, in spring 1693, great application had been made to King James to come over, who accordingly gave the Melfordian faction great hopes. That the Compounding party, getting knowledge of it, laboured to prevent it, by reason that their measures were not fully concerted, and therefore sent to the French King, to let him know, that it would be in vain to do it that spring, because the English fleet was in such readiness, that they could fit out fifty-eight men of war in a fortnight's time; so that the design went off with a promise to stir the year after. That, when Melfort seemed to leave all business, and retire from the Court at St Germain's, every one complimented and waited on him to his coach, except the Lord Griffin and David Lloyd, they being great Compounders, and of Middleton's faction. That Sir James Montgomery was of the Compounding party, and that they helped him to make his escape; for, he being a timorous man, they were afraid of his confessing. Then Smith proceeds to make several discoveries, which are much the same, with those mentioned in the account of the plot. These memoirs were immediately animadverted upon, by Mr Richard Kingston, in his Modest Answer to Captain Smith's immodest Memoirs, wherein he endeavours to shew, that these memoirs were not written by the Captain, but by Mr Thomas Brown a stiff Jacobite, and mercenary poet. That they were published and dispersed at the charge of the party, and the letters were so altered and interpolated, that they were not the same with the originals, sent to the Earl of Shrewsbury, and that the substance of the memoirs were mere fables of improbabilities, incongruities and invented futilities.

1696-7. Duke of Shrewsbury acquainted the King with his discoveries; but nothing could then be made, either of them, or of him. When the whole plot was unravelled, it was manifest, from his letters, that he must have known more of it, than he would own; but he still claimed the promise before made him, that he should not be a witness. Upon the whole, therefore, he rather deserved a severe punishment, than any of those rewards, which he pretended to. He was accordingly dismissed by the Duke of Shrewsbury, who thought, that even this suspicious behaviour of his did not release him from keeping the promises, which he had made to him. Captain Smith hereupon went to the Earl of Monmouth, afterwards Earl of Peterborough, and possessed him with bad impressions of the Duke of Shrewsbury, and found him much inclined to entertain them. He told him, that he had made great discoveries, of which the Duke would take no notice; and, because the Duke's ill health had obliged him to go into the country two days before the assassination was intended, he put this construction upon it, that he was willing to be out of the way, when the King was to be murdered. To fix this imputation, he shewed the Earl the copies of all his letters; all which, but the last, more especially, had the face of a great discovery (1). The Earl of Monmouth carried this to Court; and it made such an impression there, that the Earl of Portland sent Captain Smith money, and entertained him as a Spy; but never could, by his means, learn any one real piece of intelligence. When this happened, the King was just going beyond the sea; so Captain Smith's letters were taken and sealed up by the King's order, and left in the hands of Sir William Trumbull, who was the other Secretary of State. This matter lay quiet, till Fenwick began to make discoveries; and, when the Earl of Monmouth understood, that he had not named himself (about which he expressed too vehement a concern) but that he had named the Duke of Shrewsbury, it was said, that he entered into a negotiation with the Dukes of Norfolk, that she should, by Sir John Fenwick's Lady, encourage him to persist in his discoveries; and that he dictated some paper to the Dukes, that should be offered to him as an additional one; in which many little stories were related, which had been told the King, and might be believed by him; and by these the King might have been disposed to believe the rest of Fenwick's paper. And the whole ended in some discoveries concerning Smith, which would naturally occasion his letters to be called for, and then they would probably have great effect. The Dukes of Norfolk declared, that he had dictated all these schemes of His to her, who copied them, and handed them to Sir John Fenwick, and that he had left one paper with her. It was short, but contained an abstract of the whole design, and referred to a larger one, which he had only dictated to her. The Dukes said, that she had placed a Gentlewoman, who carried her messages to Fenwick's Lady, to overhear all that passed; so that she both had another witness to support the truth of what she related, and a paper left by him with her. She said, that Fenwick would not be guided by him, and declared, he would not meddle with contrived discoveries. That thereupon the Earl of Monmouth was highly provoked: He said, That, if Sir John would follow his advice, he would certainly save him; but, if he would not, he would get the bill to pass. And indeed, when that matter was depending, he spoke two full hours in the House of Lords, in favour of the bill, with a peculiar vehemence, Fenwick's Lady, being much provoked at this, got her nephew, the Earl of Carlisle, to move the Lords, that her husband might be examined concerning any advices, that had been sent him with relation to his discoveries; and upon this Sir John told him what his Lady had brought him, and thereupon the Dukes of Norfolk and her Confident were likewise interrogated, and gave the account, which has been related. In conclusion, Captain Smith's letters were read, and he himself was examined. This held the Lords several days; for the Earl of Portland, by the

(1) When Smith complained to the Lords, intimating, that the Duke of Shrewsbury intended to stifle his informations, the House sent to the Duke in the country, to know what passed between him and Smith, which the Duke acquainted them in the following letter to the Lord-Keeper:

My Lord,

Esford, 15 Jan. 1696.

' Having received the commands of the House of Lords, to lay before their Lordships what letters I received from one Smith in February last, or, in case I kept none, then to acquaint the House with what I can remember was contained in them, I am very sorry not to be able so fully to comply with their Lordships directions, as I wish I could. For having heard long since, that this man did pretend to great merit for his discoveries, and, had on several occasions, in a very unhandsome manner, complained of me, I did then endeavour to collect what letters he had sent me, that I might judge how his intelligence appeared, when put together; for, as it came to me, I could make little of it. But I found I could retrieve so few, and those generally of an old date, when I had more value for his intelligence, than I had afterwards, that I am almost certain I have none of those letters left, which their Lordships defire to see. I shall therefore apply myself to give them the best account of what he did inform me, that is most material at this time; which I am the better able to collect, because several things he then mentioned fell out so true, that I was surprised how he could know them, and not more, till I understood he had his intelligence from one Hevet, a youth, that lived with Major Holmes's brother, I think, and was about that time often employed to wait on Sir George Barclay; by which means he had opportunity to guess or over-hear particulars, which otherwise, I suppose, he might not be trusted with. I remember in winter Smith wrote very positively of an invasion intended from France, which was to break out at the arrival of the Thetford fleet; and that many Gentlemen of quality and Officers were sent from St Germain's on that design. He named Sir Henry Brynne, my Lord Mantague's brother, at one time; at another Sir George Barclay, Hobart, Countess, and others. Then he gave him a great design, which he should soon discover the bottom of; and afterwards grew more particular, that it was to seize the King's Person, and named Barclay, Charnock, Holmes, and others, as employed in the villainy; and that, at the same hour this was to be executed, the way was to be taken to all the Counties of England. He was different in 1696-7. the King's orders, produced all Smith's papers. By them it appeared, that he was a very insignificant spy, who was always insinuating in his old strain of asking money, and taking no care to deserve it.

The Earl of Monmouth was, upon the accusation and evidence above-mentioned, sent to the Tower, and turned out of all his employments. But the Court had no mind to have the matter farther examined into; for the King spoke to Bishop Burnet, to do all he could to soften the Earl's censure, which he did. The Lords were much set against him, and seemed resolved to go great lengths. To allay that heat, the Bishop, who did not know what new scheme of confusion might have been opened by him, in his own excuse, put the House in mind, that he set the Revolution on foot, and was a great promoter of it, coming twice over to Holland, to that purpose; he then moved, that he might be sent to the Tower. This was agreed to, and he lay there till the end of the Session, and was removed from all his places: But that loss, as was believed, was secretly made up to him, for the Court was resolved not to lose him intirely.

After Fenwick's business was over, the Parliament, to the great satisfaction of the people, took care to remedy a public grievance of long standing. Several places in and about the City of London, which, in the times of the Romish superstition, were allowed as sanctuaries to criminals and debtors, had, ever since the Reformation, pretended a privilege to protect the latter; and one of these, called White Friars, was become a notorious receptacle of broken and desperate men, in the very heart of the Metropolis, whither they resorted in great numbers, and, to the dishonour of the Government, and great prejudice of the People, defended themselves with force and violence against the law and public authority. This intolerable mischief the Parliament redressed by an act for the more effectual relief of creditors in cases of escapes, and for preventing abuses in prisons and pretended privileged places; wherein such effectual provision was made to reduce those outlaws, that, immediately after the act was published, they abandoned their posts to better inhabitants. An act also passed for the relief of creditors, by which they were enabled to make compositions with their debtors, in case two thirds, in number and value, did agree: But this act was repealed the next Session.

Towards the beginning of this Session, the Commons, having taken notice of the late miscarriages of the fleet, ordered, that Sir George Rooke should attend the House, to give an account, why the French Toulon Squadron was not intercepted in going to Brest? That Admiral attended accordingly, and afterwards produced copies both of his journal, and of the orders, which he had received from the Admiralty; which being examined, it was ordered, that Sir Cloudesly Shovel should lay before the House copies of all such orders, as he had received, in order to the joining Sir George Rooke. Which being done, and much time spent in both Houses about this affair, it did not appear, that either of these Admirals had failed in their duty.

On the 16th of April, the King came to the House of Lords, to put an end to this long Session, and made the following speech to both Houses:

The Parliament prorogued.
Pr. H. C.
III. 73.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

‘ Having given my assent to the several bills you have presented to me, I am now to return you my hearty thanks for what you have done this Session, which has been carried on with great prudence, temper, and affection.

‘ At the opening of the Session I told you, how sensible I was of the difficulties to be struggled with, which were of such a nature, that I will freely own the hopes, I had of your being able to overcome them, were founded only upon the wisdom and zeal of so good a Parliament.

‘ My expectation has been fully answered. You entered upon the business with so much cheerfulness, proceeded so unanimously, and have at last brought things to such a conclusion, that we may hope to carry on the war with success, in case our enemies do not think it their interest to agree to an honourable peace. And so effectual a provision being made for supplying the deficiencies of former funds (which is the best foundation for re-establishing of credit) I doubt not, but, in a short

‘ his accounts about the manner of seizing the King. Sometimes Mr Lattin's lodge near Richmond was to be attacked, and the walls scaled by foot, whilst he was there. Sometimes an attempt of the like nature was to be made at Kensington house; and at other times the King was to be set upon going to, or coming from hunting. Near to the day the assassination was intended, he was very earnest for money to buy a horse and equipage; upon which I desired Mr Vernon to talk with him, if he knew of his own knowledge any person engaged in such a design; for, being never able to bring any thing in confirmation of what he asserted, from whom he had it, or what time it was to be executed, I supposed there was no truth in the story; or, if there were, I might possibly have set him to be engaged in it. He gave Mr Vernon no satisfaction upon discoursing with him, but proceeded in his promises to him, that nothing could be attempted, but he would give me an account. When the whole was brought to light, and it appeared he was not enough Numb. XXIII. Vol. III.

‘ in the secret to have prevented it, I intended notwithstanding to have done something for him, and at his own desire concealed his name, to give him an opportunity, as he pretended, to apprehend Chambers. In the mean time I had an account, that in very public places he began to threaten that he would complain of me to the Parliament; whereupon I neither thought it safe nor decent to have any more to do with him.

‘ What I received, relating to the attempt on his Majesty's Person or the invasion, I always gave the King an account, whilst I was able to wait on him; but, being much indisposed, I had his Majesty's leave to go into the country for a few days, where I remained, till I was commanded back, upon the happy discovery of that horrid design.

‘ This, my Lord, is all I can collect to the subject of their Lordships were pleased to command. I beg the favour it may be communicated to the House, and am, &c.’

U u u u

1697. ' short time, it will have a very happy effect, ' to the universal ease and satisfaction of my ' people.

' The circumstances of affairs making it necessary for me to be out of the Kingdom for some time, I shall take care to leave the Administration of the Government, during my absence, in the hands of such persons, as I can depend upon.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

' I have nothing more to ask of you, but ' that you carry down the same good disposition ' into your several countries, which you have ' expressed in all the proceedings of this Session.'

And then the Lord-Keeper prorogued the Parliament to the 13th day of May.

Besides the acts passed this Session, the Commons sent a bill to the Lords, limiting elections to future Parliaments, that none should be chosen, but those who had such a proportion of estate or money; the Lords rejected it: They thought it reasonable to leave the Nation to their freedom, in choosing their Representatives in Parliament: It seemed both unjust and cruel, if a poor man had so fair a reputation, as to be chosen, notwithstanding his poverty, by those, who were willing to pay him wages, that he should be branded with an incapacity, because of his small estate. Corruption in elections was to be apprehended from the rich, rather than from the poor. Another bill was sent up by the Commons, but rejected by the Lords, prohibiting the importation of all E. I. India silks, and Bengals: This was proposed, to encourage the silk manufacture at home; and petitions were brought for it by great multitudes, in a very tumultuary way; but the Lords had no regard to that.

The House of Commons taking offence at an advertisement in the Flying-Post, tending to destroy the credit and currency of the Exchequer bills, that were going to be issued out, a bill was brought in by Mr Pulteney, to prevent the publishing any news without licence. This bill, in the heat of their resentment, was read the first time, but thrown out before a second reading; because, though they saw the mischiefs of the liberty of the press, they knew not where to fix the restraint.

As the time for opening the treaty for a general peace drew near, the King appointed the Earl of Pembroke, Viscount Villiers, and Sir Joseph Williamson, his Plenipotentiaries to treat with France; and, in the Earl of Pembroke's absence, Sir Thomas Mompesson, Sir Charles Cotterel, junior, and Mr James Tyrrel were to execute the office of Privy-seal.

The Lord Galway (created an Earl) the Marquis of Winchester and Viscount Villiers were made Lords Justices of Ireland; and Mr Methuen, Chancellor of that Kingdom, in the room of Sir Charles Porter, deceased.

Apr. 14.

The King, to return the compliment of the State of Venice, appointed the Earl of Montagu 1697.

ter his Ambassador Extraordinary to that State.

The Earl had always appeared zealous in the cause of liberty, and had, at his own expence, accompanied the King as a volunteer, with a very handsome retinue into Ireland; and was in the battle of the Boyne, at the siege of Limerick, and, after the reduction of Ireland, was made Captain of the band of Yeomen of the Guards. At the same time, Sir James Ryshout was sent Ambassador to Turky, and Sir Lambert Blackwell (knighted on that occasion) Envoy to Tuscany.

About a month before, the Earl of Aylesbury, Feb. 12. who (as said before) was committed to the Tower, on account of the late plot, was brought by Habeas Corpus to the Court of King's-Bench, and released upon bail; but the Lord Moulgomery, committed on the same account, was denied that favour and remanded to Newgate.

The Lord Berkley, of Stratton, who had fig- Feb. 28. nalized himself in several enterprizes in the channel, died of a pleurisy and fever, caused by hard drinking, in company with several other Nobles, who were also like to have suffered by it. Upon the Lord Berkley's death, his regiment of Marines was given to Sir Cloudesly Shovel.

The Earl of Dorset resigned the office of Lord Apr. 19. Chamberlain, which he had enjoyed ever since the Revolution. He was a generous good-natured man, Barnet. He was so oppressed with phlegm, that, till he was a little heated with wine, he scarce ever spoke: But he was, upon that exaltation, a very lively man. Never was so much ill nature in a pen, as in his, joined with so much good nature, as was in himself, even to excess; for he was against all punishing, even of malefactors. He was bountiful, even to run himself into difficulties, and charitable to a fault, for he commonly gave all he had about him, whenever he met an object that moved him. But he was so lazy, that though King Charles II seemed to court him to be a Favourite, he would not give himself the trouble that belonged to that post. He hated the Court, and despised that King, when he saw he was neither generous, nor tender-hearted. He was succeeded in his office by the Earl of Sunderland, who was soon after sworn of the Privy-council, and was now in as great favour, as he had been in the former reigns.

About the same time, the Lord-Keeper So- Apr. 22. mers was made Lord High-Chancellor, and Baron of Evesham in Worcestershire.

The same day, the King appointed a Regen- The King appoints a Regency during his absence (1), and, two days after leaving Kensington, he embarked, the 26th of April, at Margate for Holland, where he arrived the next day.

The great transaction of this year was the treaty of a general peace. The chief of the English Plenipotentiaries was the Earl of Pembroke. and abstracted in his notions. He had great application, but had lived a little too much out of the world, though in a public station. There 1697. was somewhat in his person and manner that created him an universal respect, for there was no man whom all sides honoured so much as they did him. In this affair were joined with him the Lord Villiers and Sir Joseph William-son, as was before said. The Plenipotentiaries, named by France, were Harlay, Crey, and Callieres. The first difficulty that arose was about the place of congress, the Emperor proposing either Mentz or Francfort, and the Dutch, with most of their Allies, insisting upon a place in Holland. It was expected, that either Maestricht, Nimeguen, or Breda, would have been chosen; but, towards the middle of January, Callieres, by his Master's orders, moved that the Plenipotentiaries of the Allies, who were now at the Hague, should reside there, and those of France at Delft, where they were at this time; and that the conferences should be held at a palace belonging to King William, all which was agreed to. This palace was called Newburg-House, because a Duke of Newburg laid the first stone when it was in building by Frederic Henry Prince of Orange. No place could be more proper for the purpose, being situated between the Hague and Delft: close by the village of Ryswick.

The French were resolved to have a peace at any rate; not so much on account of the difficulties of carrying on the war, the decay of their trade, and their heavy taxes, but chiefly from another motive. The King of Spain's illness, and the succession to his dominions, to which the French King had an eye, was the principal cause of his desiring a peace. He knew, that as long as the war continued, and the Grand Confederacy remained entire, his design could not be accomplished; and therefore he hastened the conclusion of the treaty, that he might have his hands free to fall upon Spain, the moment his Catholic Majesty died, which he might easily do before a new league could be formed against him. Accordingly, as the King of Spain's sickness increased, the French King offered advantageous terms, giving the Allies more than could be expected, considering his conquests and force; and would have offered still more, if all the Allies had been of the Emperor's mind, to require a greater number of restitutions.

The interests of the Emperor were entirely contrary to those of the French King. He had also his eye upon Spain, and therefore it no less concerned him, that the Confederacy should remain, than it did the French King, that it should be broken. Besides, the Emperor had the more reason to excite the Confederates to pursue the war, as he hoped to be soon able to turn more forces against France. For he was going to conclude a league with Muscovy, by which the Czar was obliged to make war with all his force against the Turks and Tartars. He also hoped to have a King of Poland of his party, who might annoy the Turk in such a manner, as to force him to a peace. The negotiation of the six circles of the Rhine, to have six thousand, and, in case of need, twelve thousand men on foot, was likewise in great forwardness. For these reasons the Emperor was entirely against a peace, and did all he could to retard it.

As for England and Holland, they had no other concern in the treaty, but to secure their Allies, to settle a barrier in the Netherlands, and to get King William acknowledged. Things being in this state, after several debates, the French Plenipotentiary Callieres, on the 10th of February, in the name of his Master, consented to the following preliminaries:

I. That the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen should be the basis of this to be negotiated at Ryswick.

II. That Strasbourg should be restored to the Empire, in the same condition, as the French took it. [But here Borcel and Dyckvelt, the Dutch Plenipotentiaries, declared to the Mediator, before Callieres, that, whenever the restitution of Strasbourg was talked of, it was also added, or an equivalent at the Emperor's choice.]

III. That Luxemburg should be restored to the Spaniards in its present condition. [So likewise it was here declared in the same manner, or an equivalent to be proposed by Spain to the King of France.]

IV. That Mons and Charleroy should be surrendered as they were.

V. That all places taken by the French in Catalonia, since the peace of Nimeguen, should be restored in the same manner.

VI. That Dinant, both the city and castle, should be given up to the Bishop of Liege, as they were when taken.

VII. That all Reunions, since the treaty of Nimeguen, should be made void.

VIII. That Lorraine should be restored according to the conditions of that treaty; but farther agreed, that, in case the conditions made in respect to that country should not please, that article should be referred to the general treaty, and that it should be the first point debated in the negotiation. Here it was likewise farther agreed, that upon conclusion of the peace, the French King should acknowledge the Prince of Orange as King of Great Britain, without any manner of difficulty, restriction, condition, or reserve; but as for other Princes, whether they were in the Confederacy or not, their pretensions should be referred to the general negotiation under the mediation of the King of Sweden (1).

Some

(1) The other Preliminaries were:

IX. That the Duchy of Deux-ponts should be restored to Sweden.

X. That Philipsburg should be given up to the Bishop of Spire.

XI. That the fort of Kiel, and other fortifications made on the Rhine, should be razed.

XII. That the same should be done by fort Louis and Hunninghen.

XIII. That Traerback and Montroyal should be given up; the first dismantled, but upon condition never to be fortified again.

XIV. That the Elector Palatine should not only be restored to all the Electorate, but also to the Duchies of Simmeren and Lautern, with the Earldom of Manheim; as also other places, whereof he had been dispossessed to the present time.

XV. That the Duchess of Orleans should not have recourse to open force to maintain her pretensions, but might bring her action according to law, in relation to the Elector.

XVI. That

1697. Some of the Ministers of the Allies, after having consulted their Masters upon these preliminaries, declared, that, as to the first article, they fully agreed to it; but, as for Strasburg, they farther insisted, that it should be restored, with it's fortifications and dependencies, and that no equivalent should be accepted. They allowed of the third, fourth, and fifth articles; only they insisted, that not only the city but the county of Luxemburg, and that of Cleyn should be given up; as they likewise did, that the city and castle of Dinant should be yielded, together with the Duchy of Bouillon, in the same state they were. They owned themselves also satisfied as to the seventh article concerning the Re-unions, but not so with the agreement made about Torrain, which they would have restored to the Duke it's Sovereign, without any manner of restriction.

Before any farther progress was made in the treaty, Charles XI, King of Sweden, who had been received as Mediator, happened to die (1). His son, the famous Charles XII, who succeeded him in his Throne, was but fifteen years old, and gave great hopes of being an active, warlike, and indefatigable Prince, which his reign did afterwards demonstrate to the world. This accident was like to retard the negotiations, but, the deceased King having appointed by his will the Queen and five of the Senators to administer the Government during his son's minority, the Regents among whom the Queen had two voices, and who had full power to make treaties, and perform all other acts of sovereignty, as should be agreed on by the major part of them, sent immediately expresses to several foreign Courts, to acquaint them with their intentions to pursue the mediation begun by the late King for the tranquillity of Christendom; and dispatched a new Commission to Monsieur Lilienroot for that purpose. Some time before it was agreed by the Plenipotentiaries at the Hague, that for the easier carrying on the treaty, all ceremonies should be laid aside; and the titles, which any Prince took, be of no consequence: That the several Ministers should have free and secure correspondence with the Princes their Masters: That, in order to this, blank passports should be given to each party for the couriers dispatched by them, as also for the packet-boats to and from England: And that the powers of the respective Plenipotentiaries should be on the same foot they were at Nimwegen.

In pursuance of the preliminaries, Monsieur Lilienroot, the Mediator, appointed the first conference to be held at Ryswick, on the 9th of May; and accordingly the Allies being met together in the apartments on one side of the palace, the French in the apartments on the other side, and the Mediator in the middle between both, the Allies and the French shewed him their powers, and gave him copies of the same which he communicated to the respective Ministers, and left the copies with them. This, and the settling part of the ceremonial in order to further proceedings, took up near three hours; and then the conference was adjourned to the 11th of the same month; when, being met again in the same manner as they did at first, the powers of the Allies were by the Mediator exchanged with the French Ambassadors. Besides, they agreed to meet constantly on Wednesdays in the morning, and Saturdays in the afternoon; and that, to prevent inconveniencies, which might arise from crowds of attendants, each Ambassador should go thither only with one coach with six horses, two pages, and two footmen. On the 15th and 18th, the Mediator and Plenipotentiaries met again; but all they did at those two conferences was only to regulate several points of ceremony; in which, for the most part, they followed the rules, that were observed at the treaty of Nimwegen.

On the 22d of May, the Imperial Plenipotentiaries delivered to the Mediator their demands in the name of the Emperor and Empire; and some of the German Ministers, at the same time, gave in the particular pretensions of the Princes their Masters. After which the Allies drew up a large deduction in justification of their claims; of which however they resolved to give the French Ambassadors no copy, till they had received

XVI. That the castle and county of Veldens should be restored to their lawful owner.

XVII. That Bisweiler should be given to the Count of Hanow.

XVIII. That the Seignories of March, Mormosy, and Dagstein, and the County of Dagsburg, should be delivered up to the Count of Overstein.

XIX. That the Seignories of Salm and Falkenstein should be given up to the Prince of Salm, or to their proprietors, seeing the same was still in question.

XX. That the Seignories of Lutzenstein and Altheim should be surrendered to their owners.

XXI. That Ottweiler should be given up to the House of Nassau.

XXII. That the city and county of Montbelliard, Harcourt, Bainmont, and Chatelette should be put into the possession of the House of Wurtemberg.

XXIII. That Gernsheim should be given up to the Elector Palatine, notwithstanding any former treaties to the contrary.

XXIV. That the Principality of Orange should be given up to it's Sovereign.

(1) He was a rough and boisterous man; he loved fatigue, and was free from vice; he reduced his Kingdom to a military state, and was ever going round it, to see how his troops were ordered, and his discipline observed: He looked narrowly into the whole Administration; he had quite altered the constitution of his Kingdom; it was formerly changed from being an Elective, to be an Hereditary Kingdom, yet, till his time, it had continued to be rather an Aristocracy, than a Monarchy; but he got the power of the Senators to be quite taken away, so that it was left free to him, to make use of such Counsellors as he should chuse; the Senators had enriched themselves, and oppressed the people; they had devoured the revenues of the Crown, and in two reigns, in which the Sovereign was long in a state of infancy, both in Queen Christina's and in this King's time, the Senators had taken care of themselves, and had stripped the Crown. So the King moved for a general resumption, and this he obtained easily of the States: Who, as they envied the wealth of the Senators, so they hoped that, by making the King rich, the people would be less charged with taxes; this was not all, he got likewise an act of revition, by which those who had grants were to account for the mean profits, and this was applied even to those who had grants upon valuable considerations; for, when it appeared that the valuable consideration was satisfied, they were to account for all they had received over and above that, and to repay this, with the interest of the money, at 12 per cent. for all the years they had enjoyed it. This brought a great debt on all the Senators and other families of the Kingdom,

But, the French Plenipotentiaries having declared, that they had nothing to ask or pretend to, and that they were ready to answer the others, the Allies changed their minds; and the French, in the mean while, had several separate conferences with the Dutch about commerce and a cessation of arms. This last point the French seemed very eager for, and the same was much pressed by the Mediator, who, upon the Spanish Ministers delivering their grievances, declared, that he was of opinion, that nothing could more contribute to the advancement of the peace, than the agreeing on a truce by common consent; men's minds being so much the less composed, and fit for a calm negotiation, by how much they were elated or depressed by the good or bad successes of war. Though this motion seemed then to be approved by silence, yet other things intervened, which caused it to be laid aside. About the same time the Brandenburg Ambassadors strongly insisted, that all the names of the Confederate Princes should be expressed, and particularly inserted in the treaty; and some of the Allies took it very ill, that the pretensions of the Empire were proposed by the Emperor's Ambassadors only in his Imperial Majesty's name; to silence which complaints it was answered, that every one of the Allies was free to propose separate articles concerning his own affairs. Whereupon several Princes gave in their grievances to their Mediator.

France.

The King of France, foreseeing that the House of Austria would insist upon the treaty of the Pyrenees, resolved to make his last efforts in Flanders and Catalonia, to reduce the Spaniards to his own terms, and to advance the Prince of Conti to the Crown of Poland, not doubting but that warlike Prince, who both from inclination and gratitude would ever promote the interest of France, would soon make the Emperor more tractable. The French army was very numerous and formidable this year in the Low-Countries; and having, besides, the advantage of being earlier in the field, than the Confederates, both by reason of the remoteness and slow march of the German troops and of King William's indisposition, they boasted of attacking a no less considerable place than Namur; but, having reflected upon the difficulties of that enterprize, they were contented to open the campaign with the siege of Aeth, a place, which the French had yielded to Spain by the treaty of Nimeguen. There were no less than three Marshals of France in that army, Villeroy, Boufflers, and Catinat; but, Catinat being the greatest General of the three, it was to him the French King gave the direction of the siege, and ordered Monsieur Vauban to assist him in it, whilst Villeroy and Boufflers should observe the Confederates. Upon intelligence of the French having invested Aeth, King William, who by this time was recovered of his late illness, immediately repaired to his army in Brabant, and had an interview with the Duke of Bavaria, who commanded another army at hand, to join him upon occasion. But, besides the great superiority of the French, which would have made the attempt very difficult, King William openly declared, he would not sacrifice one man for the relief of a place, which the French would be obliged to give up by the peace. It is true, the King might easily have laid siege to Dinant, while Catinat was besieging Aeth; but then Brussels had been left exposed to Villeroy and Boufflers, who had a design upon that city; but the King, by a very happy diligence, preventing them, possessed himself of an advantageous camp, about three hours before the French could reach it, by which they were wholly disabled to execute their design. As for Aeth, it was so vigorously pressed by the besiegers, and so faintly defended by the Governor, for the same reasons which induced King William not to attempt its relief, that it surrendered after twelve June 5. days of open trenches.

Not many days after the Duke of Vendosme, Barcelona taken by the French. who commanded the French forces in Catalonia, invested Barcelona both by sea and land, though he had scarce men enough to compleat his circumvallation. This gave the besieged an opportunity to maintain a free communication with the Viceroy of Catalonia, who thereupon took the field with a small body of troops, and summoned the Miquelets to join him, in order to raise the siege. Besides, the place was defended by a numerous garrison of ten thousand disciplined men, and about five thousand Burgers, who had voluntarily taken up arms; and, to use all imaginable precautions for the preservation of that city, the Queen of Spain recommended it to a Prince of Hesse d'Armstadt, who had signalized himself, not only at the battle of Agbrim in Ireland, but likewise on several other occasions, and who, upon changing his religion, was now at the head of the German troops that were sent into Spain. All these difficulties made the world believe, that the positive orders of the Court of France had engaged their General in an enterprize, which would not turn to his honour. People were confirmed in this opinion by the vigorous and well-timed sallies of the Prince of Hesse, who disputed every inch of ground with the enemy, and so retarded the advancing of their works, that the Duke of Vendosme wrote to the French King, that, unless he was speedily reinforced, he should be obliged to abandon the siege ingloriously. Upon this the French King ordered all the troops in Provence and Languedoc to march that way with all expedition; and, these succours arriving in time, July 4. the French made a great attack, which lasted from twelve at night till three the next morning. They endeavoured three several times to pass the palisadoes;

it did utterly ruin them and left them at mercy, and, when the King took from them all they had, he kept them still in a dependence upon him, giving them employments in the army or militia that he set up.

After that, he procured of the States of his Kingdom an absolute authority to govern them as he thought fit, and according to law; but even this limited.

tation seemed uneasy, and their slavery was finished by another act, which he obtained, that he should not be obliged to govern by law, but by his meer will and pleasure: So successful was he, in the space of five years, to ruin all the families in his Kingdom, and to destroy their laws and liberties, and that by their own consent.

1697. palissadoes; but the besieged repulsed them as often sword in hand, and pursued them a good way. Had the Prince of Hesse been seconded by Don Francisco de Velez, the Viceroy, the siege had certainly been raised; but the Viceroy (whether by a fate common to all the Spaniards, or from a jealousy, that the whole honour would accrue to a stranger, if the place should hold out) so entirely neglected to do his part, that he was surprized, and his small army routed. The French, flushed with this success, attacked the outworks, which they had been battering a long while with a great many cannon. This dispute was obstinate, and maintained with great courage and resolution on both sides; but at last the French, by the superiority of their numbers, made themselves masters of the covered-way, and afterwards advanced to the attack of two bastions, which, after having been twice taken and retaken, one of them remained in the possession of the assailants. The next day, the besieged endeavoured to recover the bastion of San Pedro they had lost, which occasioned a sharp encounter. The French were twice beaten from their post, but at last lodged themselves again; and, about the same time, the enemy sprung a mine under the bastion of Portal Nuova with so good success, that after several attacks they lodged themselves there likewise. Upon these bastions the Duke of Vendosme raised great batteries both of cannon and mortars, from which he fired so furiously upon the town, that he judged it could not hold out much longer. His conjecture proved true, for though the Prince of Hesse still maintained himself on part of those bastions, and was resolved to expect the last extremity in the castle; yet, the Court being unwilling to suffer that city to be entirely ruined by the enemy, since, in all probability, it would soon be restored by the peace, orders were dispatched to the Prince to capitulate, which he did on very honourable conditions, after nine weeks vigorous resistance; so that it remains undecided, whether the Duke of Vendosme gained more glory by taking, than the Prince of Hesse did by defending this place; for which service he was, not long after, made Viceroy of Catalonia. By this the French gained a great point. Hitherto the Spaniards, who contributed the least towards carrying on the war, were the most backward to all overtures of peace. They had felt little of the miseries of war, and thought themselves out of its reach. But now, France being master of so important a place as Barcelona, which cut off all their communication with Italy, they became as earnest for peace, as they had before been averse to it.

Nor was this all their danger: For Monsieur Carthagen de Pointis, having fitted out a squadron of men of war, at the charge of a Company, erected by Account of the French King's permission, in order to seize the taking of Spanish Plate-fleet, in the West-Indies, set sail from Carthagen. Brest (though at that time a strong English fleet was cruising off that place) towards the beginning of this year, and in fifty-five days arrived before St Domingo. Here he was considerably reinforced; and being also joined by the Buccaneers and Freebooters in these parts, and finding, that the Gal-

1697. leons were already got to the Havana, where he could not attack them, he proceeded to put his design upon Caribagena in execution. He received no small assistance in this project from one Vener, an Englishman, who had served the Spaniards many years, and who drew for him several plans of that town; by which Pointis judged, that there was a necessity of possessing himself, upon his first arrival, of a considerable post, called Nuestra Señora de la Papa; otherwise the Spaniards would have an opportunity to carry off whatever they were desirous to save. In order to this, Pointis, after concerting proper measures, went in a canoe to find a proper place for landing the men; but, to his surprize, the sea ran so high, though the weather was calm, that there was no possibility of landing the boats; and was, himself, like to be drowned. Hence he learned, which was confirmed by the relation of the inhabitants, that the sea, upon all this coast, in all seasons, is a natural, invincible rampart; and that Caribagena is approachable only by the lake, which makes the harbour. Finding this attempt impracticable, he bent his efforts against the fort of Bocca Chica; of which, in a short time, he made himself master, notwithstanding the difficulties of approaching it, and the cowardice of the Buccaneers in his service. The taking of this fort was soon followed by the surrender of that of St Lazar; after which Caribagena itself was invested, both by sea and land. The place was attacked and defended with a great deal of vigour; but, the Spanish succours not coming in time, and all things being now ready for an assault, the garrison thought fit to agree to a capitulation, whereby they were to march out through the breach, with all the usual marks of honour, and four pieces of cannon; but, for the rest, that all silver, without reserve, should belong to the conqueror; and that such of the inhabitants, as staid behind, should enjoy all they had, excepting their place.

In pursuance of these articles, the Governor May 9 marched out of Caribagena, and Pointis entered it; but, though Pointis, according to the agreement, was to have all the silver, how to come at it, was no small difficulty. At last, he betought himself of an expedient, ordering it to be published, that he would give the tenth to the proprietors of whatsoever they honestly brought him, and a tenth to them, who should inform him of any persons, that concealed their effects; to which he added his threats of immediate punishment on those who disobeyed; which had the desired effect upon the generality of the people. Neither were the churches and religious houses spared, being robbed and rifled of several massy images of gold and silver, and other rich ornaments; though, after all, the booty fell much short of Pointis's expectation; for, the town having taken the alarm, before his arrival, all the women, of any quality, with their jewels, the nuns, and an hundred and ten mules laden with gold, were gone a great way out of his reach; and, how basely soever the Buccaneers had served him in the expedition, they had their assigned proportion of the spoil, with which, nevertheless, some of them were not satisfied (1).
Though

(1) Pointis says, in his account, that they got eight millions of crowns; and the King of France allowed a tenth of the first million, and a thirtieth of all the rest; so, of the eight millions, the share of the Buccaneers did not amount to above forty thousand; whereas they expected that the whole eight millions should have been divided but into four parts, and they to have had one, as being a fourth of the army. Pointis's Account, p. 68.

1697. Though the riches had been thus sent away, they gave it out, that they had found many millions of crowns there, which, at first, seemed incredible, and was afterwards known to be false; yet it was confidently asserted, at that time, to cover the reproach of having miscarried in the attempt, on which they had raised great expectations, and to which many undertakers had been drawn in.

The French, not thinking it advisable or possible to keep this place in their hands, ruined the fort of Bocca Chica, and put out to sea, standing for cape Tuberon; when an advice-boat from Petit Guaves informed them, that thirteen English men of war were arrived at Barbadoes, to look after them. This made Pointis alter his course for the Straights of Bahama till six at night, when he fell in with the English, who proved to be much stronger than he was informed, and who presently took one of his fly-boats, on board of which there was a considerable quantity of ammunition and provision. While this was doing, half the English fleet, which were got within reach of the enemy, seemed to decline fighting, till the rest, to the leeward, could come to the action; which gave the French an opportunity of getting before them. On the other hand, the advanced part of the English fleet having got the windward of the French, and within less than cannon-shot, Pointis, who saw the necessity of fighting, gave the signal for the engagement. But the English Admiral, Nevill, reckoning there was no safety for the French, but to go before the wind for the Straights of Bahama, slackened his way, proposing to get so much a-head of them, as to hinder their passage. Upon this the French, at the closing of the night, tacked about, and found the success of their working the next day, for they could reckon no more than fourteen ships following them in a line, and those not so high by far as the day before; which made the French continue the same road till they got within twenty leagues of Carthagena, and the next day got clear of the English fleet.

June 9. Having made so narrow an escape, the French sailed for Newfoundland, and watered at Conception-Bay. From hence they steered their course to that of St John's, where lay a squadron of English ships, under Commodore Norris, which was sent with some land forces to recover Hudson's-Bay. These ships might have fallen upon the French, and would probably have mastered them, as they were now extremely weakened by sickness: But, as Norris had no certain account of their strength, and being ordered upon another service, he did not think proper to hazard the attacking them; so they escaped this second danger, as they did afterwards a third from six English men of war, that attacked them in their passage from thence into France, where they arrived on the 19th of August. This was, as they confessed, more than themselves could have expected, considering the distress they were reduced to. On the other hand, not only Admiral Nevill died in the West-Indies, but most of the other Commanders; so that of all the Captains, who went out, only one returned; and such a mortality had raged among the seamen, that there were scarce sailors sufficient to bring home the ships; and, as this squadron in the bay of Mexico did very little service, except robbing and destroying some of the French colonies, so that, sent to Hudson's Bay, found it quite abandoned by the French: So that both returned home inglorious.

These things occasioned the conduct of our affairs at sea to be much censured: However, our Admiralty declared themselves satisfied with the account, which the Commanders gave of their proceedings. But that Board was accused of much partiality. On all such occasions the unfortunate must expect to be blamed, and, to outward appearance, there was much room given, either to censure the orders, or the execution of them. The King, indeed, owned, that he did not understand those matters; and Admiral Ruffel, now made Earl of Orford, had both the Admiralty and the Navy Board in great dependance on himself; so that he was considered almost as much, as if he had been Lord High-Admiral. He was too much in the power of those, in whom he confided, and trusted them too far; and it was generally believed, that there was much corruption, as it was certain there was much faction, if not treachery, in the conduct of the Marine. Our miscarriages made people cry, that we must have a peace, for we could not manage the war to any good purpose; since, notwithstanding our great superiority at sea, the French conducted their matters so much better than we, that we were losers, even in that element, where we used to triumph most.

The successes of the French in Flanders, Catalonia, and the West-Indies, would in all probability have made them sole Masters of the peace, and given their Ambassadors a fair occasion to speak the language of Nimeguen, had not their expectations from Poland been miserably disappointed, where a great change of affairs had happened this year. Their King John Sobieski, after he had long outlived the fame he had got, by raising the siege of Vienna, died at last under a general contempt. He was going backwards and forwards, as his Queen's negotiations in the Court of France were entertained or rejected: His Government was so feeble and disjointed at home, that all their Dyets broke up upon Preliminaries, before they could, according to their forms, enter upon business: He was set on heaping up wealth, which seemed necessary to give his son an interest in the succeeding election. And indeed, upon his death, a great party appeared for the Prince, notwithstanding the general aversion to the matter; so that he was thought to be the only competitor, that could oppose the Prince of Conti's advancement to the Throne. But the Abbé Polignac, who managed the French King's affairs in Poland, confidently assured him, that the Prince of Conti would certainly carry the election, if he would but come thither in person, and send him a sufficient sum of money to bribe some Palatines, who opposed the French interest. Upon this encouragement Conti set out for Poland; and great remittances were made to the Abbé Polignac, which he lavished away with much ostentation. The Polish Nobility had resolved to make no haste with the election, and plainly set the Crown to sale, encouraging all candidates, who would bid for it. Their Primate, then a Cardinal, was the head of the Prince of Conti's party, while the Emperor did all he could to support the late King's son. But when he saw, that the French party was too strong for him, he was willing to join with

The Duke of Lorraine, the Prince of Baden, and Don Livio Odescalchi, Pope Innocent's nephew, were all named; but, these being not likely to succeed, a negotiation was secretly managed with the Elector of Saxony, which succeeded so well, that he was prevailed on to change his religion, to advance his troops to the frontiers of Poland, to distribute eight millions of florins among the Poles, and to promise to confirm all their privileges, and, in particular, to undertake the siege of Comenick. He consented to all this, and, at a time when he was not at all suspected of having any thoughts of the Crown of Poland, took a journey in the end of the spring to Vienna, under the pretence of settling matters in relation to the campaign in Hungary, where it was given out he would command the Imperial army again this summer. But the event shewed, what his real design was, though it was carried on with great secrecy and address; for all of a sudden he left Vienna, and this was attended with various reports industriously spread abroad of some misunderstanding between the Emperor and him, of which no body could assign a cause. But, when people saw the Elector assemble a body of his troops, they entertained several suspicions; and the Brandenburgers so far took the alarm, as immediately to gather all the forces they could, to oppose any attempt, that might be made that way. The Elector's sudden march towards Silisia and the frontiers of Poland, quickly occasioned other speculations; and he declared himself a candidate a very few days before the election, being supported by the Imperialists in opposition to the French party. His party became quickly so strong, that though, upon the first appearance at the election, while every one of the competitors was trying his strength, the French party was the strongest, and was so declared by the Cardinal Primate, yet, when the other candidates saw, that they could not carry the election for themselves, they united in opposition to the French interest, and gave over all their voices to the Elector of Saxony, by which his party became much the strongest, and he was proclaimed the elected King. The Cardinal gave notice to the Court of France of what had been done in favour of the Prince of Conti, and desired, that he might be sent quickly thither, well furnished with arms and ammunition, but chiefly with money. But the party for the Elector of Saxony made more dispatch; he lay nearer, and had both his money and troops ready; so he took the oaths, that were required, and got the change of his religion attested by the Imperial Court. He made all the haste he could with his army to Cracow, and was soon after crowned, to the great joy of the Imperial party, but the inexpressible trouble of all his subjects in Saxony. The secular men there saw, that the supporting this elective Crown would ruin his hereditary dominions; and those, who laid the concerns of the Protestant religion to heart, were much more troubled, when they saw that Houfe, under whose protection their religion grew up at first, now fall off to Popery. It is true, the present family, ever since Maurice's time, had shewn very little zeal in that cause. The elected King had so small a share of religion in himself, that little was to be expected from him; nor was it much apprehended, that he would become a bigot, or turn a persecutor. But such was the eagerness of the Popish Clergy toward the suppressing what they call Heresy, and the perpetual jealousies, with which they would therefore possess the Poles, were like to be such, in case he used no violence towards his Saxon subjects, as possibly might have great effects on him; so that it was no wonder, if they were struck with a general consternation upon his revolt. His electors, though a very young person, defended of the House of Brandenburg, expressed so extraordinary a measure of zeal and piety upon this occasion, that it contributed much to the present quieting of their fears. The new King sent a Popish Stadtholder to Dresden, but so weak a man, that there was no reason to apprehend much from any conduct of his. He also sent them all the assurances, that could be given in words, that he would make no change among them.

A very unusual accident happened at this time, which served not a little to his quiet establishment on the Throne of Poland. The Muscovites, after they had been for some years under the divided Monarchy of two brothers, or rather, of a sister who governed in their names, by the death of one of the brothers, came under one Czar. He entered into an alliance with the Emperor, against the Turks; and Azoph, which was reckoned a strong place, and commanded then the mouth of the Tanais or Donne, where it falls into the Palus-Meotis, after a long siege was taken by his army. This opened the Euxine sea to him, so that, in case he was furnished with men skilled in the building and sailing of ships, it appeared, that this might have consequences, that would very much distress Constantinople; and, in the end, prove fatal to that Empire. This was the state of the affairs of Peter I., Czar of Muscovy, when, being sensible of the defects of his education, he resolved in order to correct them, and to qualify himself, for the great designs he was projecting, to go into the world, and be better informed. He intended to make a navigable canal between the Valga and the Tanais, by which he might carry both materials and provisions for a fleet to Azoph; and, when that communication was opened, he apprehended, that great things might be done afterwards. He therefore intended to see the fleets of Holland and England, and to make himself as much master of that matter as his genius could rise to. He sent an Embassy to Holland to regulate some matters of commerce, and to see if they would assist him in the war, which he was designing against the Turk. When the Ambassadors were set out, he settled his affairs in such hands, as he trusted to, and with a small retinue of two or three servants secretly followed his Ambassadors, and quickly overtook them. He discovered himself first to the Elector of Brandenburg, who was then in Prussia, looking on the dispute, that was like to arise in Poland, in which, if a war should follow, he might be forced to have a share. The Czar interested himself greatly in the matter, not only by reason of the neighbourhood, but because he feared, that, if the French party should prevail, France being in an alliance with the Turk, a King sent from thence would probably not only make a peace with the Turk, but turn his arms against himself, which would hinder all his designs for a great fleet.

1697. The French party was strongest in Lithuania; therefore the Czar sent orders to his General, to bring a great army to the frontier of that Duchy, to be ready to break into it, if a war should begin in Poland; and it was said, that the terror of this had a great effect. From Prussia the Czar went into Holland, where, after his Ambassadors had been admitted to an audience with the States-General at the Hague, they had one of King William at Utrecht; which being over, the King and the Czar met in a small gallery, into which they entered both at the same time out of the adjoining rooms, and had a long conference together about the posture of affairs, wherein the Czar highly applauded the King's indefatigable endeavours, and constant aim to reduce France within it's antient limits.

Jan. 11. 1697-8. From Holland the Czar went over the next winter to England, where he staid several months. Bishop Burnet waited often on him; and was ordered, both by the King and the Archbishop and Bishops, to attend him, and offer him such informations of our Religion and Constitution, as he was willing to receive. As the Bishop had good interpreters, he had much free discourse with him. He found him a man of a very hot temper, soon inflamed, and very brutal in his passion. He raised his natural heat by drinking much brandy, which he rectified himself with great application. He was subject to convulsive motions all over his body, with which his head seemed to be affected. He wanted not capacity, and had a larger share of knowledge than might be expected from his education, which was but indifferent. A want of judgment, with an instability of temper, appeared in him too often and too evidently. He was mechanically turned, and seemed designed by nature rather to be a ship-carpenter than a great Prince. This was his chief study and exercise, while he staid in England. He wrought much with his own hands, and made all about him work at the models of ships. He told the Bishop, he designed a great fleet at Azoph to attack the Turkish Empire; but he did not then seem capable of so great a design, though his conduct afterwards, in his wars, discovered a greater genius in him than appeared at this time. He was desirous to understand our Religion, but he did not seem disposed to mend matters in Miscovy. He was indeed resolved to encourage learning, and to polish his people, by sending some of them to travel into other countries, and to draw strangers to come and live among them. How far this charaacter suited him will appear, when his actions come in course to be mentioned.

From England he went to Vienna, where he purposed to have staid some time, but was called home, sooner than he had intended, upon a discovery, or a suspicion, of intrigues managed by his sister; but the strangers, to whom he trusted most, were so true to him, that those designs were crushed before he came back. But on this occasion he let loose his natural fury on all whom he suspected. Some hundreds were hanged all round Moscow; and it was said, that he cut off many heads with his own hand; and so far was he from relenting, or shewing any tenderness, that he seemed delighted with it. But, after this digression, it is time to return to the Election of Poland.

dron, which lay before that port, kept him in for some time. At last he got out, and sailed to Dantzick; but that city had declared for the new King, and therefore would not suffer him to land with all those, who came with him, and only consented to suffer himself to land with a small retinue. This he thought would not become him; and therefore landed at Marientburg, where he was met by some of the chief of his party, who pressed him to distribute the money, which he had brought from France, among them, and promised to return quickly to him with a great force. But he was limited by his instructions, and would see a good force, before he would part with his treasure. The new King sent some troops to disperse those who were coming together to serve him; and these had once almost seized on the Prince himself. But he acted after that with great caution, and would not trust the Poles. He saw no appearance of any force like to be brought to him, equal to the undertaking; and fearing, lest, if he should stay too long, he might be frozen up in the Baltic, he came back to Dunkirk. Notwithstanding this, the Cardinal Primate stood out still. The Court of Rome rejoiced at the pretended conversion of the new King, and owned him; but he quickly saw such a scene of difficulties, that he had reason to repent his embarking himself in such a dangerous undertaking. However, his election had some influence in disposing the French now to be more earnest for a peace; for, if they had got a King of Poland in their dependence, that would have given them a great interest in the northern parts, with an easier access, both to assist the Turks and the malecontents in Hungary.

The news of this election was no small mortification to the French Plenipotentiaries at Ryswick. But the treaty went on, and the French, who had daily conferences with the Ministers of the States-General and others of the Allies, renewed their offer of an equivalent for Luxemburg and Strasburg, which the Imperial and Spanish Ambassadors still rejected. About this time, the Dutch Plenipotentiaries complained aloud, and with some sort of indignation, of an unjust and false report, as if their Masters had underhand concluded a peace with France; and, the better to prove their sincerity, they openly dissuaded the Ministers of the Allies from consenting to a truce. To this, however, the Ministers were of themselves sufficiently averse, especially since the French had rejected the pretensions of the Imperialists and Spaniards, being unwilling to answer them before the Confederates gave their opinions concerning the proposal, which France had made, that the Plenipotentiaries of the Allies should treat on the foundation laid on the 10th of February last, and advance no other points, besides those, that had already been mentioned. The Imperialists made answer, that these articles were but preliminary ones, and not absolute; and that they were allowed of with this condition only, that, in case any point were found to be imperfect or faulty, the same should be amended by the succeeding treaties; and that they were desirous to know the answer of the French as to every point proposed by the Emperor and his Allies. The Spaniards were of opinion, that they ought to keep close to the points, that had been once agreed on; and that to do otherwise would 1697. only retard the negotiation: That, seeing the first preliminary point imported, that the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen should be the basis of this negotiation, according to the express consent of the King of France, it was consequently very evident, that those preliminary positions could not be the foundation of all pretensions, that the Allies could have upon France. That, if the preceding treaties had no effect at all, it was to no purpose, that they had made choice of a place to confer in; that the mediation of the King of Sweden had been desired; and that passports had been granted. Upon this the French Ambassadors dispatched a courier to their Master, on whose part the propositions of a truce and a free trade were again offered, as being the first step towards a peace. But, these being still rejected, they now replied to the answers made by the Imperialists and Spaniards, that they were so strictly limited to their instructions, that they durst not exceed or change any thing from the treaty of Nimeguen, as the basis proposed by the King their Master; and that consequently it was in vain for the Allies to require any thing beyond the articles of that treaty. This reply was far from satisfying the Allies, who gave the French to understand by the Mediator, that, their last declaration being directly contrary to what had been fully regulated, and absolutely agreed on in the preliminaries, it could have no other tendency, than to break off the treaty, or at least to draw it into length. The Mediator himself being of the same opinion, he laid the full pretensions of the Allies before the French Plenipotentiaries, who gave him for answer, that the regarding the negotiation ought with more reason to be charged upon the Allies, the last instrument, that had been presented on the Emperor's part, being conceived in such articles, which they foresaw France neither could nor ought to accept; and that the Spaniards, proposing the Pyrenean treaty for the basis of this, made the French insist upon that of Nimeguen. To this the Mediator replied, That he could not believe, that his most Christian Majesty was offended, that all the Allies had joined together in the last answer, since that affair was common to them all: That they were of opinion, that France would have declared the same thing, were she in the same condition, Spain found herself in, namely, that the peace of the Pyrenees should be renewed in it's full force. At the same time the Allies offered it as their opinion, that, for the avoiding of these difficulties and disputes, the French should answer each of their propositions apart; which was at length agreed to.

The last instruments presented by the Imperialists were not pleasing to divers of the Allies, who pretended, that they had other just complaints to make against France, in order to redress. The Elector of Hanover's Plenipotentiary insisting, that he ought to have a place in the Assembly, as an Electoral Minister, occasioned also some disputes; which being left to the decision of the Mediator, he gave it in favour of that Plenipotentiary. Soon after the Imperialists and the French gave in, respectively, their projects of peace; but, all the articles of the French being drawn, word for word, from the treaty of Nimeguen, the same were rejected by the Allies, as being too opposite to the interest of the Empire; and, because there was 1697. often mention made of the Allies of France, it being well known, that she had none in the war, unless the Turks were meant by it; it was insisted upon, that the French should more fully explain themselves, and give in a clearer plan. On the other hand, the French, in the beginning of July, required the Mediator to exhort the Allies to avoid delays, and apply themselves effectually to the terminating this tedious work. To this the Mediator answered, That he did not see how the Allies retarded the moving of those obstacles that lay in the way; but that their delays were occasioned by the French themselves, in lending those points, that were undecided to Paris, in order to consult their Master thereon. That the sincere intentions of the Allies were manifested from their having desired, that other extraordinary days should be appointed to hold their conferences, which the French, on their part, had declined; and that the Allies were not ignorant of the designs of the French Court, who had nothing in view but the treaty of Nimeguen. As soon as the Mediator had given an account of all this to the Allies, they resolved to consult together daily, in order to find out a way to shorten their business; and, in the first conference, it was concluded, that the French should answer to every point in difference, as proposed by the Allies; which, when the others came to know, they desired to be informed, according to what manner the Allies were willing to decide the first point, to the end that, having once seen the beginning of the treaty, they might be able to conjecture whether they had power enough to treat and conclude, without any further orders from their Master. But the French, at the next meeting, insisted, that nothing could add a greater weight to the business, than to treat according to the peace of Nimeguen, and to change some articles therein, when there should be occasion. The Mediator, at the request of the Allies, replied, That they were not to treat according to the treaty of Nimeguen only, but also according to that of Westphalia, since both together had been reciprocally proposed and accepted of in the preliminaries; and that, consequently, the Allies required, that the French should form a project, according to those two treaties; to which project the Allies would promise a speedy answer. The French required time to deliberate upon it; which, while they were doing, the Imperial Ambassadors promised to those of the Electors, that they would soon communicate to them all the articles, which they should put forwards, to the end that all differences between them might be adjusted.

After several consultations, the French declared, That they had not sufficient power to answer to the different proposals of the Imperialists; but that they would give in a project to the Spaniards, if they would accept of it, which the Mediator acquainted the Allies with; adding, that the French still pretended, they had no other power to treat, than according to the treaty of Nimeguen. Whereupon the Ministers of the Allies, in a particular conference, came to an unanimous resolution, never to consent to it, that treaty being contrary to the interests of almost all the Princes and States, that sent them. In the mean time the Electoral Ministers could not well digest the proposal of the Imperialists, that, in dignities and cessions, there should be no regard 1697. had to any other, except the Ambassadors of the highest characters; for they insisted, that they ought to be treated with upon an equal foot with the rest. Then the French declared, that they would use the Plenipotentiaries of the Electors in the same manner, as the Emperor's Ministers did, and honour the rest so, in all public affairs, as to give no occasion of complaints. As to the main of the treaty, the Spaniards, at last, consented that the French should give in their plan; to which they would return an answer. This they were prevailed with to do, upon an assurance from the Mediator, that the same should be made up of the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen, he having told the French, that the articles, which they should propose, ought to be regulated by those two treaties; by default whereof no advance could be made in the negotiation. Whilst the French Ministers were busy about framing their plan, the Elector of Brandenburg's Plenipotentiary very earnestly pressed them to procure a full power to treat with him, in particular, since his Master had formerly declared war against France; and the Deputies of the Circles of Swabia and Franconia insisted likewise, to have satisfaction made them by France, for the damages, which they had sustained, during the war; but all this to little purpose.

To quicken the slow advances of the treaty, the Ministers of Sweden and Denmark both declared to the French, That their Masters would be constrained to join their forces to those of the Allies, to cut off, by the sword, all the unnecessary difficulties, which France raised to protract the negotiations. The treaty, indeed, went on but slowly, till Harlay, the first of the French Plenipotentiaries, came to the Hague; who, as was believed, had the secret. He shewed a fairer inclination, than had appeared in the others, to treat frankly and honourably, and to clear all difficulties that had been started before. So that the French, on the 20th of July, gave in their plan of peace, founded on the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen; the main articles of which, as to the Empire, were, 'An offer to make void several re-unions, made on that side, by the Chambers of Mentz and Besançon, and the sovereign Council of Brisac, since the treaty of Nimeguen. To restore the City of Strasburg, or to give, as an equivalent for it, the city and castle of Friburg, and the towns of Brisac and Philippsburg, with the fort of Kiel, in the condition they were at present: To demolish the fortifications of Huningen, on the other side of the Rhine. To restore Lorraine to the Duke of that name, in the same manner as it was offered at the treaty of Nimeguen, that is, in the same condition it was possessed by Duke Charles, in 1670, and the city of Nancy, upon certain conditions; with the demolishing of divers places, such as Mont-Royal, Traerbach, &c. As for the Spaniards, the French offered to give them the city and country of Luxemburg, and the country of Chinay, or, in lieu of them, some other places, hereafter to be named, for which there was a blank left in the plan. That all re-unions, since the treaty of Nimeguen, should be made void: That the city and castle of Dinant should be delivered to the Bishop of Liege; and that 'all other places, taken on both sides, during the war, should likewise be restored.' The Spaniards seemed, in the main, to be satisfied with the French concessions; but the Imperial Ministers made a tedious, and, as some thought, an unreasonable answer to the plan; which the French did not much regard, their chief aim being to satisfy the rest, upon what terms they were willing to give them, in order to break the Grand Alliance, and by that means to preserve part of their acquisitions on the Rhine, since there was so little prospect of having any thing elsewhere. After the delivery of the plan of peace, the King of France, finding much time spent to little purpose, by carrying on a treaty in writing, ordered his Plenipotentiaries to agree to the proposals, which the Imperialists had made not long before, of treating by word of mouth; and though the 10th of September was the utmost the French would give, to accept their offers; yet it is remarkable, that, after their disappointment in Poland, they began to be more tractable than before.

Upon the 17th of August, an extraordinary conference was held at Ryswick, which lasted almost a whole day, and wherein the method agreed on of treating by word of mouth was first put in practice. Not many days after came the news of the taking of Barcelona by the French. This made the Spaniards very uneasy and very pressing to have the peace signed upon the conditions offered by France; and more especially since, by the memorial given in to the Mediator on the 1st of September, there had been an offer made to restore this place also to his Catholic Majesty upon a slight consideration of a few villages belonging to the chancellery of Aeth to be yielded to the French, for the conveniency of the trade of the inhabitants of Tournay. But, the more condescending the French seemed to be towards the Spaniards, the stiffer they became with the Empire, now positively insisting upon the keeping of Strasburg, and that the Emperor should rest contented with the equivalent, which, they said, would be more considerable to him, since he would have the intire sovereignty of those towns, that France quitted; whereas Strasburg, if restored, must have been set at its own liberty, as a free Imperial city. If the Imperialists were startled at this new project, they were not less surprized at the short time prefixed by France for their answer, which was the 20th of September; after which the French King would no longer be obliged to those offers. This was still the more mortifying to them, since they began now to be superior in force to the French, and to act offensively on the Rhine; not to mention their jealousies, lest some of the Allies should sign a separate peace, and leave them out; which occasioned some heats between the Confederates.

On the other hand, the French Plenipotentiaries were amazed at the profound silence of the Ministers of the Allies concerning their last memorial. But it seems the conclusion of the peace was to be owing to the same person, who had been the soul of the war, King William. For, while the negotiations at Ryswick were going on very slowly, it was so managed, that the Earl of Portland and Marshal Boufflers, when the Confederate army was incamped near Brussels, and the French army not far from thence,

1697. met together four times, by the order of their Masters, and conferred long together (1). At the last of these conferences, the two negotiators, after they had been some time in the open field, retired into an house in the suburb of Hall, where they had pen, ink, and paper, and in an hour adjusted several points, which the Plenipotentiaries at Ryswick would not perhaps have agreed upon in a year. The chief subject of those conferences was concerning King James. King William desired to know, how the French King intended to dispose of him, and how he could own him, and yet support the other. The French King would not renounce the protecting him by any article of the treaty; but it was agreed between them, that the French King should give him no assistance, nor give King William any disturbance on his account; and that he should retire from the Court of France, either to Avignon or to Italy. On the other hand, his Queen should have fifty-thousand pounds a year, which was her jointure, settled after his death; and that it should be now paid her, he being reckoned as dead to the nation. In this King William readily acquiesced. These meetings made the treaty go on with more dispatch, this tender point being once settled; and, on the 2d of August, the Earl of Portland and Marshal Boufflers signed the paper, which they had drawn up some days before; upon which the King left the army the next day, and went to Dieren; whence he dispatched the Earl of Portland to the Hague, to acquaint the Congress, 'that, as for what concerned his Majesty and his Kingdoms, all matters were so adjusted with France, that this would occasion no delay in the general peace; and therefore he earnestly pressed the other Allies, and particularly the Emperor, to contribute all that in them lay towards concluding so great a work.'

The interviews between the Earl of Portland and Marshal Boufflers occasioned divers speculations. On the one hand the Jacobites, who, against all reason, flattered themselves, that, tho' a treaty of peace was carried on at the King's own palace, yet he would be left out of it, saw by these conferences their hopes entirely baffled; and, on the other hand, a great many people, and even some of the King's best friends, began to suspect, that he had entered into a private agreement with the French King, in favour either of King James or his issue, upon account of King William's having the peaceful enjoyment of his dominions during life, and being acknowledged as King of Great-Britain by his most Christian Majesty; which ill-grounded suspicion was three years after fully removed, by King William's effectual promoting the settlement in the Protestant line. Deeper politicians went farther two years after, and pretended (as will hereafter be seen) that, in these conferences between the Earl of Portland and Marshal Boufflers, the first foundation was laid of the famous Treaty of Partition; and it is not improbable, but something of that kind was then propoed and considered.

The day appointed by France being come, when either peace or war was to determine the fate of Christendom, the English, Spanish, and Dutch Plenipotentiaries, after a long conference with those of France, having adjusted all matters remaining in difference between any of them, respectively signed the treaty a little after midnight, and then complimented each other upon the finishing of that important negotiation. The Imperial and Electoral Plenipotentiaries, who, most of them, were all the while present in the hall, were so far from consenting to what was done, that, on the contrary, they required the Mediator to enter a protestation, 'That this was the second time, that a separate peace had been concluded with France, (meaning that of Nimeguen for one) wherein the Emperor and Empire had been excluded; and that the States of the Empire, who had been imposed upon through their own overcredulity, would not, for the future, be so easily persuaded to enter into confederacies.' The Spanish Plenipotentiaries, and particularly Don Bernardo de Quiros, by way of excuse, replied, that he had a long time been made acquainted with his Catholic Majesty's pleasure, not to delay the signing of the treaty, which had been agreed upon before; and, if he had obeyed those orders, the French would not have taken Barcelona. But that, having deferred the conclusion of that treaty at the persuasion of the Imperial Ministers, he had given the French time to make themselves Masters of that important place; which success emboldened their Plenipotentiaries to change their language, and thereby he had himself run into the hazard of incurring his Master's displeasure.

All this while King James made but an indifferent figure in his melancholy retirement at St Germain's. The French King's promise to him, and open declaration to all Europe, that he would never lay down arms till he had restored him to his Throne, had raised this Prince's hopes to a great height. But he found by sad experience, how little the promises of Sovereigns are to be relied on, when their own interest comes in competition.

After a tedious war, dubiously maintained, the French King, being exhausted both of men and money, thought it prudence to make peace, and restore to his neighbours all the conquests, which he had made upon them since the treaty of Nimeguen; which he was the more inclined to do, in hopes that, having disarmed and broke the Confederacy, he might recover all at the death of the King of Spain, who for many years had been in a declining state of health, and who, at the conclusion of the peace of Ryswick, was in so desperate a condition, that the French Court thought he could not live a month longer. On the other hand, the French King being sensible, that a treaty could not be set on foot, not only without owning King William, but also (as a consequence of that acknowledgment) without abandoning King James, he did not even insist, that a Minister from him should be admitted to the conferences at Ryswick; which proposal was unanimously rejected by the Allies; nor would the French Plenipotentiaries meddle with that Prince's manifesto. King James's expectation

rights; with another memorial to the same purpose, addressed to the Protestant Confederate Princes and States; of which manifestoes no notice was taken by any of the Allies (1). As to his friends in England, they were so enraged to see him abandoned by the French King, that they could not forbear venting their bitter invectives against him, for which some of them were committed to prison and fined, the same being

(1) They were answered in a piece, printed at London, 1705, in quarto, under the title of, A Memorial, drawn up by King William's special direction, intended to be given in at the Treaty of Ryfwick, justifying the Revolution, and the course of his Government; in answer to two Memorials, that were offered there in King James's name. In the preface, we are informed, that, upon King James's presenting his two Memorials, it was thought necessary to prepare a Memorial, in answer to them; which was intended to be given, in King William's name, to the Ministers, that were then at the Hague. The Memorial was, upon this, drawn up, by his Majesty's own direction, he explaining himself upon every particular; and the draught was examined by him, and, by his orders, carried to some of the worthiest Ministers, that our nation produced in that age, and carefully revised and corrected by them. But, when it was resolved to translate it into Latin and French, in order to the communicating it, his Majesty had advice from the Hague, that King James's Memorials were so little considered there, that the offering an Answer to them would give them some credit; and that, without that, they had none at all. The draught was therefore ordered to be written over again, in another style; not in his Majesty's name, but as the Answer of a private hand to those Memorials; and so to be printed. Yet, before this could be done, another advice came, to let the matter quite alone, and to leave those Memorials to sleep in that neglect, under which they were fallen. The matter rested upon this; but, these papers being drawn up by such an authority, and containing such a full, though short, vindication of the Revolution, it was, afterwards, thought proper to publish them. The Answer to the first Memorial to King James begins with observing: 'That the King of Great Britain' does not wonder to see a Prince, who has, for so long a time, sought to take away his life, in the blackest methods, endeavour, now, likewise, to attack his honour, even in the undecentest expressions; of which the late Memorial is full. The late King, while he was in Ireland, did, himself, concert with one James, the way of murdering the King. But, so tender was his Majesty of the honour of a person so nearly related to him, that he gave order to suppress that matter; though the authentic proofs of it are yet extant, in letters, and other papers, taken in the late Earl of Tyrconnel's cabinet. Grandvill's confession is well known; and Sir John Fenwick did lately claim merit, by his diverting another design to murder the King, pursuant to a commission, that, though it was not come over, yet was affirmed to be signed by the late King. His having laid the design of murdering the King, a year ago, and his having sent over persons, and a commission, to that effect, have been so undeniably proved, that all Europe is still full of horror at it. At such practices, Heathens would be ashamed. The pursuing them, year after year, deserves severer words, than the King thinks fit to use, even after such a provocation; such regard is had to the high birth, and the rank, which that Prince once held in the world. The King had the least reason to have expected such practices from the late King, because, though he had him so long in his power, he did him no hurt, nor put him under any restraint. He refused to hearken to the advices, that many gave him, of securing his person, till a general peace

No. 23. Vol. III.

should be made; or, at least, till Ireland should be reduced. Some, who offered those advices, are now in the late King's interest, and can, if they please, inform him of the truth of this matter. The late King, himself, desired to be attended by some of the Dutch Guards, when he went to Rochester, and sent to the Count de Salmes, to that effect; who immediately ordered it, without any direction from the King, who was not then come to London. When the King knew of it, he sent orders to those Guards to wait about the late King, in what manner he himself should command: And it was visible to those, who were about him, at that time, that he was all the while as much master of himself, as when he was served by his own Guards. The whole progress of affairs, as they passed between his Majesty and King James, is laid open; and it is remarked, that King William did not come to England on design to dethrone that King, but declaring a full purpose to leave the care and settlement of the nation to the Parliament. And, when some Lords were sent to him by the late King, to ask him, what it was, that he proposed, his answer was: That he desired, that the administration of the Government might be brought into a state conformable to the laws then in being; so that no persons, who were under legal incapacities, might continue in public offices or trusts; and that a Parliament might be called, and sit in full freedom, both armies being at an equal distance from it; that so proper remedies might be applied to all the distempers, into which those violent counsels had thrown the nation. By this, it appeared how firmly the King had adhered to his Declaration. During this negotiation, and after the late King had notice given him, what the King's demands were, he, upon reasons best known to himself, threw up all, and abandoned the Government, and left his army loose upon the nation, and the rabble upon the city of London, and withdrew himself: By which he did all that in him lay to cast these kingdoms into most violent convulsions, and exposed even his own friends to all the hardships, that might have been apprehended from enraged multitudes. For, if the providence of God, and the natural gentleness of the people of England, had not proved effectual restraints, this nation had become a scene of fire and blood; which the enemies of this kingdom persuaded the late King to venture on, rather than to stay, and suffer a Parliament to enquire into the causes of the miseries the nation was fallen under, and to secure their religion and property. Upon this, that part of the nation, which had, till then, adhered to the late King, finding themselves abandoned by him, desired, that the King would assume the administration of this forsaken Government; which he consented to do, till a convention of the States should be brought together, to give it a full and legal sanction. He did take a most particular care, that the elections should be carried on with all possible freedom, not only without violence and threatenings, but even without recommendations, or any sort of practice, how usual, and how innocent soever. The like care secured their liberty, when they met: Every man argued and voted in the great deliberations, then on foot, both with freedom and safety. Nor did the King speak to any person, or suffer any to speak in his name, to persuade, much less

The Jacobites were the more confounded at the news of it, because the Court of France did, to the last minute, assure King James, that they would never abandon his interests: And his Queen sent over assurances, to their party here, that England would be left out of the treaty, and put to maintain the war alone: Of which they were so confident, that they entered into deep wagers upon it; a practice little known among us before the war, but it was carried on, in the progress of it, to a very extravagant degree; so that they were ruined in their fortunes, as well as sunk in their expectations, by the peace; upon which, it was said, King James's Queen made a bold repartee to the French King, when he told her the peace was signed: She said, she wished it might be such, as should raise his glory, as much as it might settle his repose.

Nothing done by the treaty in favour of the French Protestants.

The most melancholy part of this treaty was, that no advantages were gained by it in favour of the Protestants of France, who were refugees in England, Germany, and Holland. King William having, on all occasions, declared himself their Protector, they expected, that he would also prove their Deliverer, and never conclude a peace with France, without obliging their Sovereign to restore them both to their estates, and the free exercise of their religion in their own country. Upon this presumption several consultations were held in London by the French Ministers, and the most considerable persons among the refugees there, wherein it was debated, in what method they should make their applications to the Plenipotentiaries at Ryswick, and upon what terms they should agree to their restoration, which some among them looked upon as certain. The result of these assemblies being transmitted to Monsieur Jurieu, the head of the French refugees in Holland, he, with his usual zeal for the Protestant cause, addressed himself to King William, who directed the Dutch Plenipotentiaries to open that matter at a distance to the French Ambassadors. The Dutch Ministers followed the King's orders; but the French King, to whom this overture was communicated, expressing an insuperable averfeness to it, and urging, that, as he did not pretend to prescribe to King William any rules about his subjects, so he expected the same liberty as to his own, which he looked upon as the great prerogative of a Sovereign; the matter was no farther insisted upon. As the case of the French Protestants was no part of the cause of the war, so it did not appear, that the Allies could do more for them than thus recommend them to the French King, who was so far engaged in a course of superstition and cruelty, that the condition of the

to threaten those, who seemed still to adhere to the late King's interest. So strict was he in observing the promises he had made in his Declarations. It was thought a remissness, and a hazarding the public too much, to interpose or move so little in those matters, as he then did. The Convention came to a full resolution, and judged, that the late King had broke the original contract, upon which this Government was at first founded, and, after that, had abandoned it; so that it was necessary for them, being thus forsaken by him, to see to their own security. And, as they judged, that the late King's right to govern them was sunk, so they did not think it was necessary or incumbent on them to examine that, which the whole nation, in general, as well as the King, in particular, had just reason to call in question, concerning the Birth of the pretended Prince of Wales. When the late King had quite dissolved the tie of the nation to himself, they thought they had no further concern upon them to inquire into that matter; and therefore they thought it fit to let it remain in that just doubtfulness, under which the late King's own method of proceedings had brought it. Besides that, a particular care had been taken by the late King, to cause all those, who had been in the management of that matter, or were suspected of having a share in the artifices about it, to be carried over into France; so that it was not possible to come at those persons, by the interrogating of whom truth might have been found out. The King expressed no ambitious desires of mounting the Throne. The addresses of both Houses, and the state of Europe, which seemed desperate without a mighty support from England, determined him in that matter. But, as he can appeal to God of the sincerity of his intentions, who alone knows them, so he has an infinite number of witnesses, who saw and can justify his whole conduct in the progress of that Revolution, if it were fit for him to appeal to them.

In the Answer to the second Memorial of King James, it is observed in justification of the Revolution, that, nothing was done in the progress of it, but that, which he made inevitable by some act or other of his own. It went not upon false suggestions, nor barely upon the pretences of redressing particular grievances, or some doubtful oppressions, much less on the ambitious designs of his Majesty, that are so often and so maliciously represented as the true causes of the Revolution. It was the late King's open throwing off the restraint of law, and his setting about a total subversion of the constitution, that drove the nation to extreme courses. The oaths of Allegiance can be understood only in the sense limited by law, and so they cannot be conceived to bind subjects to a King, who would not govern them any longer, unless he might be allowed to do it against law. A Revolution so brought about, carries in it no precedent against the security of Government, or the peace of mankind. That, which an absolute necessity enforced at one time, can be no warrant for irregular proceedings any other time, unless it be where the like necessity shall require the like remedies. But, since the late King thinks fit to reflect on the oaths of subjects, he ought also to remember the oath, which he himself swore at his coronation to defend the Church of England, and to maintain the laws; to neither of which he shewed any regard in his whole Government, but set himself to overturn both. The many alterations, that have been made in the succession to the Crown of England, upon occasions, that were neither so pressing nor so important as those of late were, should have obliged those, who penned this Memorial, to be more reserved and less positive in affirming things so contrary to the known history of this Kingdom. These revolutions were confirmed by laws, which were not afterwards upon succeeding changes repealed, for they continue still in force; nor was the Crown of England ever reckoned to be such a property to those, who held it, that they might use it or dispose of it at pleasure, as the Memorial seems to suppose.

1697. the French Protestants became worse by the peace; the Court being more at leisure to look after them, and to persecute them, than they thought fit to do, during the war.

Though the Imperialists were not a little concerned at the proceeding of their Allies, yet they thought it advisable to agree to a cessation of arms; and expresses were immediately dispatched to the respective armies upon the Rhine, to discontinue all acts of hostility. However, before Prince Lewis of Baden had notice of it, he had made himself master of the castle of Eberenburg, and was preparing to lay siege to Kirm. But what was still more mortifying to the Imperial Ministers, was, that advice had not come a few days sooner, of the great victory obtained at Zenta over the Turks, by the Emperor's forces, which would, in all probability, have made Spain and the rest less eager to sign the peace, and the French less stiff with regard to the Imperialists.

This victory was obtained by Prince Eugene of Savoy, who commanded the Imperial army in Hungary. He was a brother of the Count de Soissons, who, apprehending that he was not like to be so much considered, as he thought he might deserve in France, went and served the Emperor, and grew up, in a few years, to be one of the greatest Generals of the age.

The Grand Seignior came to command his armies in person, and lay encamped on both sides of the Theiss, having laid a bridge over the river; Prince Eugene marched up to him, and attacked his camp, on the west side of the river, and, after a short dispute, he broke in and was master of the camp, and forced all, who lay on that side, over the river; in this action many were killed and drowned; he followed them cross the Theiss, and gave them a total defeat: Most of their Janizaries were cut off, and the Prince became master of all their artillery and magazines: The Grand Seignior himself narrowly escaped, with a body of horse, to Belgrade; this was a complete victory, and was the greatest blow the Turks had received, in the whole war. At the same time, the Czar was very successful on his side against the Tartarians. The Venetians did little on their part; and the confusions in Poland made that Republic but a feeble Ally: So that the weight of the war lay wholly on the Emperor. But though he, being now delivered from the war with France, was more at leisure to prosecute this, yet his revenue was so exhausted, that he was willing to suffer a treaty to be carried on, by the mediation of England and Holland; and, the French being now no longer concerned to engage the Porte to carry on the war, the Grand Seignior, fearing a Revolution upon his ill success, was very glad to hearken to a treaty, which was carried on all this winter, and was finished the next year at Carlowitz, from which place it takes its name.

Not many days after the conclusion of the truce between the Empire and France, several Ambassadors of the Allies waited upon King William at Lee, where it was consulted what precautionary measures could be taken to prevent the violation of the peace lately concluded; and it was whispered, that an offensive and defensive Alliance was entered into, or rather renewed, between the Confederates. Now the Ambassadors of the Empire happening to complain again, how much they were wronged by a precipitate treaty, they were answered, That they ought to impute it to themselves, as having been often advised to put in their demands without delay, and not to retard the negotiation; and that they should not have flattered themselves, that more advantageous terms could have been obtained, since the French still insisted upon the first, from which they would never recede. The Imperialists, seeing their expostulations had no effect, bent their thoughts upon adjusting the remaining points in controversy with France. The principal difference seemed to be about Strasburg; and, since they could not obtain the restoration of it, they insisted to have the equivalent for it somewhat enlarged; as also that, besides Landau, all the places taken by France on that side, since the treaty of Nimueguen, should be yielded up, and fort Louis resigned to the Duke of Lorraine. But the French Plenipotentiaries answered, that they had no power to exceed their orders, and therefore could by no means comply with these demands.

At length, the Emperor considering that the treaty of Brisac and Friburg (the equivalent offered by the French for Strasburg) were places belonging to his hereditary dominions, consented to the exchange; and all other matters being concerted, and the German Princes finding they could struggle no longer, the treaty was signed by all, two days before the time limited by France was expired.

A new piece of treachery against the Protestant Religion broke out, in the conclusion of the treaty of Ryswick. The Ambassadors of the Protestant Princes being met together, at the House of the Elector of Mentz's Plenipotentiary, they named four Deputies, who delivered a memorial to the Mediator; wherein they demanded, that at Strasburg, and other cities of Alsatia, which belonged to France, the Lutheran religion should be tolerated, and enjoy all those rights and immunities, as in the year 1624. To this the French demanded eight days to answer. But, what misunderstanding soever there might be, between the French and Imperial Plenipotentiaries, as to other points, they agreed, or rather combined together, to have a clause inserted, in the VIth article of the treaty between the Empire and France, that the Roman Catholic religion, in the places to be delivered up, should remain in the same state, in which it was at that time, without any notice taken of the Protestants. By this means several churches were to be condemned, that otherwise, according to the laws of the Empire, and in particular of those dominions, were to be restored to the Protestants. The Elector Palatine accepted of this condition very willingly, being bigotted to a high degree: But some of the Princes, the King of Sweden in particular, as Duke of Deux-ponts, refused to submit to it: And a strong declaration was published by the Ministers of the Protestant Princes against this proceeding, as contrary to the laws of the Empire, to the peace of religion, in 1555; to the treaty of Westphalia, and to the preliminaries of the present treaty of Ryswick. But it was all in vain, for this affair had been secretly concerted among the whole Popish party, who are always firm to the interests of their religion, and zealous for them; whereas the Protestant Courts are too ready to sacrifice the common interest of their religion to their own private advantage. King William was troubled at this treacherous motion; but he saw no inclination

The importance of the thing, sixteen churches only being condemned by it, was not such, as to deserve, that he should venture a rupture upon it. And it was thought, the Elector Palatine might, on other accounts, be so obnoxious to the Protestants, and need their assistance and protection so much, that he would be obliged afterwards to restore these churches thus wrested from them. The King therefore contented himself with ordering his Plenipotentiaries to protest against this, which they did in a formal act, that they passed.

Reflections
on the peace.

By this peace King William concluded the great design of putting a stop to the progress of the French arms, which he had constantly pursued from his first appearance on the stage in the year 1672. There was not one of the Allies, who complained, that he had been forgot by him, or wronged in the treaty; nor had the desire of having his title universally acknowledged raised any impatience in him, or made him run into this peace with any indecent haste. The terms of it were indeed still too much to the advantage of France; but the length and charge of the war had so exhausted the Allies, that the King saw the necessity of accepting the best conditions, that could be got. It is true, France was more harassed by the war, yet the arbitrary frame of that Government made their King the Master of the whole wealth of his people; and the war was managed on both sides between them and us, with this visible difference, that every man, who dealt with the French King, was ruined by it; whereas, among us, every man grew rich by his dealings with the King; and it was not easy to see, how this could be either prevented or punished. The regard, that is shewn to Members of Parliament among us, makes, that few abuses can be enquired into or discovered; and the King found his reign grow so unacceptable to his people by the continuance of the war, that he saw the necessity of coming to a peace. The States-General were under the same pressure; they were heavier charged, and suffered more by the war than the English. The French got indeed nothing by a war, which they had most perfidiously begun. They were forced to return to the peace of Nimeguen; Pignerol and Brisac, which Cardinal Richelieu had considered as the keys of Italy and Germany, were now parted with. And all that base practice of claiming so much, under the head of re-unions and dependencies, was abandoned. The Duchy of Lorraine was also entirely restored. It was generally thought, that the French King intended to live out the rest of his days in quiet; for his parting with Barcelona made all people conclude, that he did not intend to prosecute the Dauphin's pretensions upon the Crown of Spain after that King's death by a new war; and that he would only try how to manage it by negotiation. The military men in France generally complained of the peace as dishonourable and base; and the whole nation, not entering into the views of their Monarch, were so little pleased with it, that they made very severe reflections on Messieurs Harlay, Crecy, and Callieres, their Plenipotentiaries, whom they traduced in their lampoons, which were publicly sung in Paris, and all over the Kingdom of France; whilst the courage, resolution, and wisdom of King William, to which the accomplishment of that peace was owing, were every where celebrated.

The King, having regulated with the States-General the number of forces, which they thought necessary to be kept on foot the next year, embarked for England, on the 13th of November, and the next morning safely landed at Margate, and, on the 15th, lay at Greenwich. The day following, he was received by the city of London, in a sort of triumph, with all the magnificence that he would admit. Some progress was made in preparing triumphal arches, but he put a stop to it. He seemed, by a natural modesty, to have contracted an antipathy to all vain shews; which was much increased in him by what he had heard of the gross excesses of flattery, to which the French had run, beyond the examples of former reigns, in honour of their King, who having shewn too great a pleasure in these, they had been so far pursued, that the wit of that nation was, for many years, chiefly employed in them; for they saw, that mens fortunes were more certainly advanced by a new and lively invention in that way, than by any service or merit whatsoever. This, in which the French King seemed to be too much pleased, rendering him contemptible to better judges, gave King William such an aversion to every thing that looked that way, that he scarce bore even with things that were decent and proper.

During the negotiations of peace, especially towards the conclusion of them, the discourse in England was general, what should be done with the army, when the war was over, and almost as general was the opinion, that it should be disbanded. As the King was but too sensible how the generality stood affected to the keeping up an army, he ordered many of his troops to be disbanded, and others to be sent into Ireland, soon after the peace (1). But, perceiving that the French were very slow in evacuating the places that were to be restored by the treaty, and were not beginning to reduce their forces, he put a stop to the disbanding; and, though he declared what he intended to do, yet he made no haste to execute it, till it should appear how the French intended to govern themselves. The King thought it was absolutely necessary, to keep up a considerable land force: He knew the French would still maintain great armies; and that the pretended Prince of Wales would certainly be assisted by them, if England should fall into a feeble and defenceless condition: The King

Consultations about a standing army

(1) This was done, pursuant to a plan proposed by the Earl of Galway, as appears from an original letter, written with the King's own hand to that Earl.

See, Oct. 18, 1697.

The peace being now made and ratified, it must be considered, what forces to keep on foot. I much approve the project you sent me, of keeping in Ireland twenty battalions of infantry, four regiments of dragoons, and eighteen troops of horse, and reducing the pay of the officers. I have imparted this project to none but Lord Portland, whom I am going to send to England, and with whom you must correspond about this matter, and let me know what public orders will be 1697. King of Spain was also in such an uncertain state of health, so weak and so exhausted, that it seemed necessary, that England should be in a condition to bar France's invading that Empire, and to maintain the rights of the House of Austria. But, though he explained himself thus in general to his Ministers, yet he would not descend to particulars, to tell how many he thought necessary; so that they had not authority to declare, what was the lowest number the King insisted on.

Papers were writ on both sides, for, and against a standing force (1): On the one hand, it was pretended, that a standing army was incompatible with public liberty, and, according to the examples of former times, the one must swallow up the other: It was proposed, that the militia might be better modelled, and more trained; which, with a good naval force, some thought, would be an effectual security against foreign invasions, as well as it would maintain our laws and liberties at home. On the other side, it was urged, that, since all our neighbours were armed, and the most formidable of them all kept up such a mighty force, nothing could give us a real security, but a good body of regulated troops: Nothing could be made of the militia, chiefly of the horse, but at a vast charge; and, if it was well regulated, and well commanded, it would prove a mighty army; but this of the militia was only talked of, to put by the other; for no project was ever proposed to render it more useful; a force at sea might be so shattered, while the enemy kept within their ports (as it actually happened at the Revolution) that this strength might come to be useless, when we should need it most; so that, without a considerable land force, it seemed the nation would be too much exposed. The word, standing army, had an odious sound in English ears; so the popularity lay on the other side; and the King's Ministers suffered generally in the good characters, they had hitherto maintained, because they studied to stop the tide, that ran so strong the other way.

The Parliament met, on the 3d of December, 1697, and the King opened the Session with the following speech.

‘ My Lords and Gentlemen,

‘ THE war, which I entered into by the advice of my people, is by the blessing of God, and their zealous and affectionate assistance, brought to the end we all proposed, an honourable peace; which I was willing to conclude, not so much to ease myself from any trouble or hazard, as to free the Kingdom from the continuing burden of an expensive war.

‘ I am heartily sorry my subjects will not at first find all that relief from the peace, which I could wish, and they may expect. But the funds intended for the last year's service have fallen short of answering the sums, for which they were given; so that there are considerable deficiencies to be provided for.

‘ There is a debt upon the account of the fleet and the army. The revenues of the Crown have been anticipated by my consent for public uses, so that I am wholly destitute of means to support the civil list; and I can never distrust you will suffer this to turn to my disadvantage, but will provide for me during my life in such a manner, as may be for my honour, and for the honour of the Government.

‘ Our naval force being increased to near double what it was at my accession to the Crown, the charge of maintaining it will be probe necessary to be given for the execution of this affair. My design is, to disband most of the regiments of foot, and dragoons, now in Ireland; and to send thither some of those that are in Flanders. I also intend to send thither your regiment of horse, and the three French regiments of foot, incorporating some officers, who have served in Piedmont, of the four regiments which are on the Rhine, and which I am going to reform, and to take all the French Protestant soldiers, and put them into the three abovementioned regiments. Be always assured of the continuation of my friendship.

W. R.

I think to reduce Wolsely's regiment to three troops, and yours to six, to remove all jealousy in England.

This letter, and several others, written in French with the King's own hand (which will all be inserted in their proper places) are now in the hands of the author, and were found among Mr Addison's papers after his death.

About five weeks after, the King writ the following letter to the Earl of Galway.

Kensington, Nov. 26, 1697.

I refer you to what Lord Portland will write to you about the forces, by which you will learn my intentions. I assure you, I am very much troubled to find things here run so high against the poor refugees. This has struck me; but you know, these sorts of things pass here very easily. Be ever assured of my esteem.

W. R.

I hope you'll be able to put an end very soon to the Parliament of Ireland.

Numb. XXIV. Vol. III.

(1) Particularly the following ones. An argument shewing, that a standing army is inconsistent with a free Government, and absolutely destructive to the Constitution of the English Monarchy. Mr Trenchard was thought to have the chief hand in this piece, which was printed in 1697, in 4to.

The second part of an argument shewing, that a standing army is inconsistent with a free Government, and absolutely destructive to the Constitution of the English Monarchy. With remarks on the late published list of King James's Irish forces in France. Printed in 1697, in 4to.

A Letter balancing the necessity of keeping a Land-force, in times of peace, with the dangers, that may follow on it. Printed in 1697, in 4to. This piece has been generally ascribed to the Lord Sommers, but it is doubtful, whether upon sufficient grounds. It is one of the best tracts, which were written on that side of the question.

The author begins with declaring, that he is far from the thought of a standing army; but that the case at that time was, ‘ Whether, considering the circumstances, that we and our neighbours are now in, it may not be both prudent and necessary for us to keep up a reasonable force from year to year; the state of affairs both at home and abroad being every year to be considered in Parliament, that so any such force may be either increased, lessened, or quite laid aside, as they shall see cause. If, says he, we were in the same condition, in which we and our neighbours were an age ago, I should reject the proposition with horror. But the case is altered; the whole world, more particularly our neighbours, have now got into the mistaken notion of keeping up a mighty force; and the powerfullest of all these happens to be our next neighbour, who will very probably 1697. 'proportionably augmented; and it is certainly necessary, for the interest and reputation of England, to have always a great strength at sea.

'The circumstances of affairs abroad are such, that I think myself obliged to tell you my opinion, that England cannot be safe without a land-force; and I hope we shall not give those, who mean us ill, the opportunity of effecting that under the notion of a peace, which they could not bring to pass by a war.

'I doubt not but you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, will take these particulars into your consideration in such a manner, as to provide the necessary supplies, which I do very earnestly recommend to you.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'That, which I most delight to think of, and am best pleased to own, is, that I have all the proofs of my people's affection, that a Prince can desire; and I take this occasion to give them the most solid assurances, that, as I never had, so I never will, nor can have, any interest separate from theirs.

'I esteem it one of the greatest advantages of the peace, that I shall now have leisure to 'rectify such corruptions or abuses, as may have crept into any part of the Administration during the war, and effectually to discourage profaneness and immorality. And I shall employ my thoughts in promoting trade, and advancing the happiness and flourishing estate of the kingdom.

'I shall conclude with telling you, that as I have, with the hazard of every thing, rescued your religion, laws, and liberties, when they were in the extremest danger; so I shall place the glory of my reign in preserving them intire, and leaving them so to posterity.'

This speech had various effects in the House of Commons; but no part of it gave more offence than that, wherein the King told them, that in his opinion a standing land-force was necessary. The Commons carried the jealousy of a standing army so high, that they could not bear the motion, nor did they like the way the King took of offering them his opinion in that point. This seemed a prescription to them, and might bias some in the counsels they were to offer the King, and be a bar to the freedom of debate: And therefore, as the managers for the Court had no orders to name any number, the House came to a resolution of paying off The debt banding the army and Dec Pr. H. 111.76

'probably keep great armies; and we may appear too inviting, if we are in such an open and unguarded condition, that the success of the attempt may seem to be not only probable, but certain. England is an open country, full of plenty, every where able to subsist an army; our towns and cities are all open, our rivers are all fordable; no passes nor strong places can stop an enemy, that should land upon us; so that the whole nation lies open to any army, that should once come into it.' To this it might be answered, 'Can an army be brought together, with a fleet to bring it over, and we know nothing of it? These things require time, and we cannot be supposed to destitute of intelligence, as not to know of such preparations. In such a case our fleet will cover us, while our militia may be exercised, and marched where the danger is apprehended.' 'This, replies the author, may seem plausible, and will no doubt work on such, as do not consider things with the attention, that is necessary. But do we not remember, that we were lately twice almost surprized; once from la Hogue, and again from Calaix? We must not expect, that God will always work miracles for us, if we were wanting to ourselves. If, in a time of war and jealousy, we were so near the being fatally over-run, without either warning or intelligence; it is much more possible to see such designs laid in a time of sloth and quiet, when we are under no fears nor apprehensions; and this may be so managed, that the notice we may have of it may come too late for us to be able to prevent or resist it. And what will our intelligence signify, if we are in no condition, either to hinder the descent, or to withstand the force, that may be sent against us? Absolute Governments, where all depends on the will of the Prince, and where men are ruined, who fail either in performing what is expected from them, or in keeping the secrecy, that is enjoined them, can both contrive and execute things in another manner, than can be conceived by those, who have the happiness to live in free Governments. Troops may have such orders for marches and counter-marches, that those, who are on the place, shall not be able to judge what is intended, till it is not possible to hinder it. Cross winds may make this come yet later to those, who have a sea between them. Orders may be given

'to many different persons in many different places, who shall know nothing of one another till they meet in a general rendezvous. It is true, we must suppose, that we shall have good fleets abroad; but one would not put so great a thing as the safety of a nation to such a hazard, nor depend upon a single security, when that is liable to accidents. The same wind, that may bring over a fleet and army to invade us, may keep our ships in port; so that it shall not be possible for them to look out; or, if they should have a favourable minute to get out, it may so shatter them, that they shall not be able to defend either our seas or ports. This may well be supposed, for it really happened, when the King landed first in England: The late King had then a powerful fleet, which, if it could have engaged the Dutch, would have been probably too hard for them, especially considering the transport fleet, that they guarded. But the East-wind, that brought over the King, kept them in the river, till the Dutch had passed them; and, when they got out, a storm stopped and shattered them so, that, without being able to come to any action, they were laid up. And would any man hazard the nation upon such a contingency? The author then considers the last thing in reserve, which is our Militia; and observes, the difference there is between troops, that have been long trained, who have learned the art, and are accustomed to the discipline of war, and the best bodies of raw and undisciplined multitudes. The whole method of war is now such, that disciplined troops must prove a very unequal match to much greater numbers of men, who yet perhaps, upon half their practice, might prove too hard for them. I know it will be urged, that our militia may be so trained and modelled, as to be made more capable of service than perhaps they are at present. This is a work of time, a project, that depends upon so many particulars, and may be subject to so many slips in the execution, that it must be confessed a nation is much exposed, if its safety and preservation must depend upon such uncertainties. We have troops, that have passed through a long apprenticeship, and to our cost have learned that unhappy trade, which is now become so universal, that it is thereby made necessary. We must either be preserved by it, or perish by it. Many gallant

In vain was it urged, that the nation was still unsettled, and not quite delivered from the fear of King James: That the friends of that abdicated Prince were as bold and as numerous as ever, and himself still protected by the French Kings, who, having as yet disbanded none of his troops, was consequently as formidable as before: That, if the army was intirely disbanded, the peace, which was obtained at the expence of so much blood and treasure, would be altogether precarious, and not only England, but all Europe lie once more at the mercy of that ambitious Monarch, an inveterate enemy to King William, the Protestant religion, and the liberties of Christendom, whom the necessity of his affairs, not his inclination, had reconciled. Notwithstanding these and many other arguments, the vote passed, which brought the army to less than eight thousand men. The Court was struck with this; and then tried, by an after-game, to raise the number to fifteen thousand horse and foot. If this had been proposed in time, it would probably have been carried without any difficulty; but the King was so long upon the reserve, that now, when he thought fit to speak out his mind, he found it was too late. So that a force, not exceeding ten thousand horse and foot, was all that the House could be brought to. This gave the King the greatest distaste of any thing, that had befallen him in his whole reign. He thought it would derogate much from him, and render his alliance so inconsiderable, that he doubted, whether he could carry on the Government, after it should be reduced to so weak and so contemptible a state. He said, that, if he could have imagined, that, after all the service he should have done the

'Gentlemen have broke the course of their studies, and the other methods of life they were in. It will not only be a hardship put upon them, but it will be the rendering ourselves naked and defenceless, if, after all the reputation, that we have risen to in war, we should sink into an unbecoming remissness in peace, and, upon the remote and uncertain fears of danger, that will probably never happen, expose ourselves to those, which we may certainly look for, as soon as we have put ourselves out of a capacity of resisting them.' He then proceeds to the last and strongest objection, which is, that this force will grow upon us, and continue among us, and have such an influence within doors, that it will maintain itself in the House of Commons; or, if that should fail, it will turn them out of doors, and quickly find ways to subsist, to grow upon the ruins of liberty and property. 'This,' replied he, is a large field, and history is so full of instances this way, that it will be easy to open copiously on the subject. From the Praetorian cohorts down to our modern armies, enough can be gathered to give a very frightful representation of a standing army. Who doubts it? But all the rhetoric, that his head will afford, is wrong applied in this case. It is not to be supposed, but that once a year a Parliament must have this matter a-fresh under consideration. They will see how the state of affairs varies either at home or abroad; and whether the forces are brought under such a management, that there is just cause of jealousy. And I leave it to you to judge, whether it is possible in so short a time to model and influence it, as to prepare them to invade their Country, and to destroy our Constitution. What Caesar, with all his genius, could not work his army to, but, after ten years conduct and success, can give small encouragement to others to attempt to bring about in one year. Perhaps you are more afraid of a secret influence than of open violence from them. The short of this is, you are afraid the House will be corrupted. I confess it is hard to answer this: Jealousy is stubborn and incurable; melancholy, when it grows to be a disease, raises many imaginary fears. They, who are haunted with that sullen humour, neither know what they are afraid of, nor why. Possible accidents are ever before them; and the thinking of these perpetually ruins their health, fours their humour, and makes them neglect all their present and certain concerns, while they are ever dreaming of what will probably never happen. We must consider our present danger, and the likeliest ways of securing ourselves from it, without amusing ourselves with what may possibly be brought about at some distance of time. Our Representatives do well to secure our Constitution by the most effectual means they can think of; but, after all, we must trust England to an House of Commons, that is, to itself. Whenever the fatal time comes, that this nation grows weary of liberty, and

'has neither the virtue, the wisdom, nor the force to preserve its Constitution, it will deliver all up, let all the laws possible, and all the bars imaginable, be put in the way to it. It is no more possible to make a Government immortal, than to make a man immortal. I do not deny but several inconveniences may be apprehended from a standing force, and therefore I should not go about to persuade you to it, if the thing did not seem indispensably necessary to our preservation. I would not have us venture upon present and certain ruin, because that, which must preserve us now from it, may, at some time hereafter, have ill effects on our liberty. They cannot be considerable, as long as England is true to itself; and, whenever the nation has lost that noble sense of liberty, by which it has been so long preserved, it will soon make fetters for itself, though it should find none at hand ready made.'

1697. the nation, he should have met with such returns, he would never have meddled in the affairs of it; and that he was weary of governing a nation, that was so jealous, as to lay itself open to an enemy, rather than trust him, who had acted so faithfully during his whole life, that he had never once deceived those, who trusted him. This, and a great deal more to the same purpose, he said to Bishop Burnet; but he saw the necessity of submitting to that, which could not be helped.

The Earl of Sunderland restores from Burnet.

During these debates, the Earl of Sunderland had argued with many upon the necessity of keeping up a greater force. This was in so many hands, that he was charged as the author of the counsel, of keeping on foot a standing army; he was therefore often named in the House of Commons with many severe reflections, for which there had been but too much occasion given during the two former reigns. The Tories pressed hard upon him, and the Whigs were so jealous of him, that he, apprehending that, while the Tories would attack him, the others would defend him but faintly, resolved to prevent a public affront, and resigned the office of Lord Chamberlain, not only against the intreaties of his friends, but even the King's earnest desire, that he would continue about him. Indeed, upon this occasion, the King expressed such a concern and value for him, that the jealousies were increased by the confidence, which the Court saw the King had in him. During the time of his credit, things had been carried on with more spirit and better success than before. He had gained such an ascendancy over the King, that he brought him to agree to some things, that few expected he would have yielded to. He managed the public affairs in both Houses with so much steadiness and so good a conduct, that he had procured to himself a greater measure of esteem, than he had in any of the former parts of his life; and the feeble and disjointed state things fell into, after he withdrew, contributed not a little to establish the character which his Administration had gained him.

Pursuant to their resolution, the Commons granted a supply for disbanding the army, and ordered the sum of 250,000*l.* to be given as a gratuity to such officers and soldiers, as were to be disbanded (1). Provision was also made for half-pay to Commission-officers being Englishmen; and a bill was ordered to be brought in, that the disbanded soldiers might exercise their trade in any town or corporation in the Kingdom.

The Commons, after having resolved the disbanding of the army, under pretence of providing for the security of the Kingdom, ordered a bill to be prepared for regulating the militia, and making them more useful; but, as it has been observed, this was no more than a pretence, for nothing was done towards such a regulation, nor any act passed for that purpose.

To raise the sums for disbanding the army, and paying their arrears, and making good all deficiencies, amongst other aids, a tax of three shillings in the pound was laid upon land, which was to be assessed on every county, in proportion to the rates of the first four shillings aid granted in 1691, by which means any future deficiency of this fund was prevented (2). It was also resolved by the Commons, that the fourth part of the clear value of all the beneficial grants from the Crown in England and Ireland, and all the forfeited estates which had been restored by the Crown, since the Restoration, should be applied to the use of the public. But there were so many petitions against this, that no progress was made in the bill for it.

As it was true, that the revenues of the Crown (as the King took notice in his speech) were anticipated for public uses, the Commons did at last resolve to grant what he had so earnestly desired ever since his advancement to the throne, namely, a revenue for life. Accordingly, a bill

This is now called the new subsidy, and is much the same with the old subsidy, of which an account has been given*. It was designed to grant for the civil list no more than six hundred thousand pounds; but as it had been promised at the treaty of Ryswick, that, King James being now as dead to England, his Queen should enjoy her jointure, which was fifty thousand pounds a year; and, as it was intended to settle a Court about the Duke of Gloucester, who was then nine years old, to enable the King to bear these expenses, this large provision was made for the civil list. But, by some great error in the management, though the Court never spent so little, yet payments were ill made, and, by some strange consumption, all was wasted. It is even said, that though the King had thus obtained an increase of a 100,000 l. to the civil list, on account of King James's Queen's pension, and the Duke of Gloucester's household, that he never paid the Queen one penny, nor allowed the Duke of Gloucester above 15,000 l. a year; nay, so frugal was the King, that, though he kept the Duke by women's hands, some time after the revenue was granted, he refused to advance one quarter of this allowance to buy plate and furniture; so the Princess was forced to be at that expence herself.

New East-India Company created.
Pr. II. C. III. 85.
Burnet.

While the Commons were raising the supplies for the next year, the affair of the East-India trade, which had been depending so many years, was revived. The old Company having offered to advance 700,000 l. at four per cent. for the service of the Government, in case the trade to India might be settled on them, exclusive of all others, the House seem'd inclined to embrace their proposal; when another number of Merchants, of whom Sir John Ward, Sir Francis Eyles, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, and Mr Samuel Shepherd were the chief, and whose scheme was approved by Mr Montague, Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed to the House to raise two millions, upon the security of a good fund, to pay the interest at eight per cent. on condition the trade to India might be settled on the subscribers, exclusive of all others. They also proposed, that these subscribers should not be obliged to trade in a joint stock; but, if any Members of them should afterwards desire to be incorporated, a Charter should be granted to them for that purpose. The House judged this new overture, not only to be more advantageous to the Government, but likewise very likely to settle this controverted trade on a better foundation than it was on before. A bill was therefore brought into the House, for settling the trade to the East-Indies on those, who should subscribe the two millions, according to the limitations beforement'd, and the following resolutions (1): First, That every subscriber might have the liberty of trading yearly to the amount of his respective subscription, or might assign over such his liberty of trading to any other person. Secondly, That his Majesty be empowered to incorporate such of the subscribers, as should desire the same. Thirdly, That the powers and privileges for carrying on the East-India trade should be settled by Parliament. Fourthly, That the subscribers should enjoy the eight pounds per cent. and liberty of trading to the East-Indies, exclusive of all others, for the term of ten years, and until the same should be redeemed by Parliament. Fifthly, That every person subscribing five hundred pounds have a vote, and no person to have more votes than one. Sixthly, That all ships, laden in the East-Indies, should be obliged to deliver in England. Seventhly, That no person, who should be a Member of any Corporation trading to the East-Indies, should trade otherwise than in the joint stock of such Corporation, of which he was a Member. Eighthly, That five pounds per annum, ad valorem, upon all returns from the East-Indies, be paid by the importer, to be placed to the account of the subscribers, towards the charge of sending Embassadors, and other extraordinary expences (2). And, ninthly, That over and above the duties now payable, a further duty of one shilling and ten-pence per pound weight be laid upon all wrought silks imported from India and Persia, to be paid by the importer. Against this bill, the old East-India Company presented a petition, to which the Commons had so much regard, as to offer them to settle this trade upon them, if they would accept it on the same terms and limitations, on which the others were contented to take it. But the Members of the old Company, imagining they should be too hard for the new in India, and make them weary of a losing bargain, rejected the offer. However, the old Company at last offer'd to advance the two millions; but it was now too late; for the party was formed against upon them; a further duty was laid upon salt; and the duties upon all lustrings and alomodes imported were doubled; the time was enlarged for purchasing annuities upon the several acts of Parliament, for granting the same; and lastly, an act passed for raising a sum not exceeding two millions, upon a fund for payment of annuities after the rate of eight per cent. per annum, redeemable by Parliament.

(1) The fund for paying the interest of eight per cent. for these two millions, was a duty upon salt, and an additional duty upon stamped vellum, parchment, and paper.

(2) This article refers to a part of the scheme proposed to the Ministry; which was, that his Majesty would be pleased to send an Embassador Extraordinary to the Great Mogul, in whose dominions the East-India Company had their chief settlements and factories.

ries, to notify the establishment of this new Company, and desire his protection and favour. The Gentleman, pitched upon for this employment, was Sir William Norris, Member of Parliament for Liverpool, who had a very noble allowance for his equipage and table; but the old Company, who were in possession of the settlements and factories, so managed matters in India, by their factors and agents, that not only the Viceroy on the coasts, but the Emperor himself, received very ill impressions of the conduct and designs of the new Company; and, when Sir William Norris arrived there, it was three or four months before he could procure the necessary passes and convoys for the Court at Agra, of which at last he had audience, but to very little purpose, being in no wise equal in benefit to the charges of the embassy only, and the Embassador died in his return homewards.

(1) The

1698. against them, and their offer had no other effect, but to raise a clamour against this proceeding, as extremely rigorous, if not unjust. For tho' the King had reserved a power to himself, by a clause in the old Company's Charter, to dissolve them upon three years notice, and consequently (it was urged) if such notice was given, no injustice was done them, yet the clause (it was answered) reserving that power, was to be considered only as a threatening, to oblige them to good conduct; and it was not usual to dissolve a Company, by virtue of such a clause, when no fault was objected. The Commons, however, passed the bill in favour of the new adventurers, whose example, after hearing the arguments on both sides, was followed by the Lords. After which the bill received the Royal assent (1).

Pursuant to this act, the Commissioners, appointed by the King for taking subscriptions towards the raising of two millions, and for settling a new East-India Company, laid open their books at Mercers-Hall, the 14th of July; and such was the zeal, which people of all ranks, and even foreigners, shewed upon this occasion, that, in two or three days, the whole sum, and something above it, was subscribed. And, very probably, two millions more had been subscribed, had not the books been shut before the distant Corporations, private men in remote counties, and Merchants beyond sea, could remit their Commissions for the sums, which they intended to subscribe. The dispatch of so great a work in so few days, after the nation had borne so chargeable a war for so many years, surprized all the world. And as it greatly mortified all those, who were assured, that the King would be disappointed of this supply; so it gave the neighbouring nations an astonishing image, both of the opulence of England, and the strength of the Government.

However, this proceeding threw the old Company, and all concerned in it, into the hands of the Tories, which made a great breach and disjoining in the City of London. And it is certain, that this act, together with the inclinations, which those of the Whigs, who were in good poits, had expressed, for keeping up a greater land-force, contributed to the blasting of the reputation, which they had hitherto maintained, of being good patriots, and was made use of throughout England by the Tories, to disgrace both the King and them. To this, another charge of an high nature was added, that they robbed the public, and applied much of the money, that was given for the service of the nation, both to the supporting a vast expence, and to the raising great estates to themselves. This was sensible to the people, who were uneasy under heavy taxes, and were too ready to believe, that, according to the practice in King Charles's time, a great deal of the money, that was given in Parliament, was divided among those, who gave it. These clamours were raised and managed with great dexterity by those, who intended to render the King, and all, who were best affected to him, so odious to the nation, that by this means they might carry such an election of a new House of Commons, as that by it all might be overturned. It was said, that, the Bank of England, and the new East-India Company, being in the hands

(1) The old Company followed the bill to the House of Lords, where they were heard by their Counsel, Sir Thomas Powell and Sir Bartholomew Shower. Those readers, that are desirous to know more of this matter, may find it in the representation that was made to the Lords, to the following effect:

'That this bill invaded their property, and ruined many families. That, in the Charters granted them by Queen Elizabeth, King James I., King Charles I., and King James II., it was suggested, that their Corporation was for the honour of England, for the increase of navigation, and the advance of trade. That the said Charter contained a grant of the trade to East-India to the Company, exclusive of all others. That by some of them they were constituted the Lords proprietors of Bombay, and the island of St Helena. That by these grants they were induced to think they had a right in law to the trade, at least that they should have an uncontroverted title to the lands, and that on this presumption, and relying on the public faith and credit of the Great Seal of England, they had expended above a million in fortifications, and acquired revenues of 44,000*l.* per annum, and many settlements and privileges. That, in the year 1691, the House of Commons had made a resolution, That the East-India trade should be carried on in a joint stock, exclusive to all others. That their Company was confirmed and settled by three Charters granted by his present Majesty on the 7th of October, and 17th of November 1693, and 28th of September 1694. That, upon the security of these Charters, the Company consented to a new subscription. That there was a new subscribed 744,000*l.* and the money brought in during the sitting of the Parliament; and that nothing was done, said, or offered against his Majesty's Charter of regulations; so that upon the public faith (at least tacitly given) seven hundred and eighty-one new adventurers, of whom many were widows and orphans, did subscribe a large part of their substance to support this trade, during a hazardous war, for the profit and honour of England: And that the new adventurers thought they might without any hazard subscribe on the security of a Charter, which was so plainly designed by his Majesty to preserve the East-India traffic, then in danger of being lost. That, on the 10th of June, after the bill now depending before their Lordships was brought in, the Company did agree to submit their present stock to a valuation of 50*l.* per cent. viz. 20*l.* per cent. for their dead stock, and 30*l.* per cent. for their quick stock, which they were contented to warrant at the said sums; and upon these terms they offered to open their books for new subscriptions, in order to raise the two millions: That afterwards, to ascertain the payments of the said two millions, they had a general Court on the 20th of June, in which they agreed to an immediate subscription by private adventurers of 200,000*l.* to be paid at the first payment, subject to make good the subsequent payments; which subscription was accordingly made. That it has been the constant practice in farms, bargains, and offers of the like nature, not to close with a new proposal, till the first bidder be asked, whether he is able to advance further? And that, notwithstanding their Charters, and the right they had to the trade, they were early told their proposal should be opposed, though they offered the two millions in question. And lastly, That the bill allowed foreigners, as well as the King's subjects, to subscribe to the two millions, whereby they would be let into the secrets and mysteries of this trade, which might produce effects very pernicious to the general interest of the nation. To this the Counsel for the new subscribers replied, That in the recital of their Charters, the old Company had omitted to give an account of the proviso inserted therein, viz. That the respec-

of Whigs, they would have the command of all the money, and by consequence of all the trade of England; and this raised the great opposition to the new Company in both Houses of Parliament. The King was very indifferent in the matter at first; but the greatness of the sum, that was wanted, which could not probably be raised by any other project, prevailed on him.

Besides the East-India trade, the Commons took into consideration that of the African Company, which had long wanted a due regulation. And, upon account of the necessity of keeping up forts and castles for the defence of English factories on the coast of Guinea, there being no regular Government among those barbarous people, on whose protection they might safely rely, the Parliament made a bill to settle the Company, and to enable them to maintain all such forts, as they now had in their possession, or should hereafter purchase or erect for the preservation of their trade; and enacted at the same time, that any of the subjects of this realm, as well as the Company, might, after the 24th of June, trade from England, or after the 1st of August, from any of his Majesty's plantations in America, to the coast of Africa, between Cape Mount and the Cape of Good Hope, both the Company and the free Traders or Interlopers, answering a duty of ten per cent. of the value of the goods exported thither from England, or from his Majesty's American plantations, towards the maintenance of the forts and settlements.

Notwithstanding the severe laws, that were in force against such as transport English wool to foreign parts, who are commonly called Owlers, yet many of them, encouraged by the powerful incentive of gain, continued their clandestine practices to the great detriment of the nation, and profit of the French, who had lately set up a considerable woollen manufacture in Picardy. The Parliament therefore, the more effectually to obviate that evil, made many prudent provisions in an act for explanation and better execution of former acts against transportation of wool, fullers earth, and scouring clay.

The Parliament likewise, this Session, applied themselves with great diligence to discover and punish such offenders, who carried on a fraudulent and secret commerce with France, and, to the great damage of the Royal Lustring Company of this Kingdom, had, for divers years past, surreptitiously brought in great quantities of French alamoses and lustrings. The first occasion of this discovery was a pafs from the Admiral of France for an English ship, that served at once for the ovling and smuggling trades; which pafs, at the breaking out of the late conspiracy, was intercepted at the Post-office, together with all the letters, which at that time were either coming from France, or sending thither. This pafs had a long time remained useless in the hands of the Secretary of State, by reason it was granted on a supposititious name; but, the same being communicated to Mr Hilary Reneu, an eminent French Protestant Merchant, who was the chief manager and promoter of the Lustring Company, and who, upon several occasions, had done signal services to the Government, he, by this help, and other concurring indications, at last found out the smugglers, and, having caused their books to be seized, petitioned the House of Commons, in the name of the Royal Lustring Company, five Kings, that granted them, reserved a power to make them void upon three years warning. That the King by his Charter could not grant the trade to the East-Indies, exclusive of all others; and that several recoveries had been made against them at law for prosecuting such a pretended right. That, as the Crown has not a power to grant such a right, so his present Majesty had not in fact granted any such right exclusive. That, when they mention'd the resolution of the Commons in 1691, they omitted their other resolution, That it was lawful for all persons to trade to the East-Indies, unless restrained by act of Parliament. Neither did they take notice of the two addresses made by the House of Commons to the King in 1691 and 1692 to dissolve the Company. That, on the 14th of November 1692, Sir Eduard Seymour delivered to the Commons a message, importing, 'That his Majesty had required the East-India Company to answer directly, whether they would submit to such regulations, as his Majesty should judge proper and most likely to advance the trade? And the Company having agreed to it, and declared their resolution in writing, his Majesty had commanded a Committee of his Privy-council to prepare regulations; which they did, and offered them to the Company; but that, notwithstanding their declaration of submission, they rejected almost all the material particulars, so that his Majesty finding, that what possibly the House of Commons might have expected, and indeed was necessary to preserve this trade, could not be perfected by his own authority alone; and that the Company could not be induced to consent to any such regulations, as might have answered the intentions of the House of Commons, and that the concurrence of the Parliament was requisite to make a complete and useful settlement of this trade, he had directed all the proceedings in this matter to be laid before them, and recommended to them the preparing such a bill, in order to pass into an act of Parliament, as might establish this trade on such foundations, as were most likely to preserve and advance it.' It was also urged against the old Company, that, their Charter being become void by their non-payment of the tax imposed upon them by Parliament, they obtained a new Charter, the 7th of October 1693, by indirect means, having that year paid eighty odd thousand pounds out of the Company's stock for special service. That this Charter was contested before the Queen and Council by those they called Interlopers, upon the hearing whereof it was unanswerably proved, that the King had not, by law, a power to grant the trade to some persons exclusive of others, and that the Company's affairs were then in such a condition, that it would be a plain cheat to others, that should come in upon their stock. That however, law and reason failing, they had recourse to other methods, and great sums of money were distributed (as it was acknowledged before a Committee of both Houses of Parliament) to get another Charter; but that those, who were concerned to advise his Majesty in point of law, were so just to their trust, as to take care, that no right of trade, exclusive of others, was granted; and also that the Company should submit to such alterations, restrictions, and qualifications, as the King should make on the 29th of September 1693, following; and so, on the 17th of November 1693, a new Charter of regulations was made, and another, the 28th of September 1694, wherein, amongst other things, was this proviso; That if it should appear to the King, his heirs, and successors, that the said two Charters, or any other Charters heretofore granted, should not be profitable to the King, his heirs, and successors, or to this realm; that then and from thenceforth, upon and after three years warning to be given to the said Company by the King, &c. the same should cease, be void, and determine. That it appeared by the proceedings of the House of Commons in 1694, how this Charter was obtained; which had more in it of private promises than 1698. Company, that these books, letters, and other papers, in which the contrivances to ruin the Luftring manufacture in this Kingdom appear, might be laid before the House and examined. The Commons received this petition, and referred the matter to the Committee of trade, at the head of which was then Sir Rowland Gwyn, who, with unwearied application and industry, made a full discovery of the smuggling traders, to which they themselves gave no small handle, by the ill contrived and incoherent metaphors, under which, in their correspondence with their agents in France, they endeavoured to conceal their unlawful practices; as, for instance, when they said, That the cart (meaning the ship) would not set out, because of the contrary winds. Sir Rowland having made his report of the whole matter to the House of Commons, it was resolved on the 20th of April, 'That the manufacture of lustrings and alamodes, set up by the Luftring Company, had been very advantageous and beneficial to the Kingdom, by employing great numbers of the poor, and preventing the exportation of our coin, for purchasing those commodities. That there had been a very destructive trade carried on with France, during the war, for importing alamodes and lustrings contrary to law, whereby the King had been defrauded of his customs, and our own manufactures greatly discouraged. That the same vessels, which imported alamodes and lustrings, exported great quantities of our wool. That thereby intelligence had been carried into France, during the war, and the enemies of the Government had been conveyed from justice out of this Kingdom (particularly Cardell Goodman) and had had frequent opportunities of returning hither to carry on their pernicious designs. That by the intercepted letter, wherein the French King's passport was inclosed, compared with Mr John Goudet's handwriting, and the copy of the said letter entered in Mr Goudet's copy-book of letters, and by Mr Goudet's seal, wherewith the passport letter was sealed, it did appear, that the said passport was procured and paid by the said Mr Goudet and Company. That the said passport was sent back, in order to be renewed, the time, for which it was granted, being expired. That Goudet, Longueville, and Barreau were partners, during the time this smuggling trade was carried on. That Mr Stephen Seignoret, Mr Baudouin, and Mr Santini were also partners, and had imported great quantities of French alamodes and lustrings. That Mr Peter de Hearce dealt with several persons in France for French silks, and other commodities from France, under several fictitious and counterfeit names. That John du Maistre, Peter Baraillau, Diana Mason, John Auriol, Isaac Auriol, John Pancier, John Guggier, and several others, had been concerned in the smuggling trade. That a bill be brought in for the encouragement of the Luftring Company, and the more effectual preventing the fraudulent importation of lustrings and alamodes, and the exportation of wool and fullers earth. That John Goudet, David Barreau, Peter Longueville, Stephen Seignoret, René Baudouin, Nicholas Santini, and Peter de Hearce (to whom were afterwards added John than public faith: That it was not to be wondered, that the Parliament took no notice of the matter, whilst the new subscribers paid in their money, when it was considered, that, according to Sir Basil Firebra's depositions, there were several contracts, some to the value of 60,000*l.* on account of procuring a new Charter, and others to the value of 40,000*l.* on account of procuring an act of Parliament. That by such means the matter might be overlooked for a while, but it was not long before the Parliament took public notice of it; and, if the greater affairs of the nation had not been so urgent, and the Session been so near an end, perhaps the Company might have had justice done them, and had been passed complaining of any imaginary injustice done them now. That therefore it was plain, that it was not for the profit and honour of the nation, and to support the trade, that the new subscribers came in; but that they were deluded into it by a Charter obtained by indirect ways, and by the hopes of an act of Parliament to confirm it, to be obtained in the same manner. That the trade would have been much better preserved, and more to the honour of the nation, if no such underhand practices had been carried on. That if some persons, thinking themselves to have a greater reach than others, or being deceived by the old Company's making his Majesty believe their stock to be worth 750,000*l.* and by afterwards sharing 325,000*l.* of the new subscribers money among themselves, only the persons failing them, who promised to get an act of Parliament, or by losses at sea, or by what other means soever it were, happened to fail in their expectation, no body was answerable for it but themselves; especially since they had warning enough by the transactions before the Council. It was alleged farther, that, in the reigns of Edward III. and Queen Elizabeth, upon petition a parliament of patents granted for monopolies, most of them were immediately revoked, and the rest left to the law. That, in King James I's time, an act of Parliament passed to make void a Charter for the sole trade to Spain, and another against all monopolies. That though the patents for some trades with joint stocks (whilst the trades, for which they were granted, were in their infancy) have been permitted for the settling of a trade, and till the first adventurers have reaped some reasonable compensation for their first undertaking and adventures, yet afterwards, when those trades have increased and become great, the wisdom of the nation has always thought fit to open a way for the Kingdom to receive a general benefit thereby. That it never was esteemed a breach of the public faith, or a derogation either from the credit of the Great Seal, or from the honour of our Kings, to have their patents annulled by Parliament, when the grants were thought by that Grand Council of the nation not to be profitable, or to be against the common right of the subject, and that no King or Queen thought themselves bound in honour or conscience not to pass an act of Parliament to make void such patents. That the King, being busied in the many arduous affairs of the Kingdom, cannot be supposed to know always what he might legally grant, and is oftentimes deceived in his grants; and for that reason they are often annulled by the ordinary course of law; and so might this Company's patent have been; for, all persons having a right by law to trade to the East-Indies, unless excluded by Parliament, the King by his Charter could not grant to the Company any new right to the trade, besides the privileges of an incorporated body; but that the Commons justly bearing an high veneration to his present Majesty, who had run so great hazards, and performed so glorious achievements for the honour and good of the nation, had notwithstanding taken care in this bill, that nothing should interfere with his Majesty's patent. That by this patent the old Company had indeed power to trade 1698. John Pierce, John du Maitre and John Auriol be impeached before the Lords of high crimes and misdemeanors, and be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House. That the rest of the smugglers be prosecuted by Mr Attorney-General and Mr Solicitor-General. And lastly, that Mr Hilary Renew, for the great service done this Kingdom in promoting the manufacture of alamoses and lustrings, and discovering the fraudulent importation thereof, and exportation of wool, deserved the countenance and protection of the Government: And that a bill for naturalizing him and his family be permitted to pass this House gratis.

The impeached smugglers having put in their answer to the articles exhibited against them, and the Committee of the House of Commons made their replications, a great dispute arose between both Houses of Parliament; the Lords insisting, that the trials should be at the bar of their House, where the Committee of the Commons must have stood; and the Commons, on the other hand, insisting upon their having a convenient place appointed for the managers of the impeachments against the prisoners, whereby they might be better enabled to make good their charge against them. This gave occasion for a conference, which being ineffectual to accommodate the matter, the Commons resolved, that they would be present at the trials, as a Committee of the whole House, in regard the affair was of great consequence to the trade of the Kingdom. Whereupon the Lords acquainted the Commons, that they would proceed, on the Monday following, upon the trials at Westminster, where seats would be provided for both houses. All this while the persons accused had conceived no small hopes of impunity from the disagreement between the Lords and Commons, but, when they saw that matter adjusted, eight of them confessed themselves guilty. Whereupon the Commons went up to the bar of the Lords House, and their Speaker in their name having demanded judgment against the offenders, the Lords imposed a fine of ten thousand pounds upon Stephen Seignores; of three thousand pounds on René Boudouin; of fifteen hundred pounds on John Goudet and Nicolas Santini; of one thousand pounds on Peter de Hearce, John Pierce, and John du Maitre; and of five hundred pounds on David Barreau; and ordered, that they should be imprisoned in Newgate, until they had paid their respective fines; and the Commons addressed the King, that those fines might be appropriated to Greenwich Hospital, which he ordered accordingly.

Another sort of offenders were this Session Falsely animadverted upon by the Commons, but had the good fortune to escape with impunity. The Excise bills were at this time of very great use in the nation, by supplying the scarcity of money, during the recoining of the silver species. Now because there was an interest of seven pounds twelve shillings per ann. allowed upon the second issuing of these bills out of the Excise, after they had been paid in, on any of the King's taxes, whereas at their first issuing out of the Excise they bore no interest, this encouraged several of the King's officers, both in the Excise, the Customs, and the Excise, to contrive together to get great sums of money by false indorsements on these Excise bills, before they had circulated about, and been brought into any branch of the King's revenue. The most considerable persons, who had carried on this unwarrantable practice, were Mr Charles Duncomb, Receiver-General of the Excise; Mr John Knight, Treasurer of the Customs; Mr Bartholomew Burton, who had a place in the Excise-office; and Mr Reginald Marriot, one of the Deputy-tellers of the Excise; which last, to procure his pardon, compounded to accuse the rest. Upon a full proof of the matter, Duncomb and Knight, who were Members of the House of Commons, were first expelled the House, and committed prisoners to the Tower; Burton sent to Newgate, and bills ordered to be brought in to punish them. The bill against Mr Duncomb, when by a fine of near half his estate, which was computed at 400,000*l.* (1), was set upon him, quickly passed the House of Commons, notwithstanding the opposition that was made to it, particularly by Sir Thomas Trevor the Attorney-General. But, being sent up to the House of Lords, and the House being equally divided, the Duke of Leeds gave his casting vote for rejecting the bill. But, Mr Duncomb being set at liberty by the order of the House of Lords, without the consent of the Commons, the latter repented it to that degree, that they caused him to be remanded to the Tower of London, where he continued till the end of the Session. The bills against Knight and trade to the East-Indies, and other privileges, but without any express clause to exclude others, or any covenant (as was in the former Charters from the Crown) that his Majesty would not grant licence to others, to trade thither, during the continuance of the said Charter; so that even, according to the Charters themselves, all other subjects of England had a right to trade to the East-Indies, and many actually traded thither without any hindrance. That, though the old Company talked to much of their dependence on the security of their Charters, yet they themselves were convinced, that their right was not well founded, since they had formerly laid out so much money to get an act of Parliament to confirm their Charters, and had lately offered to lend 700,000*l.* to the Government, to have the trade to themselves, exclusive of all others. As to their offering afterwards to raise two millions, it was answered, That they made no such offer with an intention that it should take effect, but only as an amusement to gain time, and so to baffle the bill; for, when they agreed to submit their stock to a valuation of 50*l.* per cent. they knew very well, that others did not value it, at any thing near so much. And as to their subscribing 200,000*l.* subject to make good the subsequent payments of the two millions, that it was only to obtain what they had been so long aiming at, viz. an act of Parliament exclusive, for the sum of 200,000*l.* whereby the King would be defeated of a much more considerable loan; others delivering in subscriptions for about 1,200,000*l.* And, lastly, that the old Company heretofore thought it an advantage to admit foreigners into their trade; and that many were actually now in the present Company, though they were pleased to argue against it.

(1) He had a little before purchased the great manor of Helmby in Yorkshire, of the trustees for George Villiers late Duke of Buckingham, at 95,000*l.* and paid down the money, when the want of coin was the most complained of.

1692. and Burton had the same fate; and so all the noise this sort of forgery had made, in town and country, was hushed on a sudden, and no more heard of it.

The Commons, this year, designed to apply part of all the forfeited estates to the use of the public; in order to which, they inquired into the grants made by King Charles II and King James II, and ordered a bill to be brought in to make them void. Afterwards they examined the grants made by King William in Ireland; and, because a grant was found made to Mr Raylton, which Mr Mountague, Chancellor of the Exchequer, owned to be for his benefit, a warm debate arose; and Mr Mountague's enemies moved, That he should withdraw; which passing in the negative, it was resolved by a great majority, That it was the opinion of this House, that the Honourable Charles Mountague, Chancellor of the Exchequer, for his good services to this Government, did deserve his Majesty's favour.

The next day, the Commons in a body presented an address to the King, wherein 'they with great joy and comfort remembered the testimonies, which his Majesty had given them of his sincerity and zeal for the Reformed Religion as established in this Kingdom; and in particular they acknowledged the late declaration, which his Majesty had made from the Throne, that he would effectually discourage profaneness and immorality; which, chiefly by the neglect and ill example of too many, were (like a general contagion) diffused and spread throughout the Kingdom, to the great scandal and reproach of the Protestant Religion, and to the dishonour and prejudice of his Majesty's Government. Therefore, in concurrence with his Majesty's pious intentions, they most humbly desired, that his Majesty would issue out his Royal proclamation, commanding all Judges, Justices of the peace, and other Magistrates, to put in speedy execution the good laws, that were now in force, against profaneness and immorality, giving encouragement to all such, as did their duty therein. And, since the examples of men in high and public stations have a powerful influence upon the lives of others, they most humbly besought his Majesty, that all vice, profaneness, and irreligion might in a particular manner be discouraged in all those, who had the honour to be employed near his Royal Person, and in all others, who were in his Majesty's service by sea or land; and that his Majesty would upon all occasions distinguish piety and virtue by marks of his favour. They further besought his Majesty to give effectual orders for the suppressing all pernicious books and pamphlets, which contained impious doctrines against the Holy Trinity, and other fundamental articles of the Protestant faith, tending to the subversion of the Christian Religion; and that his Majesty's proclamation might be ordered to be read at least four times in the year in all Churches and Chapels, immediately after divine service; and at the assizes and quarter sessions of the peace, just before the charge is given.' The King's answer was, That he could not but be very well pleased with an address of this nature, and he would give immediate directions in the several particulars they desired. But that he could wish that some more effectual provision were made for the suppressing those pernicious books and pamphlets, which their address took notice of. And on the 28th of February was published a proclamation for preventing and punishing immorality and profaneness; and the House of Lords, to express their zeal for so good a design, prepared and passed a bill for the more effectual suppressing atheism, blasphemy, and profaneness, to which, after several conferences, the Commons gave their concurrence.

It is remarked, that the divisions among the Clergy, at that time, was one great encouragement to the profane. There were manifestly two different parties among them; one was firm and faithful to the present Government, and served it with zeal; these did not envy the Dissenters the ease, that the toleration gave them; they wished for a favourable opportunity of making such alterations, in some few rites and ceremonies, as might bring into the Church those, who were not at too great a distance from it. Others took the oaths indeed, and concurred in every act of compliance with the Government, but they were not only cold in serving it, but were always blaming the Administration, and aggravating misfortunes; they expressed a great esteem for Jacobites, and, in all elections, gave their votes to those, who leaned that way: At the same time, they shewed great resentments against the Dissenters, and were enemies to the toleration, and seemed resolved never to consent to any alteration in their favour. The bulk of the Clergy ran this way, so that the moderate party was far out-numbered. Profane minds had too great advantages from this, in reflecting severely on a body of men, that took oaths, and performed public devotions, when the rest of their lives was too public and too visible a contradiction to such oaths and prayers.

About the same time, was formed the Society for the reformation of manners, which took its rise in the following manner.

In the reign of King James II, the fear of Popery was so strong, as well as just, that many persons in and about London began to meet often together, both for devotion and for their further instruction. Things of that kind had been formerly practised only among the Puritans and Dissenters; but those were of the Church, and came to the Ministers to be assisted with forms of prayer and other directions. They were chiefly conducted by Dr Beveridge and Dr Horneck. Some disliked this, and were afraid it might be the original of new factions and parties; but others thought, that it was not fit nor decent to check a spirit of devotion, at such a time. It might have given scandal, and it seemed a discouraging of piety, and might be a means to drive well meaning persons over to the Dissenters. After the Revolution these societies grew more numerous, and, for a greater encouragement to devotion, they got such collections to be made, as maintained many Clergymen to read prayers in so many public places, and at so many different hours, that devout persons might have that comfort at every hour of the day. There were likewise constant Sacraments every Sunday, in many Churches; and there were both greater numbers and greater appearances of devotion at Prayers and Sacraments, than had been observed in the memory of man. These societies resolved to inform the magistrates

From this they were called Societies for the reformation of manners, and were encouraged by some Magistrates, tho' treated roughly by others.

A Society for propagating Religion in foreign parts. Kennet. There was also about the same time another design laid, and chiefly managed by an active Divine, Dr Thomas Bray, for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, by sending our Missionaries, Catechisms, Liturgies, and other books for the instruction of the people, too ignorant and profane, in our West-India colonies and plantations. He had taken great pains to promote this undertaking, and had procured the contributions of many persons, to enable him to proceed in the burden and growing expences of it. And, to take all opportunities of establishing a

March 3. fund for this project, upon the second reading of a bill in the House of Commons, for the better discovery of estates given to superstitious uses, the Doctor presented a petition to the House, praying, that some part of these estates might be set apart for the propagation of the Reformed Religion in Maryland, Virginia, and the Leeward Islands; or else that some other provision might be made for that purpose.

The Earl of Macclesfield's case.

The Earl of Macclesfield, to vindicate the honour of his family, was forced now to publish the shame of his marriage-bed, and to prefer a bill in the House of Lords, to be divorced from his wife. It seems his Lady, about ten years before, being weary of living with the Earl's father, under whose care her husband had left her, during his absence beyond sea, retired to her mother the Lady Mason's house. The Earl, being returned home, and resenting this step of his Lady, which he had made without his privacy, instead of recalling her, suffered her to live in a state of separation; during which, it is no wonder, she was tempted to break her matrimonial vows, since her husband did not perform his. Accordingly, about the end of the year 1696, she was delivered of a daughter. The death of this child, before the Earl had heard any thing of the matter, with the belief, that this might be a sufficient warning against liberties, that carried such visible effects with them, restrained him from attempting public satisfaction; and besides, at the solicitation of his wife's relations, who undertook for her conduct for the future, he consented to allow her 500*l.* a year for a separate maintenance. This treaty was scarce concluded, when, the Earl being informed of his Lady's being delivered of a second child, he commenced a suit in the Spiritual Court for such a divorce, as might be given by that law. But, being disappointed in his prosecution, through the dilatoriness of Ecclesiastical proceedings, he applied himself to his Peers for a remedy, which nothing but a Parliament could give; all the relief, which he could expect from a sentence in Dolors Commons, being no more than that state of separation, in which he and his Lady had long lived. He alledged, That it is evident, that the divine law admits of second marriages in such cases, and that there had been acts of Parliament for them, as well as for bastardizing spurious issue: That those canons, which have prohibited second marriages in like cases, were so manifestly an effect of the Popish doctrine of marriage being a Sacrament, and of the avarice of the Court of Rome, to get money for dispensing with them, that, in the reformation of Ecclesiastical laws, prepared and intended in the time of Edward VI. in pursuance of an act of Parliament of Henry VIII. there was express liberty given by those canons to marry again, which, by virtue of that act of Parliament, would have become a general law, or at least have occasioned one. That whatever objection might be against such a general law from the temptation, which it might give ill people to seek groundless dissolutions of marriages; yet, upon extraordinary cases, such as this was, such relief had been granted; and, where it had been denied, either the fact had not been fully proved, or the parties had cohabited, or, after the grounds of dissatisfaction, had been reconciled. That, if in such a concurrence of circumstances, as were in his case, he must still be thought to have a wife, and the children, she had, must be looked upon as his, from the common presumption, till contrary proof, in that they were born within the four seas; besides that it could not but be too great an encouragement to women, to make an ill use of a separate maintenance, which is provided for in most marriage-settlements, it would be a most unreasonable hardship upon him, that the standing law, which is designed to do every man right, should, by the rigour of the letter, be to him the cause of the greatest wrong; and that, for his wife's fault, he should be deprived of the common privilege of every freeman in the world, to have an heir of his own body, to inherit what he possessed, either of honour or estate; or that his only brother should lose his claim to both, and have his birthright sacrificed to the Lady Macclesfield's irregular life.

While this affair was depending in the Spiritual Court, the Lady Macclesfield insisted upon her innocence, and her agents industriously spread a report, that the Earl her husband had been surprized into a private meeting with her, by a woman of intrigue. But, this story being confuted by the Earl's positive evidence to the contrary, she gave up that point, and only endeavoured to make her husband the author of the miscarriages. She alledged, that the late Earl of Macclesfield, her father-in-law, had turned her out of doors: That the present Earl, notwithstanding the obligation she had laid upon him, by petitioning King James for his life, had maliciously secluded her from bed and board. And therefore, if the Lords thought fit to pass this bill of divorce, she demanded her fortune to be refunded, both because a divorce dissolves the whole frame of the marriage contract, and because it were the highest injustice, that a man, who was guilty of making his wife commit adultery, should be rewarded out of the same wife's fortune. This affair occasioned great debates in the Upper House; some Peers representing the danger of granting divorces; and others, amongst whom Dr Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, spoke the longest, shewing the necessity and lawfulness of such extraordinary proceedings in some particular cases. Upon the whole matter, the Lords passed a bill for dissolving the marriage between Charles Earl of Macclesfield and Anne his wife, and to illegitimate her children; but with a proviso, that the Earl should refund her fortune. This bill being sent down to the Commons, the parties concerned March 5. were 1698. were both heard by their Counsel; but, notwithstanding the Lady Macclesfield's opposition, the bill was read the third time, and passed without any amendment, and received the Royal assent.

Molyneux's case of Ireland, complained of.
Pr. H. C.
III. 83.

On the 21st of May, a complaint was made to the Commons of a printed book, intitled, The case of Ireland's being bound by acts of Parliament in England stated, written by William Molyneux of Dublin, a Gentleman of eminent parts and learning. In this book, the authority of the Parliament of England being denied to be binding to Ireland, a Committee was appointed, to inquire into the author of it, and what proceedings had been in Ireland, that might occasion it. Upon the report of the Committee, it was unanimously resolved, 'That the book was of dangerous consequence to the Crown and People of England, by denying the authority of the King and Parliament of England, to bind the Kingdom and People of Ireland; and the subordination and dependence, that Ireland has and ought to have upon England, as being united and annexed to the Imperial Crown of this realm; and that a bill, intitled, An act for the better security of his Majesty's Person and Government, transmitted under the Great Seal of Ireland, whereby an act of Parliament made in England was pretended to be re-enacted, and alterations therein made, and divers things enacted also, pretending to oblige the Courts of Justice, and the Great Seal of England, by the authority of an Irish Parliament, had given occasion and encouragement to the forming and publishing the dangerous positions contained in this book.' After which, the Commons in a body presented an address to the King, wherein having represented the case, they humbly besought him, 'That he would give effectual orders to prevent any thing of the like nature for the future, and the pernicious consequences of what was passed, by punishing and discountenancing those, who had been guilty thereof: That he would take all necessary care, that the laws, which direct and restrain the Parliament of Ireland in their actions, be not evaded, but strictly observed; and that he would discourage all things, which might in any degree lessen the dependence of Ireland upon England.' To this the King answered, That he would take care, that what was complained of, might be prevented and redressed, as the Commons desired.

gainst the

of a libel on the Irish and English
Parliament.

This Session likewise, upon complaints made, that the woollen manufacture was carried on in Ireland, to the great prejudice of that staple trade in England, the Commons took care to stop the progress of that law. The bill entered upon a bill for that purpose, but it terminated at last in an address to the King, importing, 'That being very sensible, that the wealth and power of this Kingdom do in a great measure depend on the preserving the woollen manufacture, as much as possible, in-tire to this Realm, they thought it became them, like their ancestors, to be jealous of the establishment and the increase thereof elsewhere, and to use their utmost endeavours to prevent it. That they could not without trouble observe, that Ireland, which is dependent on, and protected by England in the enjoyment of all they have, and which is so proper for the linen manufacture, the establishment and growth of which would be so enriching to themselves, and so profitable to England, should of late apply itself to the woollen manufacture, to the great prejudice of the trade of this Kingdom, and so unwillingly promote the linen trade, which would benefit both nations. That the consequence thereof would necessitate his Majesty's Parliament of England to interpose, to prevent this mischief, unless his Majesty, by his authority and great wisdom, should find means to secure the trade of England, by making his subjects of Ireland to pursue the joint interest of both Kingdoms. Wherefore they implored his Majesty's protection and favour in this matter; and that he would make it his Royal care, and injoin all those, whom he employed in Ireland, to use their utmost diligence to hinder the exportation of wool from Ireland (except it be imported hither) and for the discouraging the woollen manufacture, and the increasing the linen manufacture in Ireland; to which the Commons of England should always be ready to give their utmost assistance.' To this address his Majesty made answer, 'That he should do all that in him lay, to promote the trade of England, and to discourage the woollen, and encourage the linen manufacture in Ireland (1).'

Pursuant to this address, the Earl of Galway, and the other Justices, in their speech to the Parliament in Ireland, September the 27th, recommended to them a bill for encouraging the manufactures of linen and hemp: The settlement of which, say they, will contribute much to prosper the country, and will be found more advantageous to this Kingdom than the woollen manufacture, which being the settled, stated trade of England,

(1) About this time, the King writ the following letter to the Earl of Galway.

Kennington, July 16, 1698.

Tho' I have largely explained to the Chancellor of Ireland my sentiments about the Irish affairs, I am willing however to write to you, to tell you, that it was never of such importance to have at present a good Session of Parliament, not only in regard to my affairs of that Kingdom, but especially of this here. The chief thing that must be tried to be prevented, is, that the Irish Parliament takes no notice of what has passed in this here, and that you make effectual laws, for the linen manufacture, and discourage as far as possible the woollen. These are the two most material points, you have to accomplish; and the third the necessary supply for the maintenance of the army, of which you know the importance, and to try to get as much as you can, since, after this Session, I should be very glad not to be obliged, this good while, to have another Parliament in Ireland. I have sent orders for embarking at Ostend the five French regiments, and instead of my own regiment of dragoons of Espingero, I will send you two regiments of foot, which will be much the same as to expence. Blauways will write to you about the establishment and appointment of the pay of the forces. I must tell you, I am well satisfied with the Chancellor of Ireland. At his first coming here to the Parliament, he committed a great oversight, which has got him many enemies, and all the Ministry here 1698. from whence all foreign markets are supplied, can never be encouraged here for that purpose; whereas the linen and hempen manufactures will not only be encouraged, as consistent with the trade of England, but will render the trade of this Kingdom both useful and necessary to England. And the House of Commons in Ireland fell in so far with the Lords Justices sentiments, as to say, in their address of thanks to them, We shall heartily endeavour to establish the linen manufacture, and to render the same useful to England, as well as advantageous to this Kingdom. And we hope to find such a temperament, with respect to the woollen trade here, that the same may not be injurious to England. It was however continually inculcated by the disaffected, how much more beneficial to that Kingdom the woollen manufacture would be than the linen, and what a hardship it was upon the people of Ireland, to be deprived of the privilege of working up their own wool, and sending the cloth where they pleased. These suggestions were industriously spread about, upon all occasions, by the factious, in order to inflame the minds of the people, and so foment divisions among them, tho' it was evident, that the English could not indulge them in that trade, without the ruin of their own at the same time.

Address in
Londonderry.
Pr. H. C.
III. 90.

The city of Londonderry, some time before the address, about the woollen affair, presented a petition to the Commons of England, setting forth their early and singular services and sufferings by the defence of that city against a long and cruel siege, (which eminently contributed to the destroying the designs of the enemies of these Kingdoms;) and shewing that thereby not only the greatest part of the city and suburbs was demolished, but also that their disbursements upon this occasion, for fortifying, providing arms and ammunition, raising and subsisting forces, and other public losses, did amount to a very considerable sum of money, of which they gave in an account. And, that as they had willingly exposed themselves, and their all, for the public interest and service, so they had patiently, these eight years, lain under their losses, in hopes at the end of the war to be so considered, as they should no longer remain a poor ruinous spectacle to all, a scorn to their enemies, and a discouragement to his Majesty's well affected subjects: And praying the Commons to recommend their case to his Majesty for his Royal favour, in order to their relief in the Kingdom of Ireland. Upon this the Commons, addressed the King, that he would be pleased to make some compensation to the city of Londonderry, which, for its eminent sufferings and services, so highly deserved to have some special mark of his favour, for a lasting monument to posterity. The King promised to take it into consideration, but nothing was done in the affair, at least at that time.

June 28.

Here are much incensed against him, as well as the Whig-party; but, in Ireland, it is just the contrary, it is the Tories: So he'll find it hard to behave in such a manner, as not to be involved in difficulties. If bad success attends you in the Parliament, it is certain that the blame will here be laid on him. I thought it necessary to inform you of this circumstance, that you

Vol. III.

Not many days after, the King came to the House of Peers, and, having given the Royal assent to several bills, closed the Session with the following speech.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Cannot take leave of so good a Parliament, without publicly acknowledging the sense I have of the great things you have done for my safety and honour, and for the support and welfare of my people. Every one of your Sessions hath made good this character. The happy uniting of us in an association for our mutual defence; the remedying the corruption of the coin, which had been so long growing upon the nation; the restoring of credit; the giving of supplies in such a manner for carrying on the war, as did by God's blessing produce an honourable peace; and after that, the making such provisions for our common security, and towards satisfying the debts contracted in so long a war, with as little burden to the Kingdom, as is possible, are such things, as will give a lasting reputation to this Parliament, and will be a subject of emulation to those, who shall come after.

Besides all this, I think myself personally obliged to return my thanks to you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, for the regard you have had to my honour, by the establishment of my revenue.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

There is nothing I value so much, as the esteem and love of my people; and, as for their sakes I avoided no hazards, during the war, so my whole study and care shall be to improve and continue to them the advantages and blessings of peace.

And I earnestly desire of you all, in your several stations, to be vigilant in preserving peace and good order, and in a due and regular execution of the laws, especially those against profaneness and irreligion.

Then the Parliament was prorogued, and two July 5, days after dissolved, having now late it's period of three years, in which (as the King said in his speech) great things had been done; the whole money of England was recoined; the King secured in his Government; an honourable peace was made; public credit was restored; and the payment of public debts was put on sure funds.

The chief conduct of affairs lay now in a few hands. Among these the Lord Sommers ^{his} W. R. was most eminent in the House of Lords; for, as he was one of the ablest and most incorrupt Judges, that ever presided in Chancery, so his great capacity for all affairs made the King consider may take your measures accordingly. Be always assured of my esteem. W. R.

I shall set out in two days for Holland. I send you back the Prince of Conti's letter, and approve much of your answer to him. I had not an opportunity to let you know it before.

1698. sider him beyond all his Ministers; and he well deserved the confidence, that the King expressed for him on all occasions. In the House of Commons, Mr Mountague, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had gained such a visible ascendancy over all, who were zealous for the King's service, that he gave law to the rest, which he did always with great spirit, but sometimes with too assuming an air. The fleet was in the Earl of Orford's management, who was both Treasurer of the navy, and at the head of the Admiralty. He had brought in many into the service, who were very zealous for the Government; but a spirit of impiety and dissoluteness ran through too many of them, so that those, who intended to cast a load upon the Government, had too great advantages given by some of those. The Administration at home was, otherwise, without exception, and no grievances were complained of. Sir William Trumbull had been removed, on the 5th of December 1697, from the post of Secretary of State, which was conferred on Mr James Vernon, who had formerly been Secretary to the Duke of Monmouth, and since the Revolution chief Clerk to the Duke of Shrewsbury, under whom he had for several years managed all the affairs of the Duke's office (which the Duke could not attend, because of his ill state of health) and was afterwards advanced to the place of Secretary to the Lords Justices, during the King's absence, which employment he had discharged to the King's satisfaction.

The King, on the 21st of the same month, having received letters from the King of France and the Dauphin, acquainting him with the Duke of Burgundy's marriage, appointed the Duke of St Albans, one of the Lords of his Bed-chamber, to return the compliment, who, in a few days, set out for France.

The Earl of Clancarty, who had married one of the Earl of Sunderland's daughters, and who, during the war, had made his escape from the Tower of London, and fled into France, presumed, about this time, to return into England, both under the benefit of the peace, and chiefly under the protection, which he expected from his father-in-law. On the last day of December, he arrived at London, and went directly to his Lady; but he was not a little surprized, when, the next morning, upon information given to the Government by his brother-in-law, the Lord Spencer, a Messenger was sent with a warrant to carry him prisoner to Newgate, as being attainted for high-treason. However, the Earl of Sunderland interceding for him, the King contented himself with banishing the Lord Clancarty his dominions.

On the 5th of January, through the carelessness of a laundress, a fire broke out at Whitehall, by which all the body of the palace, with the new Gallery, Council-chamber, and several adjoining apartments, were intirely burnt down; that famous piece of architecture, the Banqueting-house, for which the King was so particularly concerned, that he sent messenger upon messenger from Kensington for it's preservation, hardly escaping the violence of the flames.

Five days after the Earl of Portland set out on his embassy to France, and in eleven days reached the capital city of that Kingdom, having in his way thither been received with extraordinary civility and respect. Four days after his arrival at Paris, he was magnificently entertained at supper by the Duke de Crammont, 1698. with the Marshals de Villeroy and Boufflers, the Dukes of Valentinois, Clermont, and Requelme, Count Tallard, whom the French King had named to the Embassy of England, and several other persons of the principal quality in France. And the next day he was admitted to a private audience of the King, as also of the Dauphin, the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, Monsieur, Madame, and the Dukes of Burgundy, by all whom he was severally received with great marks of distinction, and afterwards entertained at dinner by the Marquis de Torcy, Secretary of State for foreign affairs. The Duke of St Albans having had at the same time audience of leave, returned to London. It is remarkable, that the Duke having brought from France extraordinary rich suits of clothes, both for himself and his Duchess, in which they appeared on the Princess of Denmark's birth-day, the House of Lords being apprehensive, that their example would be followed by the rest of the Ladies and Courtiers, to the advancement of the French, and the detriment of the English manufactures, they addressed the King to discourage the wearing French stuffs, and the sumptuousness of apparel.

On the 27th of February, the Earl of Portland made his public entry with such extraordinary splendor, as had never been seen at the Court of France since the Duke of Buckingham's embassy, when he came to demand in marriage for King Charles I. Mary Henrietta of France. He was accompanied by the Lords Cavendish, Hastings, Pajon, Raby, and Woodstock, his son, Mr Fielding, Colonel Stanhope, Mr Charles Boyle, Mr Prior, Secretary to the embassy, and several other English Gentlemen; and, attended by a Gentleman of the horse, twelve pages, fifty-six footmen, twelve led horses, four coaches with eight horses, and two chariots with six, was received by the Duke of Boufflers, and conducted to the Hotel reserved in Paris for the entertainment of foreign Embassadors, and thro' multitudes of spectators, who were astonished at the grandeur and opulence of the English. Two days after, he was admitted to his first public audience, which, for a distinguishing mark of honour, he had in the King's bed-chamber, and even within the rails round the bed, where the King stood, with the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, his grandsons, and the Count de Toulouse, his natural son, the Duke d'Aumont, and the Marshal de Neailles. The Lord Portland having made his speech in French, and delivered his Credentials, the King answered him in very obliging terms, both in relation to his Master and himself; and then he presented to the King the English Noblemen and Gentlemen of his retinue; which being over, he had audience of the Dauphin and the rest of the Royal family. And not only in imitation, but by express directions, of the French King, all that Court shewed the English Embassador most singular marks of honour and respect.

Some time after his public audience he went to Versailles, and staid there four days, being lodged in the Hotel de Bouillon. The first day he was treated by the Marshal de Boufflers, who, in the afternoon, went with his Excellency into the gardens, and shewed him the water-works. The next day he was invited to dine with Monsieur de Livry, Master of the King's Household; and 1698. and after dinner had a long conversation with the King in the gardens, the fountains playing all the while. Here it is by some thought, that the project for a partition of the Spanish Monarchy was opened by the French King (1).

The French King won't renounce King James.
King James passed his time very indifferently all that while at St Germain's; for, besides the honours which were done to the Embassador of the Prince, who possessed his abdicated Throne, and which could not but be a sensible mortification to him, he was informed, that the Lord Portland insisted upon the removing of him to a greater distance from the French King's presence; promising, in his Master's name, to give him and his Queen an honourable pension, which would ease that King of the great charge he was at in maintaining him and his family, ever since they had taken sanctuary in his dominions. After the conclusion of the late treaty of peace, wherein his concerns were wholly overlooked, King James seemed to be absolutely abandoned; and therefore concluding, that the Earl of Portland's demand would be complied with, he was resolved to retire to Avignon, and began already to inform himself, if he could live conveniently there; but he was agreeably surprized, when he heard, that the French King would never give ear to the English Embassador's proposal.

In this interval the Earl of Manchester being arrived at Paris, in his return to England from his embassy to Venice, he and the Earl of Portland went to St Cloud, on the 5th of May, to visit the Duke of Orleans, and in the evening to Versailles to wait on the King, and were received at both places with great respect. Four days after they both had the honour to dine with the Dauphin at Meudon; and the next day the Earl of Portland had his public audience of leave of the Royal Family, King William having named the Earl of Jersey to succeed him as Embassador Extraordinary to France. There being a review of the troops of the Household in the plain of Archers, where the King, the Dauphin, the young Princes of France, and divers persons of quality were present, the Embassador went thither also; but would perhaps have refrained going, if he had known, that King James and the titular Prince of Wales had likewise been there. The Prince, by his Father's directions, endeavoured to join conversation with the Lord Woodstock, but the Earl of Portland, his father, perceiving it, ordered his son to avoid him, as he did himself all those who belonged to the Court of St Germain's; though it was reported, that King James had caused it to be insinuated to him, that he never pretended to make his Lordship answerable for the ill usage, which he received from the person, whom he represented. At this review King James himself did all he could to engage the Lord Cavendish, and the other English Noblemen, to accost him; but they all imitated the Earl of Portland, who on the 4th of June went to Versailles, and had a private audience of the King in his closet, where he took his last leave; as he did afterwards of the Dauphin, and of the Duke and Dukes of Orleans at St Cloud. The King sent the Earl the usual present of his picture set with diamonds, but with this difference, that the stones were worth three times as much as those of other gifts of that kind. Besides this, he presented him with all the prints engraved at the Lowvre, consisting of twelve large Folio's. In return of which the Earl made him a present of nine very fine English horses, and soon after, on the 8th of June, he left Paris, and went to Chantilly, an house belonging to the Prince of Condé, where he was entertained in a splendid manner till the 11th, when he took leave of that Prince; and, proceeding on his journey in his return to England, arrived at Kensington on the 19th. Thus ended this famous embassy, which cost King William fourscore thousand pounds to little purpose, it being remarked, that no Embassador was ever more honoured or less successful than the Earl of Portland, who could obtain nothing, either as to the removal of King James, or in favour of the Protestants of France, against whom the persecution, which in many places had been interrupted, during the war, began now to rage afresh with redoubled violence. As for the Earl himself, he was so far from gaining any thing by his embassy, that on the contrary he found at his return, that Mr Keppel was become a great favourite. Keppel was the son of Pallant Lord of Keppel in Guelderland by a daughter of Opdan, one of the chief Lords of the States of Holland. He was raised from being a page of honour into the highest degree of favour that any person had ever attained about the King. He was now made Earl of Albemarle, and soon after Knight of the Garter, and by a quick and unaccountable progress he seemed to have engrossed the Royal favour so intirely, that he disposed of every thing in the King's power. He was a cheerful young man, who had the art to please, but was so much given up to his pleasures, that he could scarce submit to the attendance and drudgery, that were necessary to maintain his post. He never had yet distinguished himself in any thing, though the King did it in every thing. He was not cold nor dry, as the Earl of Portland was thought to be, who seemed to have the art of creating many enemies to himself, and not one friend. But the Earl of Albemarle had all the arts of a Court, was civil to all, and procured many favours. The Earl of Portland observed the progress of this favour with great uneasiness. They grew to be not only incompatible, as all rivals for favour must needs be, but to hate and oppose one another in every thing, by which the King's affairs suffered much. The one had more of the confidence, and the other much more of the favour. The King had heaped many grants on the Earl of Portland, who, upon his return from his embassy, could not bear the visible superiority in favour, that the other was grown up to; so he took occasion,

(1) During his stay at Versailles, there happened a passage between Mr Prior, the Secretary of the embassy, and one of the French King's Officers, which deserves to be related. As the Officer was conducting Mr Prior about the apartments, among other curiosities, he shewed him those fine pieces of Le Brun, which represent the French King's victories; and asked him, Whether King William's actions were also to be seen in his palace? No, Sir, replied Mr Prior, the monuments of my Master's actions are to be seen every where but in his own house.

1698. cation, from a small preference, that was given him, in prejudice of his own post, as Croom of the Stole, to withdraw from the Court, and laid down all his employments. The King used all possible means to divert him from this resolution, but without prevailing on him. He consented to serve the King still in his affairs, but he would not return to any post in the Household; and not long after was employed in the negotiation, set on foot for the succession to the Crown of Spain.

On the 19th of March 1697-8, Count Tallard, the French Ambassador, arrived at London, and soon after accompanied the King to Newmarket, where he was not a little surprized to see the vast concourse of Nobility and Gentry, and the great sums of money lost or won, at the races.

France reaped but small benefit from the peace as to her commerce, which continued almost as dead as in time of war. It is true, some English and Dutch came to Bourdeaux and Roan, in order to take in wine and paper, and brought other commodities to be sold there. But the tariff not being regulated between all the parties, and the treaty of Ryswick mentioning only, that, in relation to Holland, it should be put upon the same foot, as it was agreed in 1664, which was not yet done; and in respect to England, that Commissioners appointed by both Kings should meet at London, three months after the ratification, to determine all differences; this, together with the loss of at least 20 per cent. by the money, which the French King, to supply his present necessities, had raised to an extravagant rate, obliged most of these ships to return home, without either selling or buying any thing. Upon this, the States-General sent Deputies to the King of France to demand the regulation of the tariff, pursuant to the late treaty. But, the trade of Holland being far less advantageous to France than that of England, by reason the Dutch use to import more of their own commodities into that Kingdom than they export of the growth of it from thence, and that, on the contrary, the English were accustomed, before the war, to send great sums of money yearly into France, not only for wines, paper, stuffs, linnen, hats, and silks, but also for abundance of things of less importance, the purchase of which could not be made with what they imported thither of the growth and manufacture of England; so the Court of France at first resolved to keep up the tariff as high as possible with the Hollanders, while they designed to lower it with the English. But, Monsieur Philippeaux d'Herbault being sent over hither as Commissary-General from the French King, for regulating the commerce between the two nations, he found insuperable difficulties in his Commission, not only because of the high duties laid by the Parliament on all French goods, and which were already appropriated to several uses, but also because the English had by this time learned to be without the commodities of the product of France, supplying themselves, for the most part, with wine from Italy, Spain, and Portugal; with linnen from Holland and Spain; and with paper, flannel, &c. by the manufactures of the same countries.

About this time, the King sent the Lord of the Duke of Chazler, who was in the tenth year of his age, and gave manifest proofs of an excellent genius. The Duke of Marlborough, who was restored to favour, was made his Governor (1), and at the same time sworn of his Majesty's Privy-council. The Bishop of Exeter, having under him Mr Wallis, Chaplain, and Dr Pratt to assist him in this office, did all he could to bring the Duke to himself, having hitherto had no share in the Prince's favour or confidence. He was not without some uneasiness at some things, in the King's conduct, and, though he was a glorious instrument of many great things to the King, he had not yet carried matters further than that he was giving his enemies handles to weaken his Government.

He was so much engaged in the service, that he was not able to engage deeper in such a constant attendance, for so many years, as this employment required. But the King would trust that care with him, and the Princess gave him such encouragement, that he resolved not only to submit to this, but to give himself wholly up to it. He took to his own province the instructing the young Prince in the principles of Religion, and the rules of virtue, and the giving him a view of history, geography, politics, and government. At the same time, he resolved to look very exactly to all the Masters, that were appointed to teach him other things.

Scotland was now in a sort of ferment, occasioned by the opposition their African and East-India Company met with in the prosecution of their scheme, for settling a trade to Africa, and a colony in America. The Company had endeavoured by their agents to get subscriptions in Holland, and with encouragement from private persons in all those places. The English and Dutch India and African Companies took the alarm, and a stop was put to the subscriptions, the Scotch Company taking. The King was even prevailed with to permit his Minister at Hamburgh to present a memorial to the Senate against it. Upon this the Scots India Company laid open their grievances before the Parliament, now assembled at Edinburgh, the Earl of Mar being the King's Commissioner. That whereas the wisdom of the King and Parliament had thought fit, by two several solemn acts and letters patents under the Great Seal of Great Britain, to incorporate their Company with such power, privileges, and immunities, as were necessary for carrying on any such new undertaking in that manner, as they should think fit; and, for that end, to enfranchise such foreigners, as would become partners with them, and to enter into treaties of commerce with any in any

 " from time to time. That, though their Com" pany was more immediately and sensibly " touched in many respects by such proceedings
 " than any other, yet they humbly conceived
 " also, that the honour and independency of the " nation, as well as the credit and authority of " the Parliament, was struck at through their " sides. That they could not as countrymen,
 " and in duty to that collective power, which " gave their Company first a being, but inform " his Grace, his Majesty's High Commissioner,
 " and the estates of Parliament, of the premises,
 " to the end that the Great-council of the na" tion (then assembled) might do therein, as " they in their profound wisdom and discretion
 " should think fit. That, as to what concerned " their Company in particular, they should " humbly beg leave to suggest farther, that, the " ships being then at sea on their intended " voyage, the former treatment, which their " Company met with in England and elsewhere,
 " might give them just grounds to suspect, that,
 " if, either through multiplicity of public af" fairs, or otherwise howsoever, his Grace and " the estates of Parliament should neglect the " taking present notice of such umbrage, the " enemies of their Company would be there" by encouraged either directly or indirectly to " pursue their former designs of ruining (if pos" sible) all their measures. Therefore they de" sired his Grace and the estates of Parliament,
 " to take the premises into their serious con" sideration, to vindicate their Company's repu" tation abroad, by supporting the credit of the " acts of Parliament and letters patents, by " which the same was established, and where-
 " in the honour of the nation was so much con" cerned: To take effectual measures for re" pairing the great loss and damages, which " they had already sustained through the un" warrantable treatment above-mentioned, as " well as for preventing the like for the time
 " to come; and withal to continue to them
 " the privileges and exemptions mentioned in " the acts of Parliament and letters patents,
 " for some longer time, in consideration of the " time already elapsed without execution, and " their stock lying dead without improvement,
 " by reason of these obstructions."

The Parliament, having maturely weighed this petition, thought fit, by way of address, humbly to represent to his Majesty, on the 5th of August, " That having considered a representa"tion made to them by the Council-General of the Company trading to Africa and the Indies, which mentioned several obstructions, that they met with in the prosecution of their trade, particularly by a memorial presented to the Senate of Hamburg, by his Majesty's Resident in that city, tending to lessen the credit of the rights and privileges granted to the Company, by an act of the then present Parliament: They therefore laid before his Majesty the whole nation's concern in that matter; and they did most earnestly intreat, and most assuredly expect, that his Majesty, in his Royal wisdom, would take such measures, as might effectually vindicate the undoubted rights and privileges of the Company, and support the credit and interest thereof: And as they were in duty bound to return his Majesty most hearty thanks for the gracious assurance his Majesty had been pleased to give them, of all due encouragement for promoting the trade of that Kingdom; so they were thereby encouraged humbly to recommend to the more especial marks of his Royal favour the concerns of the Company, as that branch of their trade, in which they and the nation, which they represented, had a more peculiar interest."

The Company having thus engaged the Parliament to espouse their interest, they seconded their address by a petition to the King, dated the 10th of August, and importing, "That whereas the Parliament had, by their address, been pleased to recommend the concerns of the Company to his Majesty, for supporting the credit and interest thereof, which had already suffered in a great measure, by reason of the several obstructions, which they had met with in the prosecution of their trade, particularly by a memorial given in to the Senate of Hamburg, by his Majesty's Minister there; these encouraged them, with all humility, to lay before his Majesty, that, as the memorial was given in to the Senate of Hamburg in a most solemn and public manner, so they humbly conceived, that the effects thereof could not be taken away, but by some intimation made to the Senate, that they might enter into commerce with them as freely and securely in all respects, as they might have done, before the giving in of the memorial. That, in consideration of the damages sustained by the Company, his Majesty would be pleased, for their encouragement, as a gracious mark of his Royal favour, to bestow upon them the two smallest of the frigates then lying useless in Brunt-Island Harbour: And that in regard of the time lost, by reason of these obstructions, his Majesty would be graciously pleased to continue the privileges granted by act of Parliament to the Company, of being Custom-free for such longer time, as his Majesty should think fit."

This affair occasioning great heats and discontents in the Parliament, the Commissioner put a stop to their proceedings, towards the beginning of September, and adjourned them to the 5th of November.

During this interval, there being two letters sent from Mr. Steuenson, the Company's Agent at Hamburg, to the Court of Directors of the Company, concerning the Hamburg memorial, this occasioned another letter from the Directors of the Company to the Lord Seafeld, who was appointed Secretary of State, wherein they declared, "That they had, by order of the Council-General of their Company, the copies of two letters received from their Company's Agent at Hamburg to his Lordship; upon the reading whereof the day before, at a meeting of the Council-General, they were not a little surprized at the contents, considering the many repeated assurances they had formerly by letters and word of mouth, and even in Parliament, that the King had given orders to his Minister at Hamburg, with relation to the memorial given in to the Senate of that city against their Company: But, after some reasoning thereupon, and considering how far his Lordship's frank undertaking, when in Scotland, as well as the station he was in, did engage his best endeavours to procure the Company justice, and vindicate the Company's rights in that matter, they had ordered them (the Court of Directors) to transmit the said copies to his Lordship, and expected his Lordship's answer to that and their late petition to his Majesty, before they remonstrated any further with relation thereunto." Upon this the Secretary acquainted the Court of Directors, by a letter sent to Sir John Sebau, their President, That he would take the first convenient opportunity he could have, to represent the matter to the King; but could not yet expect to have it, his Majesty being very much employed in the affairs of the English Parliament.

The King having appointed the Lords Justices to govern in his absence, of whom the Earl of Marlborough was one, he set out the 20th of July for Holland, where he landed the next day. Before his departure from England, news came from Spain, that their King was dying. This alarm had been often given before, but it came much quicker now. The French, upon this, send a fleet to lie before Cadix, which came thither at the time that the galleons were expected home from the West-Indies; and it was apprehended, that, if that King had died, they would have seized on all that treasure. A fleet was sent from England thither to secure them; but it came too late to have done any service, if it had needed. This was much censured; but the Admiralty excused themselves, by saying, that the Parliament was so late in fixing the Funds for the fleet, that it was not possible to be ready sooner than they were. The King of Spain recovered for that time, but it was so far from an entire recovery, that a relapse was still apprehended. When the King therefore went to Holland, he left sealed orders behind him, of which some of his Ministers declared, they knew not the contents till they were opened. By these the King ordered sixteen thousand men to be kept up. For excusing this, it was said, that, though the Parliament had, in their votes, mentioned only ten thousand land-men, to whom they had afterwards added three thousand marines, and had raised only the money necessary for that number, yet no determined number was mentioned in the act itself. And therefore, since the apprehension of the King of Spain's death made it advisable to have a greater force ready for such an accident, the King resolved to keep up a force somewhat beyond that which the House of Commons had consented to. The leaving these orders sealed made the whole blame to be Negotiations for the Partition treaty.

Aug. 6.
N. S.

The King, upon his arrival at Holland, having assisted at the assembly of the States-General, and given audience to several public Ministers, particularly to the Envoy of Lorrain, who notified to him the marriage of the Duke his Master, with Mademoiselle, daughter of the Duke of Orleans, he went to Loe, attended by the Earls of Essex, Portland and Selkirk, and several other persons of Quality. He had not been long there, before he was waited upon by Count Tallard, who had orders not to suffer him to cool upon the proposal made by the French King to the Earl of Portland, concerning the succession of the Crown of Spain; which overture King William had communicated to the Lord Chancellor Sommers before he left England. The French Ambassador having pressed him for an answer, the Earl of Portland, by the King's order, wrote a letter to Mr. Secretary Vernon, wherein it was mentioned, that, Count Tallard having declared, that an accommodation might be found in relation to the Spanish succession, the King had founded France upon the conditions; which were in substance, That the Electoral Prince of Bavaria should have the Kingdom of Spain, the Indies, and the Low-Countries, and all that depended upon the Spanish dominions, except Naples and Sicily, Sardinia, the province of Guipuzcoa on this side of the Pyrenees, Fontarabia, and St. Sebastian, Final, and the places in Tuscany, of which Spain stood possessed; in consideration of which, France was absolutely to renounce the right, which it pretended to the succession of Spain. And as for Milan, it was to be given to the Archduke Charles, the Emperor's second son.

At the same time the King himself sent the following letter to the Lord Chancellor Sommers :

“ I Imparted to you, before I left England, “ that in France there was expressed to my “ Lord Portland some inclination to come to an “ agreement with us, concerning the succession
 “ of the King of Spain ; since which Count Tal- “ lard has mentioned it to me, and has made “such propositions, the particulars of which “my Lord Portland will write to Vernon, to “whom I have given orders not to communicate “them to any other besides yourself, and to “leave to your judgment to whom else you “would think proper to impart them; to the “end that I might know your opinion upon “so important an affair, and which requires the “greatest secrecy. If it be fit this negotiation “should be carried on, there is no time to be “lost, and you will send me the full powers un“der the Great Seal, with the names in blank

“to treat with Count Tallard; I believe this “may be done secretly, that none but you and “Vernon, and those to whom you shall have “communicated it, may have knowledge of it,
“so that the Clerks, who are to write the war“rant and the full powers, may not know what “it is. According to all intelligence, the King “of Spain cannot outlive the month of October, “and the least accident may carry him off every “day. I received yesterday your letter of the “9th; since my Lord Warton cannot at this “time leave England, I must think of some “other to send Ambassador to Spain; if you “can think of any one proper, let me know it,
“and be always assured of my friendship.”

WILLIAM R.

Mr. Secretary Vernon having sent the Earl of Portland's letter to the Lord Sommers, who was then at Tunbridge for the benefit of the waters, the Chancellor immediately returned the letter to Mr. Vernon, and desired him to communicate the contents of it to the Earl of Orford, Mr. Mountague, and the Duke of Surrey; which he thought the best way of executing the King's commands; at the same time telling them know, bow strictly his Majesty required, that it should remain an absolute secret; which caution made Mr. Vernon impart it to the Duke of Surrey only, as he afterwards acquainted my Lord Sommers.

Some time after Mr. Mountague and Mr. Secretary Vernon going down to Tunbridge, the Lord Chancellor and they debated this important affair; and his Lordship wrote a letter to the King, dated the 28th of August, acquainting him with the result of their consultation (1.) But, before this letter reached the King, the first treaty of Partition was signed. The persons.

S I R,

“ Having your Majesty’s permission to try if the “ waters would contribute to the re-establishment of “ my health, I was just got to this place when I had “ the honour of your Commands; I thought the best “ way of executing them would be to communicate “ to my Lord Orford, Mr. Mountague, and the Duke “ of Surrey (who before I left London, had agreed “ upon a meeting about that time) the subject of my “ Lord Portland’s letter, at the same time letting them “ know how strictly your Majesty required, that it “ should remain an absolute secret.

“ Since that time Mr. Mountague and Mr. Secre“ tary are come down hither, and upon the whole “ discourse three things have principally occurred, to “ be humbly suggested to your Majesty.

“ First, That the entertaining a propofal of this “ nature feems to be attended with very many ill con-

“ but we were soon at ease, as to any apprehension of “ this sort, being fully assured your Majesty would not “ act but with the utmost nicety, in an affair where-
“ in the glory and safety of Europe were so highly con“ cerned.

“ The second thing considered was the very ill prospect of what was like to happen upon the death of the King of Spain, in case nothing was done previously towards the providing against that accident, which seemed probably to be very near: The King of France having so great a force in such a readiness, that he was in a condition to take possession of Spain, before any other Prince could be able to make a stand. Your Majesty is the best judge whether this be the case, who are so perfectly informed of the circumstances of parts abroad.

“ But, so far as relates to England, it would be want
“ of duty not to give your Majesty this clear account, “ that there is a deadness and want of spirit in the “ nation, univerſally fo, as not at all to be diſpoſed to “ the thought of entering into a new war, and that

Aug. 15.*

1698. sons commissioned by King William, were the Earl of Portland and Sir Joseph Williamson, who was afterwards winked at when this affair came under the consideration of the Parliament, while the Lord Sommers for his faithful advice was impeached. By this Treaty it was agreed :

The first treaty of Partition.

I. That the peace of Ryswick should be confirmed.

II. That in consideration of the ill state of the King of Spain's health, and for preserving the publick peace, in case the said Prince should die without issue, the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, with the places then depending upon the Spanish Monarchy, situated on the coast of Tuscany, or the adjacent islands, comprehended under the name of Santo Stefano, Porto Hercole, Orbitello, Telamone, Portofongo, Piombino, the Marquisate of Final, the province of Guipuscoa, particularly the towns of Fontarabia and St. Sebastian, and especially the Port Passage; and likewise all places on the French side of the Pyrenees, or the other mountains of Navarre, Alava, or Biscay, on the other side of the province of Guipuscoa, with all the ships and galleys, and other appurtenances belonging to the galleys, should be given to the Dauphin, in consideration of his right.

III. That the Crown of Spain, and the other kingdoms and places both within and without Europe, should descend to the Electoral Prince of Bavaria, of whom his Father, the Elector, was to be a Guardian and Administrator till he came of age.

IV. That the Duchy of Milan should be restored and allotted to Archduke Charles, the Emperor's second son.

This Treaty was to be communicated to the Emperor and the Elector of Bavaria by King 1698. William and the States-General; and, if they did not agree to it, then the proportion of the party not agreeing should remain in sequestration, till things could be brought to an accommodation: And in case the Electoral Prince of Bavaria should come to inherit his share, and yet die before his Father without issue, the Elector was to succeed him in those dominions, and his heir after him. The Duchy of Milan likewise, upon the Archduke's refusal to accept it, was to be sequestered to, and governed by the Prince of Vaudemont, and after him by his son, Prince Charles of Vaudemont.

Soon after the conclusion of this treaty, the King took a Review of the Dutch troops near Arnhem, and then went to Zell, to visit the Duke of that name. Here he was received with extraordinary respect as he had been at all places, through which he past in his way thither, and waited upon by several neighbouring Princes and Princesses, particularly the Electress of Hanover, with the Electoral Prince and Princess his sister. Mr. Stepney, Envoy Extraordinary to the Elector of Brandenburg, attended the King likewise with letters from that Prince; and, at his return to Lea, the Duke of Bavaria came to pay his acknowledgments to him for the care he had taken of his interest in the late treaty of Partition.

Whilst the French King was negotiating the treaty of Partition, the Marquis of Harcourt, his Ambassador in Spain, was playing another sort of game at Madrid. The Queen of Spain, who was nearly related to the King of the Romans, and consequently intirely in the interest of the house of Austria, foreseeing the designs of the French King, had early concerted Measures with Count of Harrach, the Imperial Minister, to dis-appoint them. She had not only got her creatures into “ beyond what was discerned, till it appeared upon the occasion of the late elections; this is the truth of the fact, upon which your Majesty will determine what resolutions are proper to be taken.

“ That which remained was the consideration what would be the condition of Europe, if the proposal took place: Of this we thought ourselves little capable of judging, but it seemed, that, if Sicily was in the French hands, they will be intirely masters of the Levant trade; that, if they were possessed of Finan, and those other sea-ports on that side, whereby Milan would be intirely shut out from relief by sea, or any other commerce, that Duchy would be of little Signification in the hands of any Prince; and that, if the King of France had possession of that part of Guipuscoa, which is mentioned in the proposal, besides the ports he would have in the Ocean, it does seem he would have as easy a way of invading Spain on that side, as he now has on the side of Catalonia.

“ But it is not to be hoped, that France will quit its pretences to so great a succession, without considerable advantages; and that we are all assured, your Majesty will reduce the terms as low as can be done, and make them, as far as is possible in the present circumstances of things, such as may be some foundation for the future quiet of Christendom; which all your subjects cannot but be convinced is your true aim. If it could be brought to pass that England might be some way a gainer by this transaction, whether it was by the Elector of Bavaria, (who is the gainer by your Majesty's interposition in this treaty) his coming to an agreement to let us into some trade to the Spanish plantations, or in any other manner, it would wonderfully endear your Majesty to your English subjects.

“ It does not appear, in case this negotiation should proceed, what is to be done on your part, in order to make it take place: Whether any more be required than the English and Dutch should sit still, and France itself to see it executed. If that be so, what security ought to be expected, that if, by our being neutrals, the French be successful, they will confine themselves to the terms of the treaty, and not attempt to make further advantages of their success?

“ I humbly beg your Majesty's pardon that these thoughts are so ill put together: These Waters are known to discompose and disturb the head, so as almost totally to disable one from writing: I should be extremely troubled, if my absence from London has delayed the dispatch of the Commission one day. You will be pleased to observe, that two persons (as the Commission is drawn) must be named in it, but the powers may be executed by either of them. I suppose your Majesty will not think it proper to name Commissioners that are not English, or naturalized, in an affair of this nature.

“ I pray God give your Majesty honour and success, in all your undertakings. I am, with the utmost duty and respect,

S I R,

Your Majesty's most dutiful and most obedient subject and servant.

1698. into the Council, but likewise procured the Viceroyalty of Catalonia to be bestowed on the Prince of Hesse d'Armstadt, and the Government of Milan on Prince Vaudemont, who had both upon many occasions signalized their zeal for the German interest. It was proposed to make Prince Eugene Viceroy of Navarre, but the opposition that met with in the Spanish Councils, not only prevented it, but gave too plain indications of the influence of France in the Council of Spain. The Duke of Medina Celi was now Viceroy of Naples, and it was thought advisable to continue him there, by reason of his being one of the most considerable Grandees of Spain, and most beloved of the people, and who consequently might obstruct the designs of the German party, if he came home disgusted. This was the situation of the Spanish affairs, when the French Ambassador arrived at Madrid. His instructions were, if he saw no possibility to get the succession of that Kingdom settled upon one of the Dauphin's sons, he should endeavour at least to hinder it from devolving on any of the Emperor's children, on whom it was settled by the will of Philip IV., the King of Spain's father. To add weight to the Ambassador's instances, and awe the Spaniards into a compliance, he caused sixty thousand of his best troops to file off towards the frontiers of Catalonia and Navarre, and sent a considerable number of his ships of war and galleys into several ports of Spain. The Marquis d'Harcourt followed his instructions with great application. He told those, whom he found inclinable to act in concert with him in so important an affair, that Philip IV. had exerted his power too far, in disposing of his Crown against the laws of nature and the constitution of the Realm. That the succession lawfully belonged to his daughter's children, and not to his relations four degrees removed. That the Dauphin, son to Maria Theresia, the present King of Spain's sister, had three sons: And, if the Spaniards would fix their eyes upon the second of them, the Duke of Anjou, to be their King, he being still as pliable as wax, they might easily mould him to the customs and manners of their country: That, if they were averse to this overture, the Electoral Prince of Bavaria being grandson of a daughter of Spain, the King of France would rather approve of him to succeed in the Spanish Monarchy, than any of the Emperor's children; unless, as the Poles had done, to cut off the pretensions of foreign Princes, they would chuse a Sovereign among themselves; in which the King of France would protect them, since he never intended to unite Spain to his own Kingdom, but only to keep it from falling into the hands of the House of Austria, which was already grown too powerful by the late conquests in Hungary. The Queen of Spain having a watchful eye upon the French Ambassador, who made it his business to thwart her designs in favour of the Emperor, soon discovered his practices; and therefore, under pretence that the air of Madrid was prejudicial to the King's health, she carried him to Toledo, without allowing any foreign Ambassador to follow him thither. Harcourt quickly penetrated into the design of the Queen's journey, and judged very rightly, that, being there sole Mistress of the King, he might easily prevail with him to ratify King Philip the IV's will. He was confirmed in this apprehension by Count

Harrach's being no more to be seen at Madrid; and, supposing he was gone to Toledo, he went immediately thither himself, under pretence of a memorial, which he pretended to have received from his Master, with positive orders not to communicate it to any besides his Catholic Majesty. The Queen was extremely surprized at the unexpected arrival of the French Ambassador, and caused the King to acquaint him, that he had left the Cardinal of Corduba (one of the Queen's creatures) at Madrid, to take care of foreign affairs, during his absence, to whom he might have communicated his memorial, and that he only came thither to recover his health, and not to trouble himself with business. This pretended memorial was, it seems, to offer to the King of Spain the French King's assistance to raise the siege of Ceuta, which the Queen was too wise to let the King accept, since by that means the French would have got, what she was endeavouring to prevent, a footing and interest in Spain. Harcourt, after this unsuccessful journey, be thought himself of another stratagem, and, being returned to Madrid, so powerfully worked upon the ambition of Cardinal Portocarrero, that he engaged him in the interest of France.

While these things past in Spain, the French Alliance were not less busy to strengthen themselves, by an alliance with the Crown of Sweden, ^{between France and Sweden.} which at length was concluded at Stockholm on the ninth of July. It was declared in the second article, that "the aim and intention of this treaty was to preserve and secure the common peace by such means, as should be judged most proper and convenient."

In this manner did the French King amuse the foreign Courts with his pretended endeavours to preserve the tranquility of Europe, when he was meditating how to break it, upon the first news of the King of Spain's death, which was hourly expected at the Court of France. For, to say nothing of the motions of his land and naval forces, already mentioned, he caused a great camp to be formed at Compiègne, the pretence of which was to instruct the Duke of Burgundy in the art of war; but which gave no small umbrage to the neighbouring Princes and States, who looked upon it as designed to make a sudden irruption into the Spanish Netherlands. However, the unexpected recovery of the King of Spain's health, as it disappointed the hopes of the French King, so it dispelled the fears of the rest, at least for this year.

King William's journey to Zell gave the Court of France as much uneasiness as the camp of Compiègne gave the Allies, though it is certain, ^{The Peace witz.} the King's chief view was to cement the union of the Princes of Germany by a match between the King of the Romans and the Princess of Hanover, which was now agreed on, and soon after compleated; and by removing the apprehensions, which some Members of the Empire were under, of the growing power of the Emperor; which the King did effectually, in concert with the States-General, by putting a stop to the Hungarian war, which had continued for above fifteen years. The armies on both sides were indeed considerable in number and strength this summer; but yet there seemed no great disposition in either for action, but rather an inclination in the contending parties to set up a treaty under the mediation of the Lord Paget, the English, and Mr. Colliers the Dutch Ambassador;

1698. ambassador; who towards the middle of August arriv'd in the Turkish camp near Belgrade, and by their good offices the place of conference was agreed upon to be between Peterwaradin and Salankemen; the Emperor's and the Confederate Ministers being to reside at Carlowitz, the Sultan's at Salankemen, and the Mediators between the two places. It was on the seventh of November when the Mediators delivered to the Turkish Plenipotentiaries the preliminary articles, which were in substance, that each party should retain what he possessed. And the five following days were spent in preparing matters, upon which they were to enter into conference. And now there arose a great dispute about precedence. The Turks insisted upon the first place, which was claimed by the Emperor's Ambassadors, next to whom the Polish Plenipotentiary demanded to sit; which was refused by the Russian and all the rest, except the Venetian, who insisted upon the seat next to the English. This dispute had like to have had very ill consequences, if Maurocordato, one of the Turkish Plenipotentiaries, had not found out the following expedient. He proposed the erecting of a round building, with as many doors as there were Ambassadors, each door looking towards the country from whence they severally came, and that tents should be placed round the building, from whence on the first day of conference, the Ambassadors should come forth with an equal pace, and enter the room, all at the same time, and, saluting one another, take the seat next to them. The Mediators Secretaries, and those of the Imperial Embassy, were placed behind; and the Turkish Secretary sat down before the floor. The conference was opened with the pronouncing of these words, God grant an happy peace, and lasted from half an hour after ten till three in the afternoon, when the Mediators and Plenipotentiaries went out in the same order, as they entered. The conferences were renewed in the same manner the three successive days with good success. But some debates arising about the giving up of Tekely and the Holy Sepulchre, the dismantling of Caminieck, and the surrendering of another place upon the Black Sea; besides the quitting of Azoph to the Muscovites; and chiefly about the regulation of the limits between the two Empires and the Venetian and Turkish territories; the Plenipotentiaries sent expresses to their respective Masters, which wasted a great deal of time. However at length the Imperialists and Poles concluded their part of the treaty, on the 26th of January 1698-9, and perhaps would have done it sooner, but in some sort of compliance with the Venetians, who did not sign theirs till the middle of the next month. As for the Articles between the Czar of Muscovy and the Sultan, they contained only a truce for two years, and so were soon agreed upon and signed, on the 25th of December 1698. By this peace the Emperor preserved his late acquisitions, and greatly enlarged his territories. The Poles had the important place of Caminieck restored to them with other advantages: The Muscovites were gainers by the keeping of Azoph. And the Venetians had all the Morea, and several fortresses in Dalmatia, yielded up to them: So that it was computed, that the Turks lost the best half of their dominions in Europe. Thus the long war between the Emperor and the Turks, which had brought both sides by turns very near the last extremities, was at last concluded by the direction and mediation of the King of England.

By this time the new King of Poland having brought the Cardinal Primate, who had all along adhered to the Prince of Conti, to acknowledge his title, and composed the troubles of Lithuania, a universal peace seemed now to be settled throughout Christendom.

There was now a Parliament chosen, and the elections fell generally on men, who were in the interests of the Government. Many of them had indeed some popular notions, which they had imbibed under a bad Government, and thought they ought to keep them under a good one. So that those who wished well to the public, apprehended great difficulties in managing them. The King himself did not seem to lay this to heart so much as was fitting. He staid long beyond sea; and cross winds hindered his return to England so soon as he had intended; upon which the Parliament was prorogued for some weeks after the Members were come up. Even this soured their spirits, and had too great a share in the ill humour, that appeared among them.

The King arrived in England, the 3d of December; and, the Parliament being met three days after, and the Commons having chosen Sir Thomas Littleton for their Speaker, the Session was opened by the King with the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Have no doubt but you are met together with hearts fully disposed to do what is necessary for the safety, honour and happiness of the Kingdom; and that is all I ask of you. In order to this, two things principally seem to require your consideration. The one is, what strength ought to be maintained at sea, and what force kept up at land for this year. All, that I shall observe to you on this head, is, that the flourishing of trade, the supporting of credit, and the quiet of the people's minds at home, will depend upon the opinion they have of their security. And, to preserve to England the weight and influence it has, at present, on the councils and affairs abroad, it will be requisite, Europe should see, you will not be wanting to yourselves. The second thing I shall mention to you, as of great consequence, is the making some farther progress towards a discharging the debts which the nation has contracted, by reason of the long and expensive war. In this the public interest, as well as justice, is concerned; and I think an English Parliament can never make such a mistake, as not to hold sacred all Parliamentary Engagements.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I do earnestly recommend these things to you, that you may provide such supplies, as you shall judge necessary for these several occasions.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I think it would be happy, if some effect-

"the poor, which might tend to the great in"crease of our manufactures, as well as remove
"a heavy burden from the people.

"I hope also you will employ your thoughts

Kennet.*

It appears by this speech, how necessary the King thought it to keep up a good naval and land-force. For though he had taken measures to secure the Spanish succession, and preserve the tranquillity of Europe; yet he was apprehensive, that, if England was intirely disarmed, it would be too great a temptation to the ambition of France, to break through all treaties and engagements, in order to invade the Monarchy of Spain. But the Commons were so far from being of the King's mind, that they highly repented his keeping up an army beyond the votes of the last Parliament, without duly considering the occasion for his so doing; and this repentment was increased by the King's own management in the affair. The Ministers represented to him, that they would carry the keeping up a land-force of ten or twelve thousand, but that they could not carry it further. He said, so small a number was as good as none at all; therefore he would not authorize them to propose it. On the other hand, they thought they should lose their credit with their best friends, if they ventured to speak of a greater number. So that, when the House of Commons took up the debate, the Ministry were silent, and proposed no number; upon which those, who were in the contrary interest, named seven thousand men; and accordingly it was resolved, "That all the land-
"forces of England, in English pay, exceeding "seven thousand men (and those consisting of "his Majesty's natural born Subjects) be forth"with paid and disbanded; and that all the "forces in Ireland, exceeding twelve thousand "men (and those natural born subjects, to be "maintained by that Kingdom) be likewise
"forthwith disbanded." They ordered a bill to be brought in upon these resolutions, which was eagerly pursued, and soon brought to perfection. This gave the King great uneasiness; for, by these resolutions, not only the army was to be reduced to an inconsiderable number, but that number was to consist of natural born subjects, by which means the Dutch Guards (of whom the King was intirely fond) were to be sent away, as well as the regiments of the French Refugees were to be cashiered. The King seemed not only to lay this much to heart, but even to sink under it. He tried all that was possible to struggle against it, when it was too late; it not being so easy to recover things in an after-game, as it was to have prevented this misunderstanding, which was like to arise between him and his Parliament. It was furnished, that he was resolved not to pass the bill, but that he would abandon the Government, rather than hold it with a force, that was too small to preserve and protect

it. Yet this was considered only as a threatening, so that little regard was had to it. However, it appears from an original letter of the Lord Chancellor Sommers to the Duke of Shrewsbury, that the King had actually formed such a design; from which no remonstrances, which that Lord could then use, could prevail on him to desist. For his Majesty was resolved to go to the Parliament, on the 4th of January, and to make the following speech:

resolves to abandon
vernment.*

"I Came to this Kingdom, at the desire of "this nation, to save it from ruin, and to "preserve your religion, your laws, and liberties;
"and for that end I have been obliged to "maintain a long and burdensome war for this "Kingdom; which, by the grace of God, and "the bravery of this nation, is at present ended
"in a good peace; under which you may live
"happily and in quiet, provided you will con"tribute to your own security, in the manner I "had recommended to you at the opening of "the Sessions. But seeing, to the contrary,
"that you have so little regard to my advice,
"and that you take no manner of care of your "own security, and that you expose yourselves
"to evident ruin, by divesting yourselves of the "only means for your defence, it would not be "just nor reasonable, that I should be witness "of your ruin, not being able to do any thing
"of myself, it not being in my power to de"fend and protect you, which was the only
"view I had in coming into this country.
"Therefore, I am obliged to recommend to "you to chuse and name to me such persons,
"as you shall judge most proper, to whom I "may leave the administration of the Govern"ment in my absence; assuring you, that, tho'
"I am at present forced to withdraw myself
"out of the Kingdom, I shall always preserve
"the same inclination to its advantages and "prosperity. And when I can judge, that my "presence will be necessary for your defence, I "shall be ready to return, and hazard myself
"for your security, as I have formerly done;
"beseeching the great God to bless your deli"berations, and to inspire you with all that "is necessary for the good and welfare of the "Kingdom."

By what means the King was diverted from executing this resolution, does not appear; but the bill for reducing the army passed with some opposition in the House of Commons; and in the House of Lords a feeble attempt was made against it, but this was rather a reproach than a service to the Government, it being faintly made, and ill defended. When the Bill was ready, the King came, on the 1st of February, to the House of Lords, and, instead of the foregoing speech, made that which follows; wherein, he shews his reasons for passing the disbanded-bill, and at the same time expostulates a little upon the hardness of it (1).

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I AM come to pass the bill for disbanded
"the army, as soon as I understood it was "ready for me.

"Though
"Pr. H. C.
"III. 93.

(1) The title of the bill was, An act for granting an aid of 800,000 l. for the effectual disbanning of the army.

" Though in our present circumstances there appears great hazard in breaking such a number of the troops; and though I might think myself unkindly used, that those Guards who came over with me to your assistance, and have constantly attended me in all the actions, whom I have been engaged, should be removed from me; yet it is my fixed opinion, that nothing can be so fatal to us, as that any distrust or jealousy should arise between me and my people, which I must own would have been very unexpected, after what I have undertaken, ventured, and acted for the restoring and securing of their liberties.

" I have thus plainly told you the only reason, which has induced me to pass this bill; and now I think myself obliged, in discharge of the trust reposed in me, and for my own justification, that no ill consequences may lie at my door, to tell you as plainly my judgment that the nation is less too much exposed.

" It is therefore incumbent upon you to take this matter into your serious consideration, and effectually to provide such a strength, as is necessary for the safety of the Kingdom, and the preservation of the Peace, which God has given us."

Address of the Commons upon it.
Feb. 4.

That the Commons could not be diverted from their purpose, by the King's reasons for passing the bill, nor by his representation of the dangerous consequences of it, they presented however an address of thanks, setting forth, " How sensible they were of the difficulties he had undertaken, and the labours he had sustained, and the hazards he had run, in rescuing them from Popery and arbitrary power, restoring their liberties, and giving peace and quiet to all Chesham: They returned him their most hearty thanks for his most gracious speech, in which he had expressed so great a regard for the good will and affection of his people, and had given to undeniable proof of his readiness to comply with the desires of his Parliament. And, as his Majesty had shewn a most tender and fatherly concern for the security and safety of his people, so they assured him, that he should never have reason to think the Commons were undutiful or unkind to him, but that they would upon all occasions stand by and assist him in the preservation of his sacred Person, and support of his Government, against all his enemies whatsoever." His Majesty, in answer to this, told them, " That he took their address very kindly: That he was fully satisfied of their duty and affection, and had no doubt but they would always act in the manner they had expressed upon this occasion."

And also of the Lords.

The Lords also presented an address of thanks for the disbanding act, and for the gracious expressions in his Speech, " That it was his Majesty's fixed opinion, that nothing could be so fatal to them, as that any distrust or jealousy should arise between his Majesty and his People: As likewise for his care and concern for the safety of the Kingdom, upon all occasions; assuring his Majesty, that at all times, for the safety of the Kingdom, and the preservation of the peace, which God has given them, they would assist and defend his Majesty against all his enemies both at home and abroad."

The King thanked the Lords for their address; and, finding that both Houses concurred in the same opinion as to the disbanding of the army, he gave effectual orders for reducing it to the number of seven thousand men, to be maintained in England, under the name of Guards and Garrisons. But, by reason that cavalry is more serviceable upon any sudden exigency, than infantry, the King took care, that, of these seven thousand, four thousand were horse and dragoons, and three thousand were foot. The bodies were also reduced to so small a number of soldiers, that it was said, we had now an army of officers; but this model was much approved by proper judges as the best, into which so small a number could have been brought.

This great reform gave the King much concern; but what touched him very sensibly was the necessity he was under of sending away his Dutch Guards, a regiment, which had faithfully attended his person from his earliest years, followed his fortune every where, and to which, besides innumerable other signal services, he owed his victory at the famous battle of the Boynne. With these the King had the utmost regret to part; and therefore, as he hoped the passing the disbanding act had softened their minds, he made an attempt for keeping these Guards, by sending the Lord Ranelagh with the following message to the Commons, all of his own hand-writing:

William R.

" His Majesty is pleased to let the House know, that the necessary preparations are made for transporting the Guards, who came with him into England; and that he intends to send them away immediately, unless, out of consideration to him, the House be disposed to find a way for continuing them longer in his service, which his Majesty would take very kindly."

Upon reading this message, the question was put, That a day be appointed to consider of it; but it was carried in the negative, and resolved, that an address should be presented to his Majesty, representing the reasons, why the House could not comply with his message. The address was accordingly delivered, wherein they represented, " That the passing the late act for disbanding the army gave great satisfaction to the subjects; and his Majesty's readiness to comply with the punctual execution of it would prevent all occasions of distrust and jealousy between him and his people. That it was an unspeakable grief to them, that his Majesty should be advised to propose any thing in his message, to which they could not consent with due regard to that Constitution, which his Majesty came over to restore, and had so often exposed his Royal person to preserve; and did in his gracious declaration promise, that all those foreign forces, which came over with him, should be sent back. That in duty therefore to his Majesty, and to discharge the trust reposed in them, they craved leave to lay before his Majesty, that nothing conduce more to the happiness and welfare of this Kingdom, than an intire confidence between his Majesty and his People, which could no way be so firmly established, as by intrusting his sacred person with his own subjects,

1698-9. "jects, who had so eminently signalized themselves on all occasions, during the late long and expensive war."

The King's reply. The King's answer to this address was as follows: Gentlemen, I came hither to restore the antient Constitution of this Government. I have had all possible regard to it since my coming; and I am resolved, through the course of my reign, to endeavour to preserve it intire in all the parts of it. I have a full confidence in the affections of my people, and I am well assured they have the same in me; and I will never give them just cause to alter this opinion.

"As to my subjects, who served during the war, I am an eye witness of their bravery, and of their zeal for my Person and Government; and I have not been wanting to express my sense of this to my Parliaments, as well as upon other occasions. I have all the reason to trust and rely upon them, that a Prince can have; and I am satisfied there is not one man among them capable of entertaining a thought, that what was proposed in my message, proceeded from any distrust of them."

"It shall be my study, to the utmost of my power, to perform the part of a just and a good King; and, as I will ever be strictly and nicely careful of observing my promises to my subjects, so I will not doubt of their tender regards to me."

But this answer could not move the Commons from their resolutions; so that the Dutch Guards were soon after shipped off for Holland (1).

The party opposed the King with great bitterness. In carrying these points, many hard things were said against the Court, and against the King himself. It was suggested, that he loved not the nation; that he was on the reserve with all Englishmen, and shewed no confidence in them; but that, as soon as the Session of Parliament was over, he went immediately to Holland. And it was said, this was not to look after the affairs of the States, which had been more excusable; but that he went thither to enjoy a lazy privacy at Loe, where, with a few favourites, he hunted and passed away the summer in a way, that did not much raise his character. It is certain, the usage, which his Majesty had met with of late, put his spirits too much on the fret; and he neither took care to disguise that, nor to overcome the ill humour, which the manner of his deportment, rather than any just occasion given by him, had raised in many against him.

At the same time that the army was thus reduced, there was a large provision made for the sea, greater than was thought necessary in a time of peace. Fifteen thousand seamen, with a fleet proportioned to that number, was thought a necessary security, since we were made so weak by land. For the maintenance of this fleet, and for disbanding the army, and other necessary occasions, a supply was granted of £1,484,015*l.* to be raised by a tax of three shillings in the pound upon all lands, pensions, offices, and personal estates.

One of the consequences of disbanding the army was a more visible concurrence of the Jacobites and Papists about the Town and Court, in so bold and insolent a manner, that the Commons took notice of it; and, upon that occasion, presented the following address to the King on the 21st of February:

WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, having observed the great concurrence to this City of Papists and other dissaffected persons, who have not owned your Majesty to be lawful and rightful King of these Realms, and the boldness they assume from your Majesty's unexampled clemency, not only to keep horses and arms contrary to law, but also to frequent all public places of resort near your two Houses of Parliament, and even to approach your Royal palaces, whereby they may have opportunities to perpetrate any wicked attempt against your Royal Person, on the safety and preservation whereof our religion and liberties, and the peace and welfare, not only of these Kingdoms, but of all Europe, do in a very great measure depend.

"And having also considered the many plots and conspiracies against your Majesty's Person and Government, but especially the late horrid intended assassination, contrived and carried on, not only by Papists (whose religion and interest might lead them to it) but even by such, who at their death (to the great scandal of our religion) professed and owned themselves to be Members of the Church of England, which chiefly (under God) owes its pre-

(1) The King writ the following letter to the Earl of Galway, a little before this.

I received some days ago a letter from you without date, by which I see you are uneasy at the proceedings of the Parliament here against the Foreigners. I think you have too much cause to be so; though, as yet, nothing has passed about you, and I have good reason to hope you will be left undisturbed. At least, you may be assured, I shall do my utmost, that nothing be done to your prejudice; satisfied, as I am, with your conduct, and useful, as you are, for my service. So you may be sure, that I will not recall you, unless I am forced to it, which I hope will not be the case. It is not to be conceived, how people here are set against the Foreigners. You will easily judge on whom this reflects. I design very shortly to send into Ireland five regiments of foot, and two of horse, and soon after three more of foot, eight in all. I will send you, in a few days, orders to disband Woolley's regiment of horse, and nine regiments of foot, intending to keep only those of Hammer and Hamilton. I design also, when the Parliament rises, to send you your regiment of horse, and the three French regiments, and perhaps Miramont's dragoons; but that must be very secret, though I much fear my design is already suspected here. I am in doubt whether I shall send likewise into Ireland Eppinger's regiment. All this together would amount to eighteen battalions of foot, three regiments of horse, and five of dragoons, reckoning Eppinger's for two; and this would be in a manner agreeable to your project, and, according to my calculation, the expence no greater; but, if it should be, something must be retrenched, of which I should be glad to know your sentiments. You will easily perceive how necessary it is, that all this be kept secret. I thought it requisite to give you early notice of my intention, that you might take your measures accordingly; mine must be regulated according as things go in the Parliament, of which there is no being sure, till the Session is over. There is a spirit of ignorance and malice prevails here beyond conception. Be always assured of my friendship.

1698-9, both Treasurer of the navy, and one of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and who had got too much by his late expedition in the Mediterranean, and done the Government too signal Services, not to lie open to the inquiry of some well-meaning, and to the envy of many disaffected persons. The Earl therefore, foreseeing the storm gathering against him, thought it prudence to resign all his places and retire. However it ought to be remembered in justice to him, that what he got in the Streights, was only by the presents he received from the States, whom he protected; for it was confessed by his very enemies, that a fleet was never better taken care of, nor more timely provided, than that, which he, with so much reputation, commanded. And besides it is most certain, that he charged the King in his Books with much less a day for every man, than the usual allowance of the navy (1).

This Session ended on the 4th of May, when the King made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"AT the opening this Parliament I told you my opinion was, that you were come together with hearts fully disposed to what was necessary for the safety, honour, and happiness of this Kingdom; and, having nothing else to recommend to you, I had reason to hope for unanimity and dispatch.

"You have now sat so many months, that the season of the year, as well as your particular affairs, make it reasonable you should have a recess. I take it for granted you have finished all the bills, which for the present you think requisite to be passed into laws; and I have given my assent to all you have presented to me.

"If any thing shall be found wanting for our safety, the support of public credit, by making good the faith of the Kingdom, as it stands engaged by Parliamentary securities, and for discharge of the debts occasioned by the war, or towards the advancing of trade, the suppressing of vice, and the employing of the poor, which were all the things I proposed to your consideration, when we met first, I cannot doubt but effectual care will be taken of them next winter, and I wish no inconvenience may happen in the mean time.

Then the Lord Chancellor prorogued the Parliament to the first of June.

During this Session, there was great talk of the lewdness of the stage, and not without reason, for both players and plays were so profane, that they were become a scandal to the nation. There had lately been published a book, intitled A short view of the stage, by Jeremy Collier, the same that had abolished Sir William Perkins, at Tyburn. In this work, he made a collection of the most lewd and profane passages in some modern plays, as Sir John Vanbrugh's, Mr. Congreve's and others, whose authors could more easily defend the writing of comedies, which Collier declaimed against, than vindicate what they had written in the passages he quoted. His book had a great run, and was cried up by the religious part of the town. And indeed, it was hardly possible for immorality and profaneness to be effectually restrained, while they were acted over with so much indecent liberty upon the stage. The ordinary plays, instead of answering the good old design of exposing vice, and recommending the charms of virtue, were debauched with the wrong images of things, and with a language bordering upon impious and obscene. This licentious vein had grown into a fashion under the rejoicings of King Charles II. and was now continued to please the vitiated palate of the gay and loose people, that frequented the play-houses for want of religion and business. The King, who rarely or never went to those places of diversion, was honestly informed of the scandal given to them; and therefore to put some check upon their liberty and lewdness, he commanded the following order to be sent to both play-houses.

His Majesty being informed, that, notwithstanding an order made in June 1697, by the Earl of Sunderland, then Lord Chamberlain of the Household, to prevent the profaneness and immorality of the stage, several plays had lately been acted, containing expressions contrary to religion and good manners. And whereas the Master of the revels had represented, that, in contempt of the said order, the actors did neglect to leave out such profane and indecent expressions, as he had thought proper to be omitted: Therefore it was his Majesty's pleasure, that they should not hereafter presume to act any thing in any play, contrary to religion and good manners, as they should answer at their utmost peril. At the same time the Master of the Revels was commanded not to license any plays containing irreligious or immoral expressions, and to give notice to the Lord Chamberlain, if the players presumed to act any thing, which he had struck out.

Towards the end of March, the Earl of Warwick and Lord Mobun being severally indicted of Warwick the murder of Captain Richard Coote, were tried by the House of Peers, in a Court prepared for that purpose, in Westminster-Hall; the Lord Chancellor of England being constituted Lord High-Steward upon this occasion, and the Court being opened with the usual ceremonies, the trial of the Earl of Warwick came on first, and lasted till late in the evening; when the Peers adjourned to their own house, and, after several debates, the Lords Temporal, only, returned to the Court in Westminster-Hall; where they delivered their judgments, seriatim, upon their honours; and unanimously acquitted the Earl of the murder, but found him guilty of manslaughter. The next day came on, in like manner, the trial of the Lord Mobun; who was acquitted of the murder by the unanimous suffrage of the Peers then present (2).

On

(2) The case was thus: The Lords Warwick and Mobun,

On the 14th of May, the Earl of Jersey, lately returned from his embassy to France (1), was appointed Secretary of State, in the room of the Duke of Surrey. The Duke, by a fall from his horse, was rendered incapable to undergo the fatigue of the Secretary's place; but he accepted of that of Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's Household; and, accordingly, in October following, the key and white staff were delivered to him by the King. He afterwards went to France and Italy for change of air, and married an Italian lady Adelaide Palaeotica, of Bologna. The Earl of Manchester was appointed Ambassador Extraordinary to France; and the Earl of Pembroke being declared Lord President of the Council, the Privy Seal was given to the Lord Viscount Longdale. On the last day of May, the King appointed the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President of the Council, the Lord Privy Seal, the Lord Steward of the Household, the Earl of Bridgewater, first Commissioner of the Admiralty, the Earl of Marlborough, the Earl of Jersey, and Mr. Montague, to be Lords Justices of England, during his absence. The day after, the King went from Kensington to Margate; where he embarked for Holland, and, on the 3d of June, landed at Orange Polder; from whence he went to the Uague.

Affairs of Ireland.

The Commons of England having voted, That twelve thousand men should be maintained in Ireland, the Parliament of that Kingdom applied themselves to find the necessary funds to answer the charge; and, on the 26th of January, an act passed for raising 120,000*l.* on all lands, tenements, and hereditaments in Ireland. This being done, the Parliament was prorogued; and, seven months after, a new Commission, constituting the Duke of Bolton, the Earl of Berkeley, and the Earl of Galway Lords Justices of Ireland, was opened, and read in Council; and these two Earls having been sworn in the usual manner, were complimented by the Council, and several other persons of Quality (2).

Affairs of the India Company.

All this while the Scots Company were under no small uneasiness: But, notwithstanding the several repulses, which they had met with in England, their Court of Directors, towards the beginning of the year, besides the letters formerly mentioned, sent another to the Lord Seafield, Secretary of State, to put him in mind of his promise, touching their petition, and the Parliament's address to the King. To which he wrote an answer on the 7th of February: "That he had presented their petition to the King, and was commanded to let them know, That, there being accounts, that the ships belonging to the Company, were arrived on the coasts of America, and the particular design not being communicated to his Majesty, he therefore delayed to give an answer, till he received certain information of their settlement." The Company having this intimation from the King, their Council-General wrote a letter to him, importing: "That they had arrived safe at their intended port, within a league of the Golden Island, on the coast of Darien; and, after having treated aboard the ships with the natives, who were always owned to be proprietors of that part of the coast, their men had, at the request, and with the content of the natives, landed on the 4th of November, 1698, and taken possession of an uninhabited place, never before possessed by any European whatever; and that, in pursuance of the treaty, the chief men and leaders of the natives had joined with, and taken commission from the Council. That they thought it their duty, at their first meeting, to give his Majesty an account thereof; and likewise, that by letters from the Council, bearing date at New Edinburgh in Caledonia (the name given to their new settlement) the 28th of December, they were positively informed, that the French had a design upon all that coast, or at least to make a settlement somewhere thereabouts. And they humbly conceived, that the firm settlement of their Colony in those parts might Mohun, and the Captains, French and Cotte, with Mr. Dockwra and Mr. James, being at a tavern, a quarrel arose; and they all went in chairs to Leicester-Fields, between one and two o'clock in the morning; and a duel was fought in the dark, three against three; in which Cotte was kill'd by French, as was said. The main evidence against the Lord Warwick was, that his sword was bloody, and French's was not.

She came over with the Countess of Jersey, and lived here to a very great age.

(2) A letter at this time, from the King to the Earl of Galway, shews how much he was chagrined at the late proceedings.

Kensington, Jan. 1. 1699.

I have not writ to you all this winter, by reason of my vexation at what passed in the Parliament, and because of the uncertainty I was under to know what to send you. It is not possible to be more sensibly touched than I am, at my not being able to do more for the poor Refugee Officers, who have served me with so much zeal and fidelity. I am afraid the good God will punish the ingratitude of this nation. I could hardly get the establishment of Ireland passed, as it will be sent you: There are retrenchments, which I was forced to make, though I like them not; and, doubtless some of them must be changed. The Duke of Bolton seems pleas'd with you, but not with the Chancellor. I have this day dispatched a new Commission for the Lords Justices of Ireland, by joining with the Duke of Bolton, and you, the Earl of Berkeley, who is an easy man, and will be agreeable to you. I am perfectly satisfied with your conduct; and hope, now you will be left undisturbed, since, in the last Parliament nothing was said of you, though you were much threatened. I fear, the Commission given here by the Commons, for the inspection of the forfeitures, will give you a great deal of trouble, and me no less, the next winter. Assuredly, on all sides, my patience is put to the trial. I am going to breathe a little beyond sea, in order to come back as soon as possible. I think it for my service to change the Commission of the Treasury in Ireland, where, I doubt, the revenue is not well managed; of which it is necessary that you let me know your sentiments immediately. The establishment of the next year must absolutely be reduced, that my ordinary revenue may serve to pay it; and a Parliament in Ireland must not be thought of so soon. Of this you ought instantly to consider; and take your measures for the future. Be always assured of my friendship.

1699. " might be a means of preventing, or at least lessening the evil consequences, that might arise to his Majesty's Kingdoms and Dominions every where, by the settlement of any powerful foreign neighbour upon any part of that coast. And that, as they were always bound thankfully to acknowledge his goodness for granting them those privileges, and his letters patents, by which their Company was established; so they did in all humility confidently expect his Royal favour and protection, as having, in all the steps of their conduct, through the whole course of that affair, strictly observed the conditions required by the act of Parliament and letters patents: And they referred that, together with the contents of their last petition, to his Royal consideration, to give such directions therein, as to his wisdom should seem meet and expedient."

The news of the Scots settlement at Darien alarmed most of the nations of Europe, who had plantations in the neighbourhood. And it was no wonder, that the Spaniards in particular complained loudly of it. It lay so near Porto Bello and Panama on the one side, and Carthagena on the other, that they could not think they were safe, when such a neighbour came so near the center of their Empire in America. The French King also complained of this, as an invasion of the Spanish Dominions, and offered the Court of Madrid a fleet to dislodge the Scots.

The King of Spain's memorial against it. May 3. Lambert I. 22.

The Marquis of Canales, the Spanish Ambassador in England, likewise presented the following memorial to the King: The King, my Master, being informed from several places, and lastly, from the Governor of the Havanna, of the insult and attempt of some Scots ships, provided with men, and other things requisite, who are endeavouring to settle themselves in his Dominions in America, and particularly in the province of Darien, his Majesty has received these advices with great discontent, as a mark of disregard, and a breach of the alliance between the two Crowns (which his Majesty has hitherto and always will religiously observe, and from which so many advantages have accrued to his Majesty and his subjects) from which Alliance his Majesty did not expect these sudden insults of his Majesty's subjects, and that in a time of peace, without any occasion or pretence, in the very heart of his Dominions. All that the King desires is, that it be represented to his Majesty how very sensible he is of these hostilities and unjust proceedings, against which he will take proper measures." (1)

It was further urged by the Spaniards, that they were once possessed of Darien; and, though they found it too unhealthy to settle there, yet the right to it belonged still to them; and consequently, that the seizing of it was a breach of treaty, and a violent possession of their country. In answer to this, the Scots asserted, that the nations of Darien were never conquered by the Spaniards, and were by consequence a free people. They alledged, that they had purchased of those natives leave to possess themselves of that place; and that the Spaniards had abandoned the country, because they could not reduce the natives; so that the pretension of the first discovery was made void; and then, the natives being left to themselves, it was lawful for the Scots to treat with them.

It was given out, that there was much gold in the country; and the Scots were so full of hopes from this project, that a fund was raised for carrying it on, greater than, as was thought, that Kingdom could stretch to. Four hundred thousand pounds sterling was subscribed, and a fourth part was paid down; and afterwards seventy thousand pounds more were brought in; and a national fury seem'd to have transported the whole Kingdom upon this project.

The Jacobites went into the management with a particular heat. They saw the King would be much pressed from Spain. The English nation apprehending, that this would be set up as a breach of treaties, and that upon a rupture their effects in Spain might be seized, grew also very uneasy at it: Upon which it was thought, that the King would in time be forced to disown the invasion, and to declare against it; and in that case the Jacobites hoped to have inflamed the Kingdom with this, that the King denied them his protection, while they were only acting according to law; and this, they would have said, was contrary to the coronation-oath, and so they would have thought they were freed from their allegiance to him. The Jacobites having this project, did all that was possible to raise the hopes of the nation to the highest degree. The English Plantations grew also very jealous of the new Colony; and feared, that the double prospect of finding gold, and of robbing the Spaniards, would draw many planters from them into this new settlement; and that the Buccaniers might run into them: For, by the Scots act, this place was to be made a free port; and, if it was not ruined, before it was well formed, they reckoned it would become a seat of piracy, and another Algiers in those parts. Upon these grounds the English nation inclined to declare against this, and the King seem convinced, that it was an infraction of his treaties with Spain. Orders therefore were sent, but very secretly, to the English Plantations, particularly to Jamaica, and the Leeward Islands, to forbid all commerce with the Scots at Darien. Accordingly, proclamations were published at Jamaica, Barbadoes, New York, and New England, in his Majesty's name, strictly commanding all his subjects, that they should not presume, on any pretence whatsoever, to hold any correspondence with the Scots at Darien, nor give them any assistance of arms, or ammunition, or provisions, or any other necessities whatsoever.

Whilst in Scotland all men were full of hopes that their new Colony should bring them home directly contrary to the custom of the British Court. Accordingly, he was told either to pull off his hat, or forbear coming to Court. He chose to absent himself, rather than submit. Lambert I. p. 23.

mountains of gold, these proclamations came to their knowledge, and were complained of as acts of hostilities and violations of the common rights of humanity. It is true, the proclamations had a great effect on the Colony, though otherwise it was too weak and ill supplied, as well as too much divided within itself, to have subsisted long. Those, who had first possessed themselves of it, were forced to abandon it. Soon after they had gone from it, a second recruit of men and provisions were sent thither from Scotland. But one of their ships unhappily took fire, in which they had the greatest stock of provisions; and so these likewise went off. And, though the third reinforcement, that soon followed this, was both stronger and better furnished, yet they fell into such factions among themselves, that they were too weak to resist the Spaniards, who, feeble as they were, yet saw the necessity of attacking them; and they, finding themselves unable to resist the force, which was brought against them, capitulated; and with that the whole design fell to the ground, partly for want of stock and skill in those, who managed it, and partly by the baseness and treachery of those, whom they employed.

Great discontent upon the loss of Darien.

The conduct of the King's Ministers in Scotland was much censured in the whole progress of this affair, for they had connived at it, if not encouraged it, in hopes that the design would fall of itself; but now it was not so easy to cure the universal discontent, which the miscarriage of this design, to the impoverishing of the whole Kingdom, had raised, and which now began to spread like a contagion among all sorts of people.

The King goes to Loo.
June 23.
N. S.

King William, having received the compliments of the foreign Ministers, and other Persons of Quality, on his safe arrival in Holland, assisted at the Assembly of the States-General, and at that of the States of Holland, and given instructions to Mr. Hill, whom he had appointed his Envoy Extraordinary to Savoy, to make his compliment of congratulation to that Court upon the birth of the Prince of Piedmont (which had been notified to him in England by Count Maffey) he set out for Loo, at which palace, and that of Dieren, he spent most part of the summer in his usual diversions of hunting and shooting.

About the latter end of August, the States of Holland, out of their regard for the King's preservation, published a placart, requiring, that all such persons, as had been declared rebels in England, should immediately depart their dominions. And a few days after the King reviewed the Dutch forces incamped near Arnhem, and then returned to Loo, to entertain his bosom friend the old Duke of Zell, who was come thither to make him a visit with a numerous retinue.

The Duke of Zell staid about two months with the King at Loo, and, during the King's residence there, the Earl of Portland, the French Ambassador Count Tallard, and the Grand Pensionary of Holland, had frequent conferences about the affair of the Spanish succession. There being also good reason to be apprehensive of a rupture between the two Northern Crowns, his Majesty sent instructions to Monsieur Opdam, the Dutch Ambassador in Sweden, to use his utmost endeavours to prevent it, which were however ineffectual. About the middle of October, the King came to the Assembly of the States, and, having settled the state of the Dutch army and fleet for the ensuing year, he embarked for England, October 16, landed at Margate the next day, lay that night at Canterbury, and on the 18th arrived at Kensington.

This year died the Marquis of Winchester, Duchess of Bolton, whom the King had created Duke of Bolton; he was a man of a strange mixture; he had the spleen to a high degree, and affected an extravagant behaviour; for many weeks he would take a conceit not to speak one word; and, at other times, he would not open his mouth, till such an hour of the day, when he thought the air was pure; he changed the day into night, and often hunted by torch-light, and took all sorts of liberties to himself, many of which were very disagreeable to those about him. In the end of King Charles's time, and during King James's reign, he affected an appearance of folly, which afterwards he compared to Junius Brutus's behaviour under the Tarquins. With all this, he was a very knowing, and a very crafty politic man: And was an artful flatterer when that was necessary to compass his end, in which generally he was successful: He was a man of a profuse expence, and of a most ravenous avarice to support that; and, though he was much hated, yet he carried matters before him with such authority and success, that, he was, in all respects, the great riddle of the age.

This summer Sir Josiah Child died; he was a man of great notions as to merchandize, which was his education, and in which he succeeded beyond any man of his time; he applied himself chiefly to the East-India trade, which by his management was raised so high, that it drew much envy and jealousy both upon himself and upon the Company. He had a compass of knowledge and apprehension unusual to men of his profession. He was vain and covetous, and thought too cunning, though he seemed to be always sincere.

A few days after the King's return, Mr. Mountague, having a view to the Auditor's place, resigned his seat at the Treasury-board, and was succeeded as Chancellor of the Exchequer by Mr. John Smith, and by Mr. Hill, now returned from Savoy, as one of the Lords of the Treasury.

Many expected to see a new Parliament; for the King's speech at the end of the former Session look'd like a complaint, and an appeal to the nation against them; he seemed inclined to it, but his ministers would not venture on it; the dissolving a Parliament in anger has always cast such a load on those, who were thought to have advised it, that few have been able to bear it; besides, the disbanding the army had rendered the Members, who promoted it, very popular to the nation; so they would have sent up the same men, and it was thought that there was little occasion for heat in another Session. And therefore, the Parliament being met the 16th of November, the King addressed himself to both Houses in the following manner:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Hope you will not think I have called you out of your countries too soon, if you consider, that our common security requires a

And, when you enter upon this business, I believe you will think it necessary to take care of the repairs of the ships and of the fortifications, without which our fleet cannot be safe, when it is in harbour.

" I cannot omit to put you in mind of another matter, in which so great a number of my subjects is concerned, and wherein the honour of the Kingdom, and the faith of Parliaments, is so far engaged, that our future security seems to depend upon it; I mean, the making good the deficiencies of the funds, and the discharging the debts contracted by reason of the war.

" And, till we may be so happy to see the public debts paid, I shall hope no Session will end without something done towards lessening them. While I am speaking to you on this head, I think myself obliged to mention, with a very particular concern, a debt, which is owing to the Prince of Denmark, the state whereof I have ordered to be laid before you.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

" These are things of such importance, that I must earnestly recommend them to your consideration, and desire you to provide the necessary supplies.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" There is nothing I should more rejoice in, than that I were not under the necessity of so often asking aids of my people. But as the reason of it is evident, because the funds, formerly applied to defray the public expence, are now anticipated for payment of the debts of the Kingdom; so it is my satisfaction, that you all see, that nothing of what is demanded, is for any personal use of mine. And I do faithfully assure you, that no part of what is given shall be diverted from any purpose, for which it is designed.

" I believe the nation is already sensible of the good effects of peace, by the manifest increase of trade, which I shall make it my business to encourage by all means in my power. Probably, it might receive an advantage, if some good bill were prepared for the more effectual preventing and punishing unlawful and clandestine trading, which does not only tend to defraud the public, but prejudices the fair Merchant, and discourages our own manufactures.

" The increase of the poor is become a burden to the Kingdom; and their loose and idle life does, in some measure, contribute to that deprivation of manners, which is complained of (I fear, with too much reason). Whether the ground of this evil be from defects of laws already made, or in the execution of them, deserves your consideration. As it is an indispensable duty, that the poor, who are not able to help themselves, should be maintained; so I cannot but think it extremely desirable, that such, as are able and willing should not want employment; and

" such, as are obstinate and unwilling, should be compelled to labour.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I have a full assurance of the good affections of my people; which I shall endeavour to preserve, by a constant care of their just rights and liberties; by maintaining the Established Religion; by seeing the course of justice kept steady and equal; by countenancing virtue, and discouraging vice; and by declining no difficulties nor dangers, where their welfare and prosperity may be concerned. These are my resolutions; and I am persuaded that you are come together with purposes, on your part, suitable to these of mine. Since, then, our aims are only for the general good, let us act with confidence in one another; which will not fail, by God's blessing, to make me a happy King, and you a happy, flourishing People."

This excellent speech was so far from removing (as it was hoped) the ill impressions, which the dissatisfaction the King had expressed upon the proceedings of the Commons, when he parted with them last, had left in their minds, that it served rather to increase them. The Commons, notwithstanding their disbanding the forces, would not suffer the least intimation of their want of confidence in the King; and grew angry at their being thought to have given any occasion to such a suspicion: Instead, therefore, of an address of thanks, they presented a sort of remonstrance, setting forth; " That, being highly sensible, that there was nothing more necessary for the peace and prosperity of the Kingdom, for the quieting people's minds, and disappointing his enemies designs, than a mutual and entire confidence between him and his Parliament; they did esteem it their greatest misfortune, that, after having so amply provided for His and the Government's security, both by sea and land, any jealousy or mistrust had been raised of their duty and affection to him and his people: And begged leave to represent to him, That it would greatly conduce to the continuing and establishing an entire confidence between him and them, that he would shew marks of his high displeasure towards all, that should presume to misrepresent their proceedings to him; and they, on their part, being duly sensible of his constant concern to maintain their civil and religious rights, in defence whereof he had so often exposed his person, would do all they could to prevent and discourage all false rumours and reports, reflecting on his Majesty's Government, whereby to create any misunderstanding between him and his subjects." To this the King returned the following answer:

" Gentlemen, My Parliaments have done so great things for me; and I have, upon all proper occasions, expressed so great a sense of their kindness; and my opinion has been so often declared, that the happiness of any English King depends upon an intire correspondence between him and his Parliament, that it may not seem strange for me to assure you, that no person has ever yet dared to go about to misrepresent to me the proceedings of either House. Had I found any such, they would

" would immediately have felt the highest marks of my displeasure. It is a justice I owe, not only to my Parliament, but to every one of my subjects, to judge of them by their actions: And this rule I will steadily pursue. If any shall attempt, hereafter, to put me upon other methods, by calumnies, or misrepresentations, they will not only fail of success, but shall be looked upon and treated by me, as my worst enemies.

" Gentlemen, I am pleased to see by your address, that you have the same thoughts of the great advantages, which will ensue to the Kingdom from our mutual confidence, as I expressed to both Houses at the opening of this Session. I take very kindly the assurance you give me, of using your utmost care and endeavours to prevent and discourage all false rumours and reports reflecting upon Me and my Government; and I faithfully promise you, that no actions of mine shall give you a just ground for any misunderstanding between me and my people."

*A change of Ministry
voured.*

As those, who opposed the King, were resolved to force a change of ministry upon him, they sought all occasions for this, and imagined they had found a good pretence, in the following affair.

*Kidd's affair.
St. Tr.
III. 230,

In the beginning of the year 1695, the Earl of Bellamont was made Governor of New York; and the King at that time did him the honour to say, that " he thought him a man of resolution and integrity, and, with those qualities, the more likely than any other he could think of to put a stop to the growth of piracy;" with which that Province and the rest of the American Colonies were remarkably infected, for which reason he intended to put the Government of New England also into his hands. Upon this all persons, who had concerns in New York, made their application to him; and among others Colonel Robert Levingston, a man of a considerable estate and fair reputation, who had several employments in the province of New York; on which account, as well as that of other matters, which he had then depending before the Council and the Treasury, he had frequent access to him. Bellamont taking occasion to mention to him the scandal, which lay upon New York, in respect to the encouragement, which pirates found there, Levingston confessed, there was too much ground for the complaint; and that, if some speedy and effectual course was not taken to suppress these enormities, so many persons would be drawn into the guilt, that it would become very difficult to master them. He then proposed to him to employ Captain William Kidd lately come from New York in a sloop of his own, who had told him he knew most of the principal pirates, and their places of rendezvous, and would undertake to secure most of them, in case he might be employed in one of the King's ships, a good sailor, of about thirty guns and one hundred and fifty men, since, though the pirates were many in number, yet they had at that time no ships of considerable force. Levingston represented Kidd as a bold honest man, and one he believed fitter than any other to be employed on that occasion. The Earl of Bellamont acquainted the King with this proposal, which was thought necessary to be immediately considered, because several informations upon oath were then come to the Secretary of State of several vessels gone and going from Bermudas, New York, Rhode Island, &c. under the command of Thomas To, William Maze, John Ireland, Thomas Wake, and others, all of them pirates, who had made several piratical voyages, and returned with great wealth. The King consulted the Admiralty on this occasion; but the war employing all the King's ships, which were in a condition for service, and the great want of seamen, notwithstanding the press, and all other means used, together with the remoteness of the voyage, and the uncertainty of meeting with the pirates, or taking them, though they might be found out, occasioned, after some deliberation, the laying aside of this project. Levingston however would not give it over, but proposed to the Earl of Bellamont, that, if persons of consideration might be induced to join in the expence of buying and fitting out a proper ship, he had such an opinion of Kidd's capacity and good meanings, and so great a desire that some stop might be put to those pirates, that he would himself be one of the undertakers, and that he and Kidd would be a fifth part of the charge; Kidd, as he alleged, being a settled inhabitant at New York, where he had a competent estate, and had married a wife with a good fortune, by whom he had a child: That he lived regularly, and his good behaviour might be depended upon with assurance, because, if he did otherwise than as his duty would oblige him, he had no place to go to, for he had acted such things against the French since the war, that he durst never trust himself to them. But, as the strongest argument, that could be made use of for trusting Kidd, the Colonel offered to be bound for the faithful execution of his Commission. All this the Earl made known to the King, who highly approved of the design; and, to encourage it, was pleased to consent, that the persons, who engaged, should have a grant of what Kidd should take from the pirates, as far as it might belong to them, except a tenth, which was reserved to shew, that the King was a partner in the undertaking. Upon this encouragement the Earl of Bellamont proposed it to the Lord Chancellor Sommers, the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Romney, and the Earl of Orford, Sir Edmund Harrison, and others, who agreed to his proposal of 6000*l.* expence of which Levingston and Kidd were to be a fifth part. The whole management of the affair was left to the Earl of Bellamont. The commission granted to Kidd had nothing in it, contrary to law, or different from the constant form of Commissions of that kind, of which there had been a great number. There was a power to fight with and seize pirates, in order to bring them to a legal trial; but not a word of treating with them, or pardoning them; yet this was given out by the Old East-India Company, and that Kidd was a notorious pirate, whereas he had received a Commission from the Admiralty as a Privateer, before he was employed by these noble adventurers, of whom he never saw the Duke of Shrewsbury or the Lord Sommers. He was introduced to the Earl of Orford by the Earl of Bellamont, and to the Earl of Romney by Colonel Hewetson, which was all he knew of them. He had no instructions public or private from any of the Adventurers, except sailing orders from the Earl of Bellamont, by which he

Pursuant to the orders, which Kidd had received from the Earl of Bellamont and Sir Edmund Harrison, he sailed in the Adventure Galley from Plimouth, in April 1696, to New York, and in his way took a French prize. From thence he went to Madera, thence to Bonavista, and St. Jago, from whence he proceeded to Madagascar, and from thence he cruised at the entrance of the Red Sea; but, effecting nothing, he sailed to Calicut, and took a Ship of a hundred and fifty tons; the Master of which, and three or four of his Crew, were Dutchmen, the rest Moors; and this ship he carried to Madagascar (1.) From thence he sailed again, and about five weeks after took the Quedagh Merchant of four hundred tons; the Master of which was one Wight an Englishman. She had on board two Dutch Mates and a French Gunner; the Crew were all Moors; in all about ninety persons. This ship he carried to St. Mary's near Madagascar, and there he shared the goods with his Crew, forty shares to his own use. Here ninety of his Crew, who were a hundred and fifty-one in all, left him, and went on board the Mocha frigate, an East-India Company ship, which had turned pirate, and then lay there. Kidd and the rest of his men burnt the Adventure Galley at St. Mary's, and they all went on board the Quedagh Merchant, and sailed for the West-Indies. Being denied succour at Anguila and St. Thomas's, he sailed to Mona, lying between Porto-Rico and Hispaniola, and there, by the means of one Bolton got some provisions from Curaçoa. He bought a sloop of Bolton, in which he loaded part of his goods, and left the Quedagh Merchant, with the rest of the goods, in trust with Bolton, and seventeen or eighteen men in her. In this sloop he touched at several places, and disposed of a great part of his goods, and at last came to Boston in New-England, where the Earl of Bellamont seized him, and what goods he had left; for he had pretended, that the Quedagh Merchant, being manned with Moors, was a lawful prize, though there was no proof, that the Commander and his Crew had committed any piracies on the English or any European, or indeed Indian Nation. The Earl of Bellamont, by his letters of the 8th of July, 1699, sent notice of Kidd's being taken to the Secretary of State, and to the Council of Trade; transmitted the informations against him, together with his examinations, and a particular account of all his own proceedings in relation to Kidd and other pirates; and pressed, that immediate care might be taken in England, to send for them in order to their trial, taking notice, that in New England there was no law to punish piracy with death; and that in those parts the people were so favourable to pirates, by reason of the wealth they brought and dispersed among them, that little justice could be expected. He likewise desired orders with respect to the goods, which he had secured. Upon this advice the Lords Justices directed the Admiralty immediately to dispatch away one of the King's ships to fetch Kidd and the other pirates in safe custody, together with their effects. The Admiralty appointed the Rocheester man of war for that service, which had her orders accordingly, and sailed for Boston with other ships under her convoy; but, the Rocheester being disabled by a storm from continuing the voyage, and forced back, it was presently reported, that it was all collusion between the Ministers and Adventurers, who had no mind that Kidd should be brought to England, for fear of his making discoveries, that the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Lord Chancellor Summers, &c. were turned pirates; since to be partner with pirates is the same thing as being pirates themselves. So heavy a load was cast on the Ministry, chiefly on him who was at the head of the justice of the nation; it was said, he ought not to have engaged in such a project; and it was maliciously insinuated, that the Privateer would not have turned pirate, in confidence of the protection of those who employ'd him, if he had not secret orders from them for what he did. Such black constructions are men, who are engaged in parties, apt to make of the actions of those, whom they intend to disgrace, even against their own consciences: So that an undertaking, that was not only innocent but meritorious, was traduced as a design for robbery and piracy. This was urged in the House of Commons as highly criminal, for which all, who were concerned in it, ought to be turned out of their employments; and a motion was made, the 6th of December, that the letters patents granted to the Earl of Bellamont and others, of pirates goods, were dishonourable to the King, against the law of nations, contrary to the laws and statutes of the land, invasive of property, and destructive of trade and commerce; but it was rejected by a great majority.

The next attempt was to remove the Bishop An attempt of Salisbury from being Preceptor to the Duke of for the re- Gloucester. Some objected his being a Scotchman of man; and others remembered his Pastoral Letter, Bishop Burnet, which had been ordered to be burnt. So an address to the King for that purpose, was moved, the 13th of December; but this motion was likewise lost by the same majority, that had carried the former vote (2).

(1) The pirates had made a sort of settlement on the island of Madagascar, under Henry Avery, who, thinking himself not well used in the English sea service, had turned pirate. This man had not only taken and robbed a large ship belonging to the Mogul, on board of which was an Indian Prince and a great treasure, but he committed several other piracies. The East-India Company, fearing reprisals from the Mogul, represented the necessity of destroying those pirates, who were thus harboured in Madagascar. Avery and his companions falling out, and being almost left alone, he got a passage to England, and as some say to Ireland. He had intrusted the remains of the plunder. Numb. XXXI. Vol. III.

der which he brought with him, with a person who cheated him of so much of it, that he died of want. The Lords Justices of England, hearing of his arrival in 1696, issued out a proclamation for apprehending this famous pirate. His father was a Devonshire man, and lived near Biddesford, where he had a small estate. His mother and sister were both there, when the proclamation was read for his apprehension, and it was said, he had presented his sister with the pearl necklace, he had taken from the Indian Prince, which she afterwards sold.

(2) About this time Bishop Burnet published a noted work, of which he gives the following account: I published, 1699. Mean while, the supply for the small army and fleet was settled, and a fund was given for it. Those who had reduced the army, thought it needless to have so great a force at sea; so, on the 21st of December, it was resolved, that seven thousand men should be the complement for sea-service the next year. This was moved by the Tories, and the Whigs readily gave way to this reduction, because the fleet was now in another management; the Earl of Orford, with his friends, being laid aside, and a set of Tories brought into their places (1).

The affair of the forfeited estates.
Burnet.
St. Tr.
II. 709.

The great business of this Session was the affair of the forfeited estates in Ireland. Among the complaints against the Court, one was, that the King had given grants of these estates. It has been remembered, that a bill being sent up by the Commons, attaining the Irish that had been in arms, and applying their estates to the paying the public debts, leaving only a power to the King, to dispose of the third part of them, was like to lie long before the Lords; many petitions being offered against it; upon which the King, to bring the Session to a speedy conclusion, had promised that this matter should be kept intire, till their next meeting: But, the next Session going over, without any proceeding in it, the King granted away all those confiscations: It being an undoubted branch of the Royal Prerogative, that all confiscations accrued to the Crown, and might be granted away at the pleasure of the King: It was pretended, that those estates came to a million and a half in value. Great objections were made to the merits of some, who had the largest share in those grants; attempts have been made, in the Parliament of Ireland, to obtain a confirmation of them, but that which Ginckle, who was created Earl of Athlone, had, was only confirmed; now it was become a popular subject of declamation, to arraign both the grants, and those who had them: Motions had been often made, for a general resumption of all the grants, made in this reign; but, in answer to this, it was said, that, since no such motion was made, 1699. for a resumption of the grants made in King Charles the second's reign, notwithstanding the extravagant profusion of them, and the ill grounds upon which they were made, it shewed both a disrespect and a black ingratitude, if, while no other grants were resumed, this King's only should be called in question. The Court party said often, let the retrospect go back to the year 1660, and they would consent to it, and that which might be got by it would be worth the while. It was answered this could not be done after so long a time, that so many sales, mortgages, and settlements had been made, pursuant to those grants; so all these attempts came to nothing. But, in the last Session, a more effectual method was taken. A Commission was given, by act of Parliament, to seven persons named by the House of Commons, to enquire into the value of the forfeited estates in Ireland so granted away, and into the considerations upon which those grants were made. Accordingly, these Commissioners, namely the Earl Drogheda, Francis Annesley, John Trenchard, James Hamilton, Henry Langford, Sir Richard Leving, and Sir Francis Brewster went over to Ireland, and affected a great zeal in the execution of their trust. They proceeded like inquisitors, and did readily believe every thing that was offered them, which tended to inflame the account; as they suppressed all that was laid before them, which contradicted their design of representing the value of the grants very high, and of shewing how undeserving those were who had obtained them. They represented the confiscated estates to be such, that, out of the sale of them, above a million and a half might be raised. The Commissioners disagreed in some points. So the report was delivered on the 15th of December to the House of Commons, by four only of the seven Commissioners; the other three, namely, the Earl of Drogheda, Sir Richard Leving, and Sir Francis Brewster, had refused to sign it, because they thought published, this year, an Exposition of the thirty-nine articles of Religion: It seemed a work much wanted, and it was justly to be wondered at, that none of our Divines had attempted any such performance, in a way suitable to the dignity of the subject: For some slight analyses of them are not worth either mentioning or reading. It was a work that required study and labour, and laid a man open to many malicious attacks; this made some of my friends advise me against publishing it; in compliance with them, I kept it five years by me, after I had finished it: But I was now prevailed on by the Archbishop and many of my own order, besides a great many others, to delay the publishing it no longer. It seemed a proper addition to the History of the Reformation, to explain and prove the doctrine, which was then established. I was moved first, by the late Queen, and pressed by the late Archbishop to write it; I can appeal to the searcher of all hearts, that I wrote it with great sincerity and a good intention, and with all the application and care, I was capable of; I did then expect, what I have since met with, that malicious men would employ both their industry and ill-nature, to find matter for censure and cavils; but, though there have been some books written upon several passages in it, yet this has been done, with so little justice or reason, that I am not yet convinced, that there is one single period or expression, that is justly remarked on, or that can give me any occasion, either to retract, or so much as to explain any one part of that whole work; which I was very ready to have done, if I had seen cause for it. There was another reason, that seemed to determine me to the publishing it at this time, namely, the growth of Popery.

1699. thought it false and ill-grounded in several particulars, of which they sent over an account to both Houses; but no regard was had to their memorial, nor was any inquiry made into their objections to the report. These three were looked on as men gained by the Court; and the rest were magnified as men that could not be wrought on, nor frightened from their duty. The specious proposal of raising so large a sum as a million and a half, towards discharging the public debts, so took with the House, that no complaint against the proceedings of the Commissioners could be hearkened to, and all the methods used to disgrace the report, had the quite contrary effect; and the hatred into which the Favourites were fallen, among whom, and their creatures, the grants were chiefly distributed, made the motion go the quicker. When therefore the report was perused by the Commons, they resolved, that a bill should be brought in for applying all the forfeited estates in Ireland, and grants thereof, since the 13th of February 1688, to the use of the public (1). All opposition to this was looked upon as a courting of the men in favour; nor was any regard paid to a motion for reserving a third part, to be disposed of by the King, which had been in the bill that was sent up eight years before to the Lords. When this was moved, it was answered, that the Grantees had enjoyed those estates so many years, that the mean profits did arise to more than a third of their value. As the party for this bill apprehended that many petitions would be offered to the House, which the Court would probably encourage, on design, at least, to retard their proceedings, they, to prevent this, that the bill might not be clogged with too many clauses, passed a vote of a very extraordinary nature, That they would not receive any petition from any person whatsoever, concerning the grants, adding at the same time, that they would consider the great services performed

Dec. 15.

(1) The report consists of ninety articles, the chief of which are these:

The number of acres in the several counties, belonging to the forfeited persons, are } Acres.
1,060,792

These being worth 211,623 l. a year, at 6 years purchase for a life, and at 13 years, for the inheritance, come to the full value of } l.
2,685,130

Out of these lands, the estates, restored to the old proprietors by the articles of Limerick and Galway, are valued at 724,923 l. and those restored by Royal favour, at 260,863 l. after these and several other allowances, the gross value of all the estates forfeited since the 13th of Feb. 1688, and not restored, amounts to } 1,699,343

The number of grants and custodians, since the battle of the Boyne, under the Great Seal of England, are 76, some of the principal of which are mentioned, namely.

Acres,
To the Lord Romney, three grants of --- 49517
To the Earl of Albemarle, two grants of --- 108,633
To William Bentinck (Lord Woodstock) --- 135,820
To the Earl of Athlone (occasionally by the Parliament of Ireland) } --- 26,480
To the Earl of Galway --- 36,148
To the Earl of Rochford, two grants of --- 30,512
To the Lord Coningsby, --- 5,966
To Colonel Gyslerus Hamilton, for his services in wading through the Shannon and storming Athlone, at the head of the English grenadiers, } --- 5,582
To Sir Thomas Pendergrast, for discovering the Assassination-plot, } --- 7,082

It is also observed, that several of the Grantees had raised great sums of money, by the sale of their lands amounting, in all, to 68,155 l. particularly, the Earl of Athlone (his grant being confirmed by act of Parliament) had sold to the amount of 17,684 l. the Lord Romney, 30,147 l. and the Earl of Albemarle, 13,000 l.

In these, and most other articles, the Commissioners all agreed; but a difference arose amongst them on account of King James's private estate, granted to him when Duke of York. This estate three of the Commissioners, and particularly Leving, would not allow to be forfeited, and consequently ought not to be reported. Whilst they were debating this matter, Mr. Arthur Moore, Member of the House of Commons, sent them a letter of his own private motion, wherein he directed them, to make a separate article of the Lady Orkney's grants, because that might reflect upon some of the Journals, meaning the King. Mr. Mountague Chancellor of the Exchequer, having learned the contents of Moore's House of letter, and being zealous to vindicate the King's honour, which he thought was struck at in that letter, complained of it to the House. Being pressed to tell his author, he at first excused himself, alleging, that he was under a private obligation not to reveal what had passed in private conversation; but the House insisting upon it, he named Mr. Methuen, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who was also a Member of the House; but he denied positively, that he had ever mentioned any such thing. The House therefore resolved on the 15th of January, That the said report was false and scandalous; and a motion being made, That the four Commissioners for Irish forfeitures, who signed the report presented to the House, had acquitted themselves in the execution of that Commission with understanding and integrity, a warm debate arose thereupon, which was adjourned to the next day, when the Commons resolved, That the four Commissioners had acquitted themselves in the execution of their commission with understanding, courage, and integrity: That Sir Richard Leving had been the author of the groundless and scandalous aspersions cast upon the four Commissioners. And that Sir Richard Leving be committed prisoner to the Tower of London for his offence. However, after all, this estate was placed at the end of the report, in a different manner from the rest. We shall conclude (say the four Commissioners who signed the report) by laying before your Honours another grant of a considerable value, which we are apprehensive does not fall within the letter of our inquiry; but, since the benefit of some forfeited leases or holdings are therein granted, we chose rather to lay the whole grant before you, than be thought deficient in executing any part of our duty, or what might be expected from us.

A grant under the Great Seal of England, dated the 30th of May 1695, passed to Mrs. Elizabeth Vilters, now Countess of Orkney, of all the private estates of the late King James (except some small part in grant to the Lord Athlone) containing 95,649 acres, worth yearly 25,995 l. 18 s. value 337,943 l. There is payable out of this estate 2000 l. a year, to the Lady Susanna Bellasis for her life, and 1000 l. a year to Mrs. Godfrey for her life, and almost all the old leases determine in May 1701, and then the estate will answer the values abovementioned.

This report was signed by Amelley, Trenchard, Hamilton, and Langford. The other three refused to sign it, upon account of this and seven other articles of the ninety. They gave their reasons for it, in a letter to the Lord Chancellor, November 1699, and in another to the Speaker; but the House would not hear it read, 1699. ed by the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the forfeited estates (1).

Jan. 18. After this, on the 18th of January, it was farther resolved by the Commons, that the advising, procuring, and passing these grants had occasioned great debts upon the nation, and heavy taxes upon the people, and highly reflected on the King's honour; and that the officers and instruments, concerned in the same, had highly failed in the performance of their trust and duty.

Feb. 15. Then it was voted, that this resolution should be presented to the King, in the form of an address, which was accordingly done on the 21st

Feb. 26. of February, to which the King, five days after, returned this answer:

Gentlemen,

Pr. H. C. "I was not only led by inclination, but III. 124. "thought myself obliged in justice, to reward
"those who had served well, and particularly in "the reduction of Ireland, out of the estates
"forfeited to me, by the rebellion there.
"The long war by which we were engaged,
"did occasion great taxes, and has left the nation
"much in debt; and the taking just and "effectual ways for lessening that debt, and "supporting publick credit, is what, in my opinion,
"will best contribute to the honour, interest,
"and safety of this Kingdom."

The Commons were so provoked with this answer, that they resolved, that whosoever had advised it, had used his utmost endeavours to create a misunderstanding and jealousy between the King and his People. They then proceeded on the bill of resumption, which being finished, they passed, the 2d of April. In justification of their proceedings, they ordered the report of the Commissioners for the Irish forfeitures to be published; "and that the resolution of the 18th of January last; the resolution of the 4th of April 1690, relating to "the forfeited estates; his Majesty's speech * to
* P. 163, "both Houses, the 5th of January 1690-1;

"the address of the House to the King, the 1700.
"15th of February last; his Majesty's answer
"thereunto, the 26th of the same February; and
"the resolution of the House thereupon; and
"lastly, the address of the House of Com- + P. 235.
"mons of the 4th of March 1692-3, and "his Majesty's answer thereunto, be also re"printed with the report;" and they resolved, "That the procuring or passing exorbitant grants by "any Member now of the Privy-council, or by any "other, that had been a Privy-counsellor, in this "or any former reign, to his use or benefit, was a "high crime and misdemeanor."

In the bill of resumption little regard was shewn to the purchases made under those grants, and to the great improvements made by the purchasers or tenants, which were said to have doubled the value of those estates. However, that some justice might be done both to purchasers and creditors, thirteen Trustees were named, in whom all the forfeited estates were vested, and they had a very great and uncontrollable authority lodged with them, of hearing and determining all just claims, relating to those estates, and of selling them to the best purchasers; and the money, to be raised by this sale, was appropriated to pay the arrears of the army (2). Among all the cases, that of the Earl of Atblane's was the most singular. The House of Commons had been so sensible of his good service in reducing Ireland, that they had made an address to the King, to give him a recompence suitable to his services. And the Parliament of Ireland was so sensible of their obligations to him, that they confirmed this grant of between two and three thousand pounds a year. He had sold it to those, who thought they had purchased under an unquestionable title; yet all that was now set aside, no regard being had to it; so that this estate was thrown into the heap. Some exceptions were made in the bill in favour of some grants, and provision was made for rewarding others, whom the King, as they thought, had not enough considered. Great opposition was made to this by some, who read, because the other four Commissioners, whose conduct was complained of in the letter, had not set their hands to it.

The report was likewise animadverted upon, in a tract intitled, Jus Regium, or the King's Right to grant forfeitures, &c. This author brings down the value of the forfeitures, to 780,000*l.* out of which he deducts all the debts and incumbrances, with three years profits of the lands for the expenses of the trust, and allows, that they will yield 500,000*l.* in Ireland. He gives an instance of the Commissioners over-valuing the lands in the private estate of King James, being a grant to him, when Duke of York, of all the estates of the Regicides. Instead of 95,649 acres, he reduces them to 78,915, and the yearly value from May 1701, when all the old leases are determined, to 8,489*l.* instead of 25,995*l.* subject to the annuities above-mentioned, besides 10,000*l.* in arrears to the Lady Bellaſis. There had been 9,887*l.* received for fines, out of this estate, by Mr. Braderick and Mr. Pooley, which are lost to the tenants by the resumption. The author, in the same manner, examines all the then grants and shews, that the Commissioners were deceived both in the number of acres, and value of the estates. St. Traſts II. 709-713.

(1) Accordingly, on the 7th of March, the Commons resolved, that the sum of 1000*l.* be paid to the Earl of Drogheda, Francis Annesley, John Trenchard, James Hamilton, Henry Langford, and to James Hooper Secretary to the Commissioners; and the sum of five hundred only to Sir Richard Leving and Sir Francis Breaſter, in consideration of their expences; which sums were ordered to be paid out of the Irish forfeitures.

(2) On the 26th of March, the Commons, having considered of the number, qualifications, and manner of choosing the Trustees for the bill of Irish forfeitures, resolved, "That the number of the Trustees be thirteen: That no person be a Trustee, who had any office of profit, or was accountable to his Majesty, or was a Member of this House: And that the Trustees be chosen by balloting." Two days after, the several Members having given in lists of thirteen persons names, which were put into classes, the majority fell upon Francis Annesley, James Hamilton, John Bagge, John Trenchard, James Iham, Henry Langford, James Hooper, Sir Cyril Wyche, John Cary, Sir Henry Sheres, Thomas Harrison, Sir John Warden, William Fellows, and Thomas Rowlinſ. The two last having equal voices, one of them must have been left out; but, the House being informed, that Sir John Warden was a Baron of the Exchequer in the County Palatine of Cheſter during his life, at a yearly salary from the Crown, it was resolved, that Sir John Warden was not capable of being a Trustee in the bill, and so the other two stood.

(1) The

1700. who thought, that all favours and grants ought to be given by the King, and not originally by an House of Parliament; and this was managed with great heat, even by some of those, who concurred in carrying the bill. In conclusion, it was, by a new term, as well as a new invention, consolidated with the money-bill, that was to go for the pay of the fleet and army, and, under the title of a bill, for granting an aid to his Majesty, by the sale of the forfeited and other estates and interests in Ireland, and by a land-tax in England, for the several purposes therein mentioned, was carried up to the House of Lords, which by consequence they must either pass or reject. The method that the Court took in the House of Lords to oppose it, was to offer some alterations, which were indeed very just and reasonable: but, since the Commons would not suffer the Lords to alter money-bills, this was in effect to lose it. The Court, upon some previous votes, found they had a majority among the Lords; so, for some days, it seemed to be designed to lose the bill, and to venture on a prorogation or a dissolution, rather than pass it. The bill being sent down with some alterations to the Commons, they not only disapproved them, but began to fly out into high votes, both against the Ministers and Favourites, and ordered a list of the Privy-council to be laid before them. There were several conferences between the two Houses, in which the Lords strongly insisted on their amendments. The Commons were so exasperated at this, that they ordered the lobby of their House to be cleared of all strangers; the back-doors of the Speaker's chamber to be locked up; and that the Serjeant should stand at the door of the House, and suffer no Members to go forth; and then proceeded to take into consideration the report of the Irish forfeitures, and the list of the Lords of the Privy-council; and a question was moved, That an address be made to his Majesty to remove John Lord Sommers, Lord Chancellor of England, from his presence and councils for ever; but it was carried in the negative by a greater majority, than had appeared at the beginning of the Session.

The Lord Sommers, during these debates, was ill; and the worst construction possible was put upon that; for it was said, that he advised all the opposition, which was made to the bill, in the House of Lords, but that, to keep himself out of it, he feigned that he was ill; though his great attendance, in the Court of Chancery, the House of Lords, and at the Council-table, had so impaired his health, that every year, about that time, he used to be brought very low, and disabled from business. The King seemed resolved to venture on all the ill consequences, that might follow the losing this bill, though they would probably have been very fatal. As far as could be judged, either another Session of that Parliament, or a new one, would have banished the Favourites, and begun the bill anew, with the addition of obliging the Grantees, to refund all the mean profits. Many in the House of Lords, who in all other things were very firm to the King, were for passing this bill, notwithstanding his earnestness against it, since they apprehended the ill consequences, that were like to follow, if it were lost. Bishop Burnet was one of these, and the King was much displeased with him for it. The Bishop said, that he would venture his Majesty's displeasure, rather than please him in that, which he feared would be the ruin of his Government; not apprehending at that time, what injustice lay under many of the clauses in the bill, which appeared afterwards so evidently, that the very same persons who drove on the bill, were convinced of them, and redressed some of them in acts that passed in subsequent Sessions (1).

The King became sullen upon all this, and upon the many incidents, that are apt to fall in upon debates of this nature. He either did not apprehend in what such things might end, or he was not much concerned at it. His resentment, which was much provoked, broke out into some instances, which gave such handles to his enemies, as they wished for; and they improved those advantages, which his ill conduct gave them, with much spite and industry, so as to alienate the nation from him. It was once in agitation among the party, to make an address to him against going beyond sea; but even that was diverted with a malicious design. Hitherto the body of the nation retained a great measure of affection to him. This was beginning to diminish by his going so constantly beyond sea, as soon as the Session of Parliament was ended, though the war was now over. Upon this it grew to be publicly said, that he loved no Englishman's face nor his company. His enemies therefore reckoned it was fit for their ends to let that prejudice increase in the minds of the people, till they might find a proper occasion to ingraft some bad designs upon it.

The same day that the motion was made against the Lord Chancellor Sommers, the Commons resolved, That an address be made to his Majesty, that no person, who was not a native of his Dominions, except his Royal Highness Prince George of Denmark, be admitted to his Majesty's Councils in England or Ireland. But, before this address could be presented, the King came the next day to the House of Peers, and, after passing the bill about the forfeited estates, with several others, commanded the Earl of Bridgewater, who was Speaker of that House in the absence of the Lord Sommers, to prorogue the Parliament to the 23d of May. Thus ended a Session, by the proceedings of which men of all sides were put into a very ill humour (2).

Among the acts of this Session a very remarkable one passed against the Papists. A complaint being made by the Clergy of Lancashire, against the Papists, of Burnet.

(1) The Bishop says, if he had rightly understood that matter in time, he would never have given his vote for so unjust a bill. He only considered it as an hardship put on the King, many of his grants being thus made void, some of which had not been made on good and reasonable considerations, so that they could hardly be excused, much less justified. He thought the thing was a sort of force, to which it seemed reasonable to give way at that time, since the King's friends were not furnished with an equal strength to withstand it. But, when he saw afterwards, what the consequences of this act proved to be, he firmly resolved never to consent again to any tack to a money-bill, as long as he lived.

(2) The King writ the following letter to the Earl of Galway, soon after the prorogation of the Parliament.

1700. of the growth of Popery, and a petition offered for more effectual methods to put a stop to it, a bill was proposed, that obliged all persons educated in that religion, or suspected to be of it, who should succeed to any estate before they were of the age of eighteen, to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and the test, as soon as they came to that age; and, till they did it, the estate was to devolve to the next of kin, that was a Protestant; but was to return back to them, upon their taking the oaths. All Popish Priests were also banished by the bill, and were adjudged to perpetual imprisonment, if they should again return into England; and the reward of an hundred pounds was offered to every one, who should discover a Popish Priest, so as to convict him. Those, who brought this into the House of Commons, hoped, that the Court would have opposed it; but the Court promoted the bill; so, when the party saw their mistake, they seemed willing to let the bill fall; and when that could not be done, they clogged it with many severe and some unreasonable clauses, hoping that the Lords would not pass the act; and it was said, that, if the Lords should make the least alteration in it, they, in the House of Commons, who had it set on, were resolved to let it lie on their table, when it should be sent back to them. Many Lords, who secretly favoured Papists, on the Jacobite account, did, for this very reason, move for several alterations; some of these importing a greater severity; but the zeal against Popery was such in that House, that the bill passed without any amendment, and it had the Royal assent. Bishop Burnet, notwithstanding his principles for Toleration, and against Persecution for conscience-sake, was for this bill.

He had always thought, that, if a Government found any sect in religion incompatible with its quiet and safety, it might, and sometimes ought to send away all of that sect, with as little hardship as possible. This act hurt no man that was in the present possession of an estate; it only incapacitated his next heir, to succeed to that estate, if he continued a Papist; so the danger of this, in case the act should be well looked to, would put those of that religion, who are men of conscience, on the selling their estates; and, in the course of a few years, might deliver us from having any Papists left among us. But this act wanted several necessary clauses, to enforce the due execution of it; the word, next of kin, was very indefinite, and the next of kin was not obliged to claim the benefit of this act, nor did the right descend to the remoter heirs, if the more immediate ones should not take the benefit of it; the test, relating to matters of doctrine and worship, did not seem a proper ground for so great a severity; so this act was not followed nor executed in any sort; but here is a scheme laid, though not fully digested, which on some great provocation, given by those of that religion, may dispose a Parliament to put such clauses in a new act, as may make this effectual.

The Duke of Norfolk, taking advantage of the precedent made the last year, in the case of the Earl of Macclesfield, lodged a bill in the House of Peers, to dissolve his Grace's marriage with the Lady Mary Mordaunt, and to enable him to marry again, which in a few days past both Houses, notwithstanding the opposition of the Dukes of Norfolk (1).

The

Hampton-Court, May 11, 1700.

It is a good while since I writ to you last. The reason is, that being always uncertain of the issue of the last Session of Parliament, I was unwilling to answer any of your letters. You may judge, what vexation all their extraordinary proceedings gave me, and I assure you, your being deprived of what I gave you with so much pleasure, was not the least of my griefs. I hope, however, that I shall be in a condition to acknowledge the good services you have done me, and you may depend upon it, I shall earnestly seek occasions to do so. It ought to be some satisfaction to you, in the just resentment of what concerns you, that no body could blame your conduct; on the contrary, all appeared satisfied with it, and the vote, which passed in anger the last day, concerns you but indirectly. And I can assure you, that you was in no way the occasion of it. There have been so many intrigues, in this last Session, that, without having been on the spot and well informed of every thing, it cannot be conceived. It will be impossible for me to continue the Commission of the Lords Justices in Ireland, as it is at present; so I have resolved to send thither the Duke of Shrewsbury as Viceroy, and that you command the army under him. Do not think that this will be a degradation, no body here will take it to be so, and I know that every one wishes it, and believes it absolutely necessary for my service. I am fully persuaded, as I hope, that you will not refuse to accept of this command, nor relinquish my service. I assure you, I never had more occasion, than at present, of persons of your capacity and fidelity. I hope I shall find opportunities to give you marks of my esteem and friendship, and I would not engage you in this, were I not assured that no hurt can happen to you from it: But I know it will meet with a general approbation, and doubt not your friends will say the same, and I am glad to tell you, you have a great many and among all parties.

William R.

The Duke of Shrewsbury refusing to go to Ireland, there was no change made in the Government, till the King's return from Holland.

(1) The Duke had applied to the House of Lords, in the year 1694, for a divorce, which occasioned great and long debates; and on which Bishop Burnet thus remarks: In the latter ages of Popery, when marriage was reckoned among the Sacraments, an opinion grew to be received, that adultery did not break the bond, and that it could only intitle to a separation, but not such a dissolution of the marriage, as gave the party, that was injured, a right to marry again: This became the rule of the Spiritual Courts; though there was no definition made about it, before the Council of Trent. At the time of the Reformation, a suit of this nature was prosecuted by the Marquis of Northampton: The marriage was dissolved, and he married a second time; but he found it necessary to move for an act of Parliament, to confirm this subsequent marriage: In the reformation of the ecclesiastical laws, that was prepared by Cranmer and others, in King Edward's time, a rule was laid down, allowing of a second marriage, upon a divorce for adultery. This matter had lain asleep above an hundred years, till the present Duke of Rutland, then Lord Ross, moved for the like liberty. At that time a sceptical and libertine spirit prevailed, so that some began to treat marriage, only as civil contract, in which the Parliament was at full liberty to make what laws they pleased; and most of King Charles's Courtiers applauded this, hoping by this doctrine, that the King might be divorced from the Queen. The greater part of the Bishops apprehending the consequence of the Lord Ross's act

1700. The Session being ended (as was observed) so much to the dissatisfaction of all parties, the leaders of the Tories seemed resolved to push a change of Ministry. They began with insinuating to the Favourites the necessity of the King's removing the Lord Sommers, who, as he was now considered as the head of the Whigs, so his wife counsels, and his modest way of laying them before the King, had gained him a great share of his esteem and confidence; and it was reckoned, that the chief strength of the party lay in his credit with the King, and in the prudent methods he took to govern the party, and to moderate that heat and those jealousies, with which the King had been so long disgusted, in the first years of his reign. Every method had been tried for his removal. He had, in the first place, been particularly charged in the House of Commons, for turning many Gentlemen out of the Commission of the Peace (1). This was much aggravated, and raised a very high complaint against him; but there was no just cause for it: When the design of the assassination and invasion, in the years 1695 and 1696, was discovered, a voluntary association was entered into, by both Houses of Parliament, and that was set round the nation: In such a time of danger, it was thought, that those, who did not enter voluntarily into it, were so ill affected, or at least so little zealous for the King, that it was not fit they should continue Justices of the Peace: So an order passed in Council, that all those, who had so refused, should be turned out of the Commission: He had obeyed this order, upon the representations made to him, by the Lords Lieutenants and the Custodes Rotulorum of the several counties, who were not equally discreet: Yet he laid those representations before the Council, and had a special order for every person that was so turned out. All this was now magnified, and it was charged on him, that he had advised and procured these orders; yet this could not be made so much as a colour to proceed against him, a clamour and murmuring was all that could be raised from it. This method not having produced any great effects, another had been tried. It had been endeavoured to raise a dissatisfaction against him by appeals from many of his judgments, yet very few of them received alteration, and his character was raised instead of being hurt by these attacks (2). After these and other Methods of shaking Lord Sommers's credit

might have, opposed every step that was made in it; though many of them were persuaded, that, in the case of adultery, when it was fully proved, a second marriage might be allowed. In the Duke of Norfolk's case, as the Lady was a Papist, and a busy Jacobite, so a great Party appeared for her. All that favoured the Jacobites, and those who were thought engaged in lewd practices, espoused her concern with a zeal that did themselves little honour. Their number was such, that no progress could be made in the bill, though the proofs were but too full, and too plain. But the main question was, Whether, supposing the matter fully proved, the Duke of Norfolk should be allowed a second marriage? The Bishops were desired to deliver their opinions, with their reasons: All those who had been made during the present reign, were of opinion, that a second marriage in that case was lawful, and conformable, both to the words of the gospel, and to the doctrine of the primitive Church; and that the contrary opinion was started in the late and dark ages: But all the Bishops, that had been made by the two former Kings, were of another opinion, though some of them could not well tell why they were so. Here was a colour for men who looked at things superficially, to observe that there was a difference of opinion between the last made Bishops, and those of an elder standing: From which they inferred, that we were departing from the received doctrine of our Church; and, upon that topic, the Earl of Rochester charged us very vehemently. The bill was let fall at this time. An Act passed this Session for continuing the old East-India Company a corporation. The Company, finding that their friends prevailed in the House of Commons, took the opportunity of getting a bill brought in their favour; which, notwithstanding the opposition of the new Company, and the endeavours of the Court, passed both Houses, and received the Royal assent.

Another incident happened this Session. The Rev. Mr. Stephens, preaching before the House of Commons, on the 30th of January, instead of aggravating, seemed to vindicate the putting King Charles to death, and endeavoured to persuade his auditors, that the observation of that day should be abolished. This produced, instead of thanks, an order, That, for the future, no person should preach before the House, that was not a Dean or Doctor of Divinity.

(1) With a view to him, it was that a bill was set on in the House of Commons, qualifying Justices of the peace; and a Committee appointed to inspect the Commissions of the peace and Commissions for Deputy-Lieutenants, as they now stand, and as they were for seven years last past. This Committee having made their report to the House, that not only many persons dissenting from the Church of England, but men of small fortunes, and who consequently had an entire dependence on the Court, were put into those places, the Commons on the 26th of March resolved, "That an address be made to his Majesty, that it would much conduce to the service of his Majesty and the good of this Kingdom, that Gentlemen of quality and good estates be restored and put into the Commissions of the peace and Lieutenancy; and that men of small estates be neither continued nor put into the Commissions." Which address being presented the King by the whole House, he told them, "That he was of opinion, that Men of the best quality and estates were most proper to be intrusted in the Commissions of the peace and Lieutenancy; and that directions should be given accordingly."

(2) Among these appeals, one case in particular, commonly called the Bankers case, which had given occasion to clamour, because of the extensive consequences following the determination in regard to the property of large numbers, was brought before the House of Lords, the final resort both in law and equity. It is well known in what manner King Charles had mortgaged the whole revenue of the Crown to the Bankers for an immense debt, and paid them interest at the rate of 8 per cent, while those who intrusted the Bankers, received only 6 per cent. In the year 1672, the Exchequer payments were stopped, and multitudes ruined. About five years after, he granted his letters patent to all persons concerned for the annual pension of 6 per cent, out of the hereditary excise, given by Parliament instead of the wards and liveries 12 Cb. II. and upon the principal sums due to them, on delivering up their securities, and accepting proportionable assignments in satisfaction of their debts. The payments were made regularly by virtue of those letters patent down to Lady-Day 1683, and then no more issued for the remainder of King Charles's reign, the whole reign of King James, and for three quarters of a year from after the Revolution, when a suit was instituted in the Court of Exchequer, praying the aid of it to enforce the payment of the arrears and growing sums, at the receipt, agreeable to the terms of the letters patent. The two principal questions stated in the arguments were,

1. Whether the grants made by King Charles II. of the several annual sums of the hereditary excise to the Goldsmiths, their heirs and assigns, were effectual in law, and did charge this revenue, in time of his successors.

2. Whe-

1700. had failed, the Tories now studied to get it infused into the King, that all the hard things, that had been of late put on him by the Parliament, were occasioned by the hatred that was borne to his Ministers; and that, if his Majesty would change hands, and employ others, matters might be softened and mended in another Parliament. With this the Earl of Jersey endeavoured to possess the Earl of Albemarle; and the uneasiness the King was in, disposed him to think, that, if he should bring in a set of Tories into his business, they would serve him with the same zeal, and with better success, than the Whigs had done; and he hoped to throw all upon the Ministers, that were now to be dismissed.

2. Whether the remedy, pursued by the parties in the cause, was warranted by the law or course of the Exchequer? The Chief Baron and two others were of opinion with the Bankers in both these points. Baron Lechmere differed in both.

Upon this judgment, a writ of error came before the Lord Keeper in the Exchequer chamber, who called the Judges to his assistance. It was solemnly argued by each of them. And they all agreed as to the first, that the letters patent were binding in law: That the King has power to alien or charge those revenues, of which he is seized in fee, without an act of Parliament: That the custom of Excise was purchased by him, for a valuable consideration, that is, accepted in lieu of the profits arising from the wards and liveries. As to the objection, that this power of alienating may be a prejudice to the people, the law entertains no such dishonourable thoughts of the King, as to suppose, he will act wrong in the things submitted to his power. That the objection is repugnant to the constitution of the Government. Suppose the realm should be in present danger of invasion, if the King could not raise money by aliening his revenue, the nation must perish; and therefore, Kings of England have formerly borrowed several sums of money, by mortgaging their lands. That it has been the constant usage of our Princes to reward deserving Ministers out of the Crown revenues, which proceeds on the great maxim, that reward is one of the main pillars of Government. As to the distinction taken between alienating the antient demesne lands derived to the King, either by descent or purchase, and this revenue of excise settled by Parliament, and therefore unalienable, it was said, the law restrained not the King from aliening any species of his revenue: That the land in antient demesne seemed most appropriate to the King's use of all his revenues, because they had several privileges relating to the King; as not to be impleaded out of the manor, to be free of toll for all things concerning their sustenance and husbandry, not to be impanelled on any inquest; and yet even these were alienable: Then what reason can be assigned, why some estates should be aliened, and some not? Why may not the King as well alien these estates, as they might formerly the flowers of his Crown, a County Palatine with Royal rights. An estate, settled on a subject by act of Parliament, is subject to his alienation, Why not in the case of the King? It appears in fact, that all the monastery lands given by act of Parliament, and that by general words, as in this law which settled the hereditary excise, were aliened by the King. So the customs have always been granted and charged in like manner, without controversy. As to the objection that the excise was given instead of unalienable inheritances, as wards, liveries, and purveyances, it was said, that it did not appear how the nature of one kind of inheritance could affect another: But even these were in effect alienable, because they might have been released, as were sometimes services in capite. That Porteus, de Laudibus Legum Angliæ, expressly disavowing of the restraints laid upon the Crown, would not have omitted to mention the unalienable nature of the re-

The first time that the Lord Sommers recovered so much health, as to come to Court, the King told him, That it seemed necessary for his service, that he should part with the Seals; and he wished, that he would make the delivering them up his own act. Upon this, the Lord Sommers took the liberty to speak freely to the King, in words to this effect: That he very well knew what his enemies aimed at, by their abusing and persecuting him as they had of late done: The Seal was his greatest crime; and, if he quitted that, he should be forgiven; but, knowing what ill use would be made of it, if it were put into their hands, he was resolved, with his Majesty's permission, to keep it in defiance of their malice, and to stand all the trials they should venue, if this point had not been clearly admitted: Especially as there were so many grants made in Henry VIth's time, and to many acts of resumption, which are a demonstration that those grants could not be revoked but by act of Parliament.

To the second point, all the Judges, except Treby, Chief Justice, and Lechmere, were of opinion, that the remedy was legal, and they relied intirely upon two precedents in Plowden's commentaries, Sir Thomas Wroth's case, and Sir H. Neville's case, in the Exchequer; upon which those proceedings had been formed. The one was the demand of an annuity, granted to Sir Thomas Wroth by Henry VIII. out of the treasury, in the hands of the treasurer of the Court of Augmentations, under the seal of that Court: The other, of a rent charge issuing out of the lands, subject to the survey of the same Court, and payable there. Judgment had been given for the parties in like manner, as in the present case.

My Lord Chief Justice Treby applied himself to shew, that these two cases were founded upon particular reasons, and not upon the Common Law, or course of the Exchequer. By the statute 27 Henry VIII. c. 27. all lands purchased, or to be purchased by Henry VIII. were put under the jurisdiction of that Court; that the lands, in Sir H. Neville's case, came within this statute; and by an act passed 1 Mary, and the Queen's letters patent subsequent, this Court and all its powers were united to that of the Exchequer. That it proceeded in a summary way, and partly in nature of a Court of Equity.

Baron Lechmere said in the Exchequer, that Lord Hale had formerly declared, these precedents were not to be urged as precedents of the jurisdiction of the Exchequer, in things properly and originally of its own cognizance.

Lord Chief Justice Holt endeavoured to answer this reasoning, first, by shewing, from a determination in Dyer, 4 Elizabeth, that the Court of Augmentations was never united to the Exchequer, and that Queen Mary, subsequent to the act in the 1st of her reign, having by her letters patent of one day dissolved that Court, and, by her letters patent of the next, united the same to the Exchequer; the second letters patent came too late, and were void. Consequently, there was no accension of power to the Exchequer, and the revenues of the Court of Augmentations fell naturally under its Government; and, therefore, Sir Thomas Wroth, and Sir H. Neville, came to the Court of Exchequer, as to an original Court of Revenue. Secondly, that, admitting it to be true, the Court of Augmentations was united, yet it did not appear, that the Court of Augmentations had any especial powers, to give relief to Grantees of annuities and rents; that the act, by which it was erected, made it a Court of Record and a Court of Revenue, to such and such lands: Whence it seemed to follow, that in the Court of Augmentations, as of Wards and Surveyors, such relief was given by a right incident to it, as a Court of Revenue; and in imitation of what the Exchequer, the old Court of Revenue, could do before, by the common Law.

1700. should put upon him, with the support of his innocence, and the hopes of being serviceable to his Majesty: He feared them not; and did not doubt, but, if his Majesty would be as firm to his friends as they would be to him, they should be able to carry whatever points he had in view for the public welfare, in a new Parliament. The King shook his head a little, as a sign of his

Lord Sommers delivered his opinion in the month of June 1696, and confined his reasonings intirely to the second question. He set himself very elaborately to shew, that the remedy pursued by the parties was illegal, and might be attended with the utmost danger to the disposal of the public revenue, and treasure of the Crown, of which the law has always had a superlative care, as that on which the safety of the King and Kingdom must in all ages depend. To the first argument of Lord Holt, he answered, that the statute 1 Mary, c. 10. did empower the Queen to dissolve the Court of Augmentations, and to unite the Court so dissolved, to that of the Exchequer by letters patent, both parts of which power she literally pursued. That on a subject of philosophy, or speaking of the natural existence of things, it would be absurd to say, what is annihilated one day, shall have yet such an existence as to be united to any thing, the day following: But speaking on a legal subject, where fictions and relations and conclusions have place, nothing could be of more easy or obvious conception. He said, every thing ought to be expounded favourably in support of the Queen's intention, in following the express directions of an act of Parliament; and that the statute 1 Elizabeth, c. 4. did, fully and in terms, declare the validity of this union. To the second he answered, both from undoubted maxims of law, and accurate deductions of precedents; he shewed, that anciently the Barons of the Exchequer did at no time before the union of the Courts of Augmentations, and first fruits, both erected by Henry the VIIIth, give relief to Grantees of rents or annuities in this manner, immediately upon application to them. That the party used previously to apply to the King by petition of right, and the Treasurer and Barons were authorized by the Great or Privy Seal, or by special indorsement upon the petition, giving them power to examine into the demand; but even then their determination had no other effect than that of a certificate, nor could enforce the payment. The warrant for the payment, to be made at the receipt of the Exchequer, must be obtained from the King, under the Great or Privy Seal. Therefore this jurisdiction could not be originally incident, in notion of law, to a Court of Revenue as such. That the Court of Exchequer, indeed, after the transfer of the powers of the Court of Augmentations and first fruits, did exercise them to the several purposes, and in respect of the lands, before under the survey of those Courts: From whence the inference was plain, not that those Courts in exercising these powers pursued the course of the Exchequer, but the Exchequer, in taking a new course after the union, did act according to their manner, and supply their place. That, had it not been so, the erection of those Courts had been vain at first, because the Exchequer could have done the business as well. He then shewed, in what manner Henry the VIIIth, affecting power, and having great designs, endeavoured to get some parts of the revenue more immediately under his private and personal direction, than the old regular constitution of the Exchequer would allow. To that end, he procured acts of Parliament in different years of his reign, erecting the Court of General Surveyors, the Court of First Fruits and Tenths, and the Court of Augmentations. The first and last of these, in the 38th year of his reign, were incorporated; and, in the first of Queen Mary, were annexed to the Exchequer. He proved that such a jurisdiction, as that now contended for, was unknown to every author who had written on the Court of Exchequer, unwarranted by the oath of the Barons, by any authorities in the law books, by any records or statutes. That it supposed a direct absurdity in the constitution of the Court, because it invested them with a power of commanding their superior officers: That to say they can command the Treasurer by their judgment,

when that very judgment is under the review and correction of the Treasurer, who is co-ordinate in the Exchequer chamber with the Lord Chancellor, is a manifest inconsistency. He said, it contradicted sacred and received principles of law, 1. That no part of the King's treasure can be issued, but by warrant under the Great or Privy Seal; for which reason the law has placed such a guard upon them, as to make the counterfeiting of them high-treason. 2. That, when once money is paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, no Court has power to intermeddle with it. In the last place, he relied much on the inconvenience, no inconsiderable argument in law. That the Barons of the Exchequer cannot, as such, be constant of the necessities of the state; and though they were, and knew them to be ever so pressing, they can only act according to one rule; and, if the King's treasure must be issued by warrant under their Seal, on the demand and application of the subject, a pension granted upon no consideration, or a very ill one, might perhaps be paid out of the money which ought to be employed, and possibly was provided by Parliament, for setting out a fleet, resisting an invasion, or suppressing a rebellion. That to deny the King the power of ordering the payments out of his own coffers, was to deny him that which is in every subject's power. It is to take from him the judgment of public necessities, or at least the means of relieving them.

This argument of Lord Sommers was printed in the year 1733, and is much admired for the inimitable elegance of the style and method, and for its comprehension and learning. It may be added, that it is not only esteemed one of the finest performances in the law, but has satisfied very able Lawyers of the legality of his judgment; so that the publication of it did as much justice to his integrity, as honour to his parts. It is said, that, in the making of it, the search of records and precedents cost him 700*l*. After this debate and consideration of the matter, he reversed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer on his own opinion, supported by that of Chief Justice Treby, who was one of the greatest men of his time, and Baron Lechmere, who had been an able practitioner in the Exchequer above sixty years, against the opinion of all the rest.

On the 6th of December 1699, there was an appeal from the determination to the House of Lords, and, after hearing Council and the sentiments of the Judges, a day was set apart for debating it. Lord Sommers, with his usual modesty and candour, opened his reasons to the House, and some Lords, in an unprecedented manner, called upon Holt, Chief Justice, to answer him, though a Peer of their own body, and Chancellor. But Sommers, not daunted by that peculiar circumstance, replied upon Holt with great spirit and energy. The judgment however was reversed on the 23d of January, and a Protest entered. No liberate or warrant for payment issued upon this reversal; but in the same Session an act passed to apply the revenue of excise, as a security for 820,000*l*. and a weekly payment of 3,700*l*. to the Civil List, on account of the necessity of affairs, subject, at the same time, to the charge of an annual payment of three per cent. on the whole principal due to the Bankers, from and after the 26th of December 1705, which principal was made redeemable on payment of a moiety. This case, in respect of the unhappy persons who had intrusted the Bankers with their money, deserved all that compassion, with which it was popular to treat it in those times; but the Bankers had made an unjust and extorsive profit from the Crown, and the iniquitous extravagance of King Charles's court had been the source of the calamity. 5 *Med. 1700. his diffidence, and only said, It must be so (1). However, the Lord Sommers persisted in refusing to deliver up the Seals as his own act. All his friends had pressed him not to offer them, since that seemed to shew fear or guilt. He begged therefore the King's pardon, if in this he followed their advice; but he told his Majesty, whenever he should send a warrant under his hand, commanding him to deliver them up, he would immediately obey it. The order was accordingly brought by Lord Jersey on the 17th of April 1700, and upon it the Seals were sent to the King. Thus the Lord Sommers was discharged from this great office, which he had held seven years with a high reputation for capacity, integrity, and diligence. His being thus removed was much censured by all, but those who procured it. Our Princes used not to dismiss Ministers, who served them well, unless they were pressed to it by a House of Commons, that refused to give Money, till they were laid aside. But here a Minister, who was always vindicated by a great majority in the House of Commons, when he was charged there, and who had served both with fidelity and success, and was indeed censured for nothing so much as for his being compliant with the King's humour and notions, or at least for being too soft or too feeble in representing his errors to him, was removed without a shadow of complaint against him. This was done with so much haste, that those, who had prevailed with the King to do it, had not yet concerted, who should succeed him. They thought, that all the great men of the law were aspiring to that high post, so that any one, to whom it should be offered, would certainly accept it; but they soon found they were mistaken; for, what by reason of the instability of the Court, what by reason of the just apprehensions men might have of succeeding to great a man, both the Lord Chief Justice Holt (2), and the Attorney-General Trevor, to whom the Seals were offered, excused themselves. It was Term-time, so that a vacancy in that post put things in some confusion. A temporary Commission was granted to the three Chief Judges, to sit in the Court of Chancery; and, on the 21st of May, the Seals were at last given, with the title of Lord-Keeper, to Sir Nathan Wright, one of the King's Serjeants at law, in whom there was nothing equal to the post, much less to him, who had lately filled it. The King's inclinations seemed now turned to the Tories, and to a new Parliament. It was for some time in the dark, who had the confidence, and gave directions to affairs; and those, who looked on, were often disposed to think, that there was no direction at all, but that every thing was left to take its course, and that all was given up to hazard.

Besides the affairs of England, the remonstrances of the Scots India Company extremely perplexed the King. Upon news of their ill success at Darien, for want of assistance from the English Plantations, a petition for a present Session of Parliament was immediately sent about the Kingdom, and was signed by many thousands. This was sent up by some of the chief of their Nobility, whom the King received very coldly: Yet a Session of Parliament was granted them, to which the Duke of Queensbury was sent down Commissioner. Great pains were taken, by all sorts of practices, to be sure of a majority; great offers were made them in order to lay the discontents, which ran then very high; a law for a Habeas Corpus, with a great freedom for trade, and every thing, that they could demand, was offered, to persuade them to desist, from pursuing the design upon Darien. The Court had tried to get the Parliament of England to interpose in that matter, and to declare themselves against that undertaking. The House of Lords was prevailed on to make an address to the King, representing the ill effects that they apprehended from that settlement: But this did not signify much, for, as it was carried in that House by a small majority of seven or eight, so it was laid aside by the Commons. Some were not ill pleased to see the King's affairs run into an embroilment; and others did apprehend, that there was a design to involve the two Kingdoms in a national quarrel, that, by such an artifice, a greater army might be raised; so they let the matter fall. Nor would they give entertainment to a bill which the Lords passed, and sent up to them about the union of the two nations, under the title of a bill, for authorizing certain Commissioners of the Realm of England to treat with the Commissioners of Scotland, for the weal of both Kingdoms. To this bill the Commons refused to give their concurrence. The managers in that House, who opposed the Court, resolved to do nothing that should provoke Scotland, or take off from the King any part of the blame and discontent, which soured that nation (3). On the contrary, it was given out, in order to raise the national disgust still higher, that the opposition, which the King gave to the Scots colony, flowed neither from a regard to the interests of England, nor to the treaties with Spain, but from a care of the Dutch, who from Curacao carried on a coasting trade among the Spanish Plantations with great advantage; which, it was said, the Scots Colony, if once well settled, would draw wholly from them. These things were sent about

(1) A Gentleman, who had this from the Lord Sommers's own mouth, told it to Mr. Oldmixon.

(2) Mr. Prior, in a letter to the Earl of Manchester, dated at Hampton-Court, May 2. 1700, and printed among Mr. Cole's Memoirs, page 128, says thus: My Lord Chief Justice Holt, having been here to-day, and with the King in private, has given people occasion to say, that he has refused the Seals. If it be so or not, I cannot say, but as yet the Seals are not disposed of.

(3) However, some time before a complaint was made to the House of Commons of a printed book, intitled, An inquiry into the causes of the miscarriage of the Scots Colony at Darien, and the House, having examined the said book, resolved, That it, highly reflecting on the honour of his Majesty, and both Houses of Parliament, and tending to create jealousies and animosities between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, was a false, scandalous, and traitorous libel; ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, and addressed his Majesty to issue out his Royal proclamation, for the discovering and apprehending the author, printer, and publisher of the said libel: Which proclamation was published accordingly.

1700. about Scotland with great industry. The management was chiefly in the hands of Jacobites. Neither the King nor his Ministers were treated with the decencies, that are sometimes observed, even after subjects have run to arms. The keenest of their rage was pointed at the King himself. Next him the Earl of Portland, who had still the direction of their affairs, had a large share in it. In the Session of the Scotch Parliament, in order to make the affair of Darien a national concern, it was voted, "That the Colony of Caledonia in Darien was a legal and rightful settlement, and that the Parliament would maintain and support the same." Upon that, the Session was for some time discontinued. When the news of the total abandoning of Darien was brought over, it cannot be well expressed, into how bad a temper this cast that body of that people. They had now lost almost two hundred thousand pounds sterling upon this project, besides all the imaginary treasure, which they had promised themselves from it. The nation was therefore raised into a sort of fury upon it; and, in the first heat, an address was sent about the Kingdom for hands, representing to the King the necessity of a present sitting of the Parliament, which was drawn in so high a strain, as if they resolved to pursue the effects of it, by an armed force. It was signed by a great majority of the Members of Parliament, and the ferment in men's spirits was so raised, that few thought it could have been curbed, without breaking forth into great extremities (1).

June 11. This address being presented to the King by the Lord Ross, who, with some others, was deputed by the Parliament for that purpose, his Majesty told them, "That he could give no answer at that time to their petition, but they should know his intentions in Scotland."

The Addressers, finding that the Parliament was further adjourned by proclamation, and not knowing how soon it might be allowed to sit, framed the draught of a second national address, to be signed by the several Shires and Boroughs throughout the Kingdom: But, while the same was carried on, his Majesty writ a letter, directed to the Duke of Queensbury, and the Privy-council, which letter was published in the manner of a proclamation, and wherein the King declared, "That, if it had been possible for him to have agreed to the resolve offered to assert the right of the African Company's Colony in America, though that method seemed to him unnecessary, yet his Majesty had from the beginning readily done it, at the earnest desires of his Ministers, and for his People's satisfaction, all other considerations set apart; but, since that things were much changed, his Majesty being truly sorry for the nation's loss,

"and most willing to grant what might be needful for the relief and ease of the Kingdom, he assured them, that he would be so ready to concur with his Parliament, in every thing that could be reasonably expected of him, for aiding and supporting their interests, and repairing their losses, that his good subjects should have just grounds to be sensible of his hearty inclinations to advance the wealth and prosperity of that his Majesty's ancient Kingdom." That his Majesty was confident, that that declaration would be satisfying to all good men, who would certainly be careful both of their own preservation, and of the honour and interest of the Government, and not to suffer themselves to be misled, nor give any advantage to enemies and ill designing persons, ready to catch hold of any opportunity, as their practices did too manifestly witness. Concluding, "That his Majesty's necessary absence had occasioned the late adjournment, but, as soon as God should bring him back, he was fully resolved his Parliament should meet."

While the Parliament was sitting, there was a second treaty of Partition concluded between England, France, and Holland. The former treaty, made in favour of the Electoral Prince of Bavaria, was intirely defeated by his death. That young Prince seemed marked out for great things, and had all the promising beginnings that could be expected in a child of seven years old, when he fell sick, and was carried off the third or fourth day of his illness; so uncertain are all the prospects, and all the hopes this world can give. Now the Dauphin and the Emperor were to dispute, or to divide this succession between them; so a new treaty was set on foot: It was generally given out, and too easily believed, that the King of France was grown weary of war, and was resolved to pass the rest of his days in peace and quiet; but that he could not consent to the exaltation of the House of Austria; yet, if that House was set aside, he would yield up the Dauphin's pretensions; and so the Duke of Savoy was much talked of, but it was with the prospect of having his hereditary dominions yielded up to the Crown of France: But this great matter came to another digestion a few months after.

The King and the States-General saw the danger, to which they would be exposed, if they should engage in a new war, while the nation was yet under the vast debts that the former had brought upon it. The King's Ministers in the House of Commons assured him, that it would be a very difficult thing to bring them to enter into a new war for maintaining the rights of the House of Austria. During the debates concerning the army, when some mentioned the danger of that Monarchy falling into

(1) In this address they complained, of their having been interrupted by a sudden adjournment, while they were debating a motion concerning their Colony at Darien, which they conceived was not agreeable to the 40th act of the 11th Parliament of King James VI, wherein it is enacted, That nothing should be done or commanded, which might directly or indirectly prejudice the liberty of free voting, and reasoning of the Estates of Parliament. That, by a subsequent adjournment of twenty days, the Parliament was not permitted to come to any resolution in the pressing concerns of the nation, which they could not think consistent with that article of their claim of right, whereby it was declared, That for the redress of all grievances, strengthening and preserving of the laws, Parliaments ought to be frequently called and allowed to sit, and the freedom of speech and debate secured to the Members. Wherefore they earnestly intreated his Majesty, that he would be pleased to allow his Parliament to meet on the day to which it was then adjourned; and to sit as long as might be necessary for redressing the grievances of the nation.

into the hands of a Prince of the House of Bourbon, it was set up for a maxim, that it would be of no consequence to the affairs of Europe, who was King of Spain, whether a Frenchman or a German; and that, as soon as the Successor should come within Spain, he would become a true Spaniard, and be governed by the maxims and interests of that crown; so that there was no prospect of being able to infuse into the nation an apprehension of the consequence of that succession. The Emperor had a very good claim; but, as he had little strength to support it by land, so he had none at all by sea; and his treasure was quite exhausted by his long war with the Turks. The French drew a great force towards the Frontiers of Spain, and they were resolved to march into it upon that King's death. There was no strength to oppose them, yet they seemed willing to compound the matter. But they said, the consideration must be very valuable, that could make them desist from so great a pretension; and both the King and the States thought it was a good bargain, if, by yielding up some of the less important branches of that Monarchy, they could save those in which they were most concerned, which were Spain itself, the West-Indies, and the Netherlands. The French seemed willing to accept of the dominions in and about Italy, with a part of the Kingdom of Navarre; and to yield up the rest to the Emperor's second son, the Archduke Charles. The Emperor entered into the treaty, for he saw he could not hope to carry the whole succession intire; but he pressed to have the Duchy of Milan added to his hereditary dominions in Germany. The expedient that the King proposed, was, that the Duke of Lorraine should have the Duchy of Milan, and that France should accept of Lorraine instead of it. He was the Emperor's nephew, and would be intirely in his interests. The Emperor did not agree to this, but yet he pressed the King not to give over the treaty, but to try if he could make a better bargain for him; and above all things recommended secrecy; for he well knew how much the Spaniards would be offended, if any treaty should be owned, that might bring on a dismembering of their Monarchy. For, though they were taking no care to preserve it in whole or in part, yet they could not bear the having any branch torn from it. The King reckoned, that the Emperor, with the other Princes of Italy, might have so much interest in Rome, as to stop the Pope's giving the investiture of the Kingdom of Naples; and, which way soever that matter might end, it would oblige the Pope to shew great partiality, either to the House of Austria, or the House of Bourbon; which might occasion a breach among them, with other consequences, that might be very happy to the whole Protestant interest. Any war that might follow in Italy, would be at a great distance from us, and in a country that we had no reason to regard much: Besides that, the fleets of England and Holland must come, in conclusion, to be the arbiters of the matter.

These were the King's secret motives for entering into the treaty; most of which he communicated to Bishop Burnet. Accordingly the treaty was signed at London and the League; the English Plenipotentiaries being the Earls of Portland and Jersey. By this treaty that of Ryswick was solemnly confirmed; and, in case his Catholic Majesty should die without children, the Dauphin was to have, for himself and his heirs, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and also the islands on the Italian coast belonging to Spain, namely, St. Stefano, Porto Hercole, Orbistello, Telamone, Porto Longone, and Piombino, the city and marquissate of Final, and the province of Guipuscoa. The Dauphin was likewise to have the Duchies of Lorraine and Bar; and the Duchy of Milan was to be given to the Duke of Lorraine and his heirs, in lieu of Lorraine and Bar; but the County of Bilche was to remain in sovereignty to the Prince of Vaudemont. The Archduke Charles was to have, for himself and his heirs, the Kingdom of Spain, and all that belonged to it, in and out of Europe. The Emperor was to have three months time given him to come into this treaty: And, in case the Archduke should die without children, the succession was to go to some other child of the Emperor, to whom he should be pleased to give it, except him, who should be Emperor or King of the Romans: And this part of the Monarchy of Spain was also never to go to the Prince who should be either King of France, or Dauphin (1). What reception this treaty met with from the Princes

(1) The secret article of this treaty, inserted by Mr. Cole, in his Memoirs of the Affairs of State, p. 113. was as follows:

"His Britannic Majesty, his Most Christian Majesty, and the Lords the States-General, having a desire to prevent a war, which might be occasioned by the death of the King of Spain without children, have agreed on a treaty about the Succession; which was signed at London the 21st of February, O. S. and at the Hague the 25th of March, 1700, N. S. And, as it is laid in the fourth article of the said treaty, That the Duchies of Lorraine and Bar shall be yielded to the Dauphin, in exchange for the Duchy of Milan, which should be given to the Duke of Lorraine; and, as the two Kings and the States-General think that nothing is more proper for the ends proposed, they will make use of all their interests, either jointly or separately, to engage the said Duke of Lorraine to consent to it.

"But, as it is necessary to determine who shall be the Prince, to whom the Duchy of Milan shall be committed, and what shall be given to the Dauphin

"for reparation, in the room of the Duchies of Lorraine and Bar, if, against all likelihood, the Duke of Lorraine would not give his consent to this exchange, notwithstanding the good offices and continual applications repeated, during the life of the King of Spain, or to the time hereunder agreed to, after his death; the said two Kings and the States-General, above-named, have agreed, that, in that case, his Britannic Majesty and the States-General shall chuse one of these alternatives, at the end of the said term, after the death of his Catholic Majesty, that is, to confer the Duchy of Milan into the hands of the Elector of Bavaria, to enjoy it for him, his children, males or females, his heirs, successors and descendants, males or females, born, or to be born, for ever, in intire property and full possession; or, ordering, in exchange, Navarre to the Dauphin, to enjoy it, he and his children, males and females; his heirs, successors, or descendants, born, and to be born, in intire property, and full possession; or, instead of Navarre, the City and Duchy of Lucemburg, and the County of Chiny.

1700. Princes and States, to whom it was offered, will hereafter be shewn; and also what a most perfidious use of it was made by the French, to alienate the Spaniards from their Allies, and obtain a will in favour of the Duke of Anjou; tho' both the French King and Dauphin had bound themselves not to accept any will, testament, or donation, contrary to the treaty: The original of which, signed by the Dauphin, Bishop Burnet has in his hands. No mention was made of this treaty, during the Session of Parliament; for, though the King was generally believed, yet, as it was not publicly owned, no notice could be taken of bare reports: And nothing was to be done, in pursuance of this treaty, during the King of Spain's life.

Honours and promotions. The King, that he might give some content to the nation, stayed at Hampton-Court till July, before he went abroad. On the 14th of May, he bestowed the Garter on the Earl of Albemarle; which, 'tis pretended, gave great offence. The same honour was also conferred on the Earl of Pembroke, Lord President of the Council. Towards the latter end of June, the Earl of Jersey was made Chamberlain of the Household; which had been some time vacant, by the Duke of Shrewsbury's resignation. The Earl of Romey was made Groom of the Stole, and the Earl of Carlisle one of the Lords of the Bed-chamber. Soon after this, the King, having nominated the Lords Justices to govern in his absence (1), set out for Holland.

The King goes to Holland. July 4. About three weeks after his arrival there, he received the surprising and melancholy news of the death of the Duke of Gloucester, which was in a great measure occasioned by the solemnity of his birth-day, on the 24th of July. After the ceremony was over, the Duke found himself fatigued and indisposed, and the next day he was very sick, and complained of his throat. The third day he was hot and feverish. Next morning, after bleeding, he thought himself better; but in the evening, his fever appearing more violent, a blister was applied to him, and other proper remedies administered. The same day a rash appeared on his skin, which increasing the next day, more blisters were laid on. In the afternoon the fever growing stronger, his Highness fell into a delirium, which continued till his death. He passed the night, as he did the preceding, in short broken sleeps and incoherent talk. On the 29th, the blisters having taken effect, and the pulse mending, the Physicians, who attended him, thought it probable, that he might recover; but about eleven at night, he was on a sudden seized with a difficult breathing, and could swallow nothing, so that he expired before midnight, being ten years and five days old. He was the only remaining child of seventeen, whom the Princess of Denmark had born, some to the full time, and the rest before it. She attended him, during his sickness, with great tenderness, but with a grave composedness, that amazed all who saw it; and she bore his death with a resignation and piety, that were indeed very singular. Bishop Burnet had been trusted with his education now two years, and the Duke had made an amazing progress. He had read over part of the Scriptures with him, and had explained things, that fell in his way, very copiously, and was often surprized with his questions, and the reflections that he made. He came to understand things relating to religion beyond imagination. The Bishop went through Geography so often with him, that he knew all the maps very particularly. He explained to him the forms of Government in every country, with the interest and trade of that country, and what was both good and bad in it; and acquainted him with all the great Revolutions, that had been in the world, and gave him a large account of the Greek and Roman Histories, and of Plutarch's Lives. The last thing the Bishop explained to him was the Gothic Constitution, and

" Moreover, the two Kings, and the States-General have agreed by this secret article, that, tho' it is not said in the seventh article of the said treaty, signed at London the 21st of February, and at the Hague the 25th of March 1700, that a Prince shall be agreed on, to whom the said portion of the most Serene Archduke shall be given, in case the Emperor and the King of the Romans will not subscribe to the said treaty after the term of three months shall be expired, to be counted from the day on which it shall be notified to him: Nevertheless, the Emperor shall be allowed to subscribe, during two months, to be reckoned from the day on which the death of his Catholic Majesty shall be made known to him by his Britannic Majesty, his most Christian Majesty, and the Lords the States-General. But, in case his Imperial Majesty refuses to enter into it in the time above-named, the two Kings and the States-General shall agree, at the end of the time above-appointed, on a Prince, to whom the said portion shall be given, and the remainder of what is in the said seventh article, from which

" what is abovesaid does not derogate, shall be punctually executed.

" It is further agreed, that, if the most Serene Archduke should go into Spain, or enter into the Duchy of Milan, though it is said in the eighth article of the said treaty, to which this secret article refers, that he cannot go thither before the death of his Catholic Majesty, but by the common consent of the two Kings and the States-General; his Britannic Majesty and the States-General engage themselves to use all their possible endeavours and might, and even to come to acts of hostility, if it be necessary: In short, to take all convenient measures, in concert with his most Christian Majesty, to oblige his Catholic Majesty and the Spaniards, to send him back out of Spain, or out of the Duchy of Milan, without any delay.

" This article shall have the same force as if it had been, word for word, inserted in the treaty, to which it refers, and shall be enregistered by the Parliament of Paris, immediately after the death of his Catholic Majesty without children."

1700. and the new salary and feudal laws. He talked to his Highnesses of these things at different times near three hours a day. This was both easy and delightful to him. The King ordered five of his chief Ministers to come once a quarter, and examine the progress he made; and they seemed amazed both at his knowledge, and the good understanding that appeared in him; for he had a wonderful memory, and a very good judgment. His death gave a great alarm to the whole nation. The Jacobites grew insolent upon it, and said, that now the chief difficulty was removed out of the way of the Prince of Wales's Succession.

Soon after this, the House of Brunswick returned the visit, which the King had made them last year, and the eyes of all the Protestants in the nation turned toward the Electress Dowager of Hanover, who was daughter of the Queen of Bohemia, and the next Protestant heir, all Papists being already excluded from the succession. Thus of the four lives, that the nation had in view, as their chief security, the Queen and the Duke of Gloucester were carried off on the sudden; and of the two, that remained, the King and the Princess of Denmark, as there was no issue, and little hopes of any by either of them, so the King, who at last was a man of a feeble constitution, was now falling under an ill habit of body; his legs being much swelled, which some thought was the beginning of a dropsy, while others thought it was only a scorbutic distemper.

The temper of the nation.

The state of things at that time gave a melancholy prospect. The nation was falling under a general discontent and a dislike of the King's Government. And the King, on his part, seemed to grow weary of them, and their affairs; and, partly by the fret from the opposition he had of late met with, partly from his ill health, he was falling, as it were, into a lethargy of mind. The Administration of the Government was now almost wholly engrossed by the House of Commons, who must sit once a year, and as long as they thought fit, while the King had only the civil list for life. The act for Triennial Parliaments kept up a standing faction in every county and town of England; while luxury, vanity, and ambition, increased daily; and animosities were come to such a height, as to afford dismal apprehensions. Few seemed to have a right notion of the love of their country, and of a zeal for the good of the public. The House of Commons, how much soever its power was advanced, yet was much sunk in its credit; very little of gravity, order, or common decency appeared among them. The balance lay chiefly in the House of Lords, who had no natural strength to resist the Commons.

A war raised against the King of Sweden.

A league had been formed in the North to crush the young King of Sweden, and invade his dominions on all sides at once. The Elector of Brandenburg was to fall into Pomerania, and the King of Denmark to attack Holstein, whilst the King of Poland invaded Livonia, which was antiently a fief of the Crown of Poland. The Minister of Sweden, before the King went abroad, pressed him to make good his engagements with that Crown. For, pursuant to the league, the Poles were now besieging Riga. The first attempt of carrying the place by surprize miscarried. Those of Riga were either over-awed by the Swedish garrison that commanded there, or they apprehended, that the change of masters would not change their condition, unless it were for the worse; for which reason they made a greater stand than was expected, and, in a siege of above eight months, very little progress was made. The firmness of that place made the rest of Livonia continue fixed to the Swedes. The Saxons made great waste in the country, and ruined the trade of Riga. The King of Sweden, being obliged to employ his main force elsewhere, was not able to send them any considerable assistance. The Elector of Brandenburg lay quiet without making any attempt; as likewise did the Princes of Hesse and Wolfenbuttle. The two scenes of action were in Holstein, and before Copenhagen. The King of Denmark found the taking the forts that had been raised by the Duke of Holstein, an easy work; they were soon carried and demolished (1). He besieged Toninghen next, which held him longer. Upon the Swedes demand of the auxiliary fleets, that were stipulated both by the King and the States, orders were given for equipping them in England, and likewise in Holland. The King was not willing to communicate this design to the two Houses, and try if the House of Commons would take upon themselves the expence of the fleet. They were in so bad a humour, that the King apprehended, that some of them might endeavour to put an affront upon him, and oppose the sending a fleet into the Sound; though others advised the venturing on this, since no nation can subsist without alliances sacredly observed. And this was an antient one, lately renewed by the King; so that an opposition, in such a point, must have turned to the prejudice of those, who should move it. Soon after the end of the Session, a fleet of thirty ships English and Dutch was sent to the Baltic, commanded by Sir George Rooke, which arrived in the Sound on the 20th of July. The Danes had a good fleet at sea, much superior to the Swedes, and almost equal to the fleet sent from hence. But, as it was their whole strength, they would not run the hazard of losing it. They kept at sea for some time, having got between the Swedes and the fleet of their Allies, and studied to hinder their conjunction. When they saw that could not be done, they retired, and secured themselves within the port of Copenhagen, which is a very strong one. The Swedes, with their Allies, came before that town, and bombarded it for some days, but with little damage to the place, and none to the fleet. The Duke of Lunenburg, together with the forces, that the Swedes had at Bremen, passed the Elbe, and marched to the assistance of the Duke of Holstein. This obliged the Danes to raise the siege of Toninghen, and the two armies lay in view of one

A body of Saxons broke into the territories of the Duke of Brunswick, in hopes to force their army to come back to the defence of their own country: But the Duke of Zell had left things in so good order, that the Saxons were bear back, and all the booty, that they had taken, was recovered.

and Denmark.

In the mean time King William offered his mediation, and a treaty was set on foot; and, as he did not approve of Sir George Rooke's bombardment of Copenhagen, soon after he had received the news of it, he directed Mr. Blainwyte to write to that Admiral from Loo, not to commit any further hostilities against the town or shipping. The King of Denmark proposed, that the King of Poland might be included in the treaty, but the Swedes refused it; and, as the King was not guarantee of the treaties between Sweden and Poland, so he was not obliged to take care of the King of Poland. The treaty proceeding but slowly, this made the King of Sweden apprehend, that he should lose the season, and be forced to abandon Riga, which began to be straitened; and therefore, to quicken the treaty, he resolved on a descent in the Isle of Zealand. This was executed without any opposition, the King of Sweden conducting it in person, and being the first who landed. He shewed such spirit and courage in his whole conduct, as raised his character very high. It struck a terror through all Denmark; for now the Swedes resolved to besiege Copenhagen. This brought the treaty to a conclusion between Denmark, Sweden, and Holstein, about the middle of August. The old treaties were renewed, and a liberty of fortifying was reserved for Holstein under some limitations; and the King of Denmark paid the Duke of Holstein two hundred and sixty thousand rix-dollars for the charge of the war. The peace being thus made, the Swedes retired back to Schonen, and the fleets of England and Holland returned home. The King's conduct in this whole matter was highly applauded: He effectually protected the Swedes, and yet obliged them to accept of reasonable terms of peace. The King of Denmark suffered most in honour and interest. It was a great happiness, that this war was so soon at an end; for, if it had continued, all the North must have engaged in it; and, as the chief strength of the Protestant Religion lay there, so that interest must have suffered much, which side soever had come by the worst in the progress of the war; and it was already so weak, that it needed not a new diminution.

Some days after the signing of the treaty, Lieutenant General Bannier, who commanded in the town of Toninghen, while it was besieged by the Danes, waited on the King at Loo, being sent by the Duke of Holstein, in acknowledgment of his protection. And, about six weeks after, the King of Poland's Resident at the Hague, presented a memorial to the States-General, full of assurances of friendship from the King his Master, and acquainting them, that what induced him to put off the bombardment of Riga, when every thing was in readiness for executing that design, was chiefly the consideration of the loss, which divers merchants, subjects to the King of England, and the States-General, would have suffered thereby. The King wrote to the Czar of Muscovy, upon the occasion of the differences between him and the Crown of Sweden, to press him to an accommodation, and to offer his mediation for that purpose.

The treaty for dividing the Spanish Monarchy Confers (which began now to be published) had given on the rise to a very important series of negotiations; Partition which were carried on with great secrecy and treaty. address, during the course of this summer (1700). It is needless to remind the reader of the motives,

(1) Prince Ferdinand of Bavaria, who by the first Partition treaty, was to have been King of Spain, dying at Brussels, in February, 1698-9, the Earl of Portland began, soon after this, to treat about a new Partition treaty, in favour of the Archduke, Charles; and the King sent the Earl of Jersey into France, with instructions to negotiate this second treaty: But, that Earl, being soon recalled, the Earl of Manchester was appointed to succeed him: From whose papers, published by Christian Cole, Esq; the following extracts are taken; which will give us light into the secret history of the second Partition treaty.

Alexander Stanhope, Esq; the English Envoy Extraordinary at Madrid, to the Earl of Manchester.

Madrid, Aug. 27. 1699.

A paper, sent me this evening, from Don Antonio de Ubilla, Secretary of the Dipacho Universal, a copy of which was inclosed, gives me an unexpected opportunity of beginning my correspondence with an office that concerns, or, by the contents, is supposed to concern your Excellency's negotiations in that Court.

Copy of the paper above-mentioned.

Don Antonio de Ubilla kisses the hands of Don Alexander Stanhope, Envoy Extraordinary of his Britannic Majesty, and lets him know, that the King his Master, having been frequently informed by his Ministers in the North, of the strong informations and evident proofs, which they have, by different advices and accidents, that the English, Hollanders, and French, in consequence of what was last year concluded and stipulated at Loo, are now again forming new treaties for the succession of this Crown, and for the dividing of it: Which notices have been corroborated by other ways; so that they are public over all Europe: It would be against his dignity to dissemble, and take no notice of them. The King, his Master, thinks it inexcusable, not to oppose what might produce such irreparable inconveniences, if it came to be put in execution; and has ordered his Ministers, in the Courts of France, England, and Holland, to make known to those Princes and Governments the just sentiments his Majesty has of those advices, unheard of, before, in the life of any King, and more improper in that of his Majesty; which consisting, at present (by the Divine Mercy, and for our Happiness,) in only thirty-eight years of age, we may naturally promise ourselves, and especially from his most high Providence, that he may give his Majesty the important Succession, which we hope for from him, by the affectionate prayers and vows of his vassals: It causing a just wonder and grief, that they doubt before-hand, of so great a possibility, by reason of any opinions, taken up from the slight complaints, and the affliction of his Kingdoms and Subjects, and the impressions, that seem to disturb the general tranquility, which we now enjoy: When, on the other hand, it is not to be believed, from the righteous and pious mind of his Majesty, that he lives so unmindful of his obligation, and values so little the love and security of his vassals, tives, that induced the contracting parties to sign this treaty; or of the nature of its contents, as both have been already related: But when, pursuant to one of the articles, it came to be offered, jointly, by the Ministers of England, France, and Holland, to the rest of the Powers of Europe, the reception it met with was none of the most favourable. The greatest part returned general and dilatory answers. The Italian States were unwilling to see the French in possession of Naples, and the States Del Presidi. Those of Germany were, from motives of fear, or interest, unwilling to disoblige the House of Austria. Brandenburg expected the title of King from the authority and good offices of the Imperial Court. Saxony and the Northern Crowns were taken up with their own quarrels; which the peace of Travendal had by no means accommodated. Some thought the Duke of Savoy under engagements at Vienna; but it seems most probable, that he resolved to defer making terms for himself, till the treaty took place; and was not without hopes, that, upon the Emperor's refusal, he should be nominated the next. The Swiss Cantons, being applied to, declined giving their guaranty. In short, of all the Princes, to whom it was communicated, not one appears to have come into it, but the King of Portugal.

if God (by his secret and sovereign judgments) would chastise us, by taking away his life (which, we hope, he will not suffer) without granting him the benefit of a Succession, his affairs will not be left, without a due reflection on what is most just, and most important for the public tranquility; and so, that no body shall be able to find fault with his justice, nor his foresight. For which reasons, his Majesty has ordered his aforesaid Ministers to make instances, and use their diligence to cut off those negotiations; weighing the ill effects, which they now produce; and, what their continuance may produce. And, that the complaint of his Majesty, and the orders he gives to his Ministers abroad, to notify to the Princes, at whose Courts they reside, be, at the same time, made public, he has lately ordered, that it be made known to the Ministers here. For this reason does Don Antonio de Ubilla communicate it to Don Alexander Stanhope, by order of his Master, that he may also give notice to his Britannic Majesty, assisting, with his prudent representations, this just and honest purpose; that so the universal quiet may be maintained; and that he may quit the scandal of this negotiation, which, it is feared, will be an unhappy motive of kindling a voracious flame of a new war: Which, being once lighted, will be difficult to be extinguished, either by the greatest force, or the most dextrous and most powerful mediation: And he remains obedient to Don Alexander Stanhope, with all affection.

The Earl of Manchester, to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, Sept. 30. 1699.

The Spanish Ambassador is endeavouring to get a private audience of the King. The first matter, he is to represent, is in relation to some transactions at Leo. The Declaration of his King makes also great discourse here. The state of affairs at St. Germain continues much the same it was. They are still pleasing themselves with hopes the nation will recall him, at last; though the greatest prospect they seem to have, is the death of the King of Spain; which might, again, renew the war.

The Earl of Manchester, to Mr. Yard.

Paris, Octob. 7. 1699.

They write from Leo, That the Spanish Ambassador has delivered to all the Lords Justices a memorial relating to the succession of the Crown of Spain, which his Majesty refers very much.

Mr. Yard, to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, Octob. 28. 1699.

I believe the King's directions will be signified to the Spanish Ambassador, to-morrow, to leave the Kingdom. Indeed, the paper, he gave about, was very insolent, and appealing to the Parliament; so that the King could do no less. Mr. Stanhope is recalled at the same time.

Remonstrance presented, in French, by the Marquis de Canales, Ambassador from the King of Spain, to the Lords Justices.

In the first place, The King, his Master, having been certainly informed, that his Majesty, King William, the Hollanders, and other Powers (in pursuance of what they treated and stipulated, last year, at Leo) are now actually framing new treaties about the succession of the Crown of Spain; and (what is most detestable) contriving its division and repartition; His Majesty orders his Extraordinary Ambassador, residing in this Kingdom, to make known to the Lords Justices of England the resentment, which these unheard-of proceedings create in his Majesty, especially during the life of a Monarch, who is of so fit an age to expect (for many years) an heir, so much desired by all nations, that, without a detestable avarice, no one would suffer himself to be carried away with the ambition of usurping the dominions of others.

That, if this were not contrary to the law of nature, no Nation or Government would be safe against the machinations of the strongest and most malicious; whereas, reason, and not force, sets bounds to nations.

That, if it were lawful for Foreigners to concern themselves about the succession of Kings and Sovereigns, there would be no statutes or municipal laws to be observed; nor would any laws be free from the outrages of others, more especially those of the Crown of England.

That, if there is not a speedy end put to these proceedings of Sovereigns, no health would be constant, no life secure, while both depend on the hand of the Almighty, who is the arbiter of Life, Death, and Empires.

That the impressions, which one Kingdom makes upon another, to tempt the allegiance of the subjects, and excite their minds to insurrections, are an offence, and breach of the good faith, which ought to be observed among Christians, and more particularly among Allies and Friends.

That it ought not to be presumed, of any Prince or Nation, and still less of the King of the Spanish Nation, that they are so negligent, as not to take proper measures, upon future and unexpected accidents (if this should happen) to secure the public peace, and the repose of Europe, which has been the aim of the King and Nation for many ages, as it is now and always will be.

That, if there is not a speedy end put to these proceedings and projects, there will doubtless break out a direful and universal war over all Europe, difficult to be stopped when it is desired, and so much the more prejudicial to the English, as they have but just felt the effects of innovations, and of the late war. This matter is so worthy of consideration, that it is not doubted but it will be thought so by the Parliament, the Nobility, and the whole English Nation, which has never been wanting in prudence and foresight.

The same Nation must consider their own particular interests, and their commerce and treaties with the Spanish King and Nation; the alteration, division, and

The two Princes more immediately concerned in its operation, viz. the Emperor and King of Spain, loudly declared against it from the beginning. The former, soon after the conclusion of it was notified to him, returned for answer, "That he was astonished, that any disposition should be made of the Spanish Monarchy, during the life-time, and without the consent of the present Possessor; and, that contrary to justice and a decorum, himself, who was the rightful heir to the whole, was to be compelled to accept a part of it within the space of three months, under the penalty of forfeiting his share to a third person not yet named. That, however, he could take no final resolution till the return of a Courier from Madrid, who was to bring him an account of the King of Spain's sentiments, on an affair of such consequence to both of them." and partition of which would necessarily be very detrimental to them; and all this may be prevented by desisting from the project in hand, and by not promoting innovations, destructive at all times to Empires and Kingdoms.

That the Ambassador Extraordinary of Spain will manifest to the Parliament, in the next Sessions, the just resentment which he now expresses, in the same manner as his Master has caused it to be shewn to all the public Ministers of the Kings, Princes, and States, that reside at the Court of Madrid.

The translation of the paper sent to the Spanish Ambassador, and which was written in French by Mr Secretary Vernon, and dated, the 30th of September 1699.

His Majesty having seen the paper, which the Secretary of the Embassy of Spain has lately delivered, by order of your Excellency, to the Lords Justices of the Kingdom; his Majesty thinks the contents so insolent and seditious, that, in resentment of so extraordinary a proceeding, and which can by no means be justified by the Law of Nations, he orders, that you go out of his dominions precisely in eighteen days, to be counted from this notification; and that you keep in your house till your departure. I am also ordered to let you know, that these are the orders of his Majesty, that no writing be any more received from you nor any of your domestics.

Mr Stanhope to the Earl of Manchester.

Madrid, Nov. 5, 1699.

By the inclosed copy of the complaint I have made here against the Marquis de Canales's proceedings, your Excellency will judge I have seen his insolent and seditious paper. They readily received mine, which I much doubted they would not; and it was sent within an hour hither from the Escurial to the Council of State. This was the day before yesterday in the morning, and they have been in close consults ever since. I have advices from several hands, and from persons of the first rank, that the resolution will probably be moderate; and that they will disown their Ambassador, so far at least as to the brutality of his expressions, and it may be as to the substance, now they find the world generally cry out against the folly, as well as insolence of it; though I am satisfied he had orders to do the thing, but not in that manner. This makes me willing to give them time to bethink themselves before they run on headlong into mischief, against which they are so ill provided, and it is a latitude my orders allow me. Besides that if I can prevent a breach, and procure his Majesty humble satisfaction, I shall believe I do both Him and my Country good service.

Don Alexander Stanhope, Envoy Extraordinary of the King of Great Britain, kisses the hands of Don Antonio de Ubilla, and says, that he has orders from the King his Master, immediately to pass to the Royal knowledge of his Catholic Majesty the just motive of complaint given him by a paper, which the Secretary of the Marquis de Canales, by order of his Majesty, Numb. XXVII. Vol. III.

ter, delivered to the Lords Justices of England in London, of which the adjoined is a true copy, and from whose contents, besides the rude and provoking language, it is manifest the design of it was to stir up sedition in his Kingdoms, by appealing to the Parliament and People of England against his Majesty; which is to own them Superiors to his Royal Person, than which nothing can be more absurd and contrary to the Constitution of the Government of the Kingdom of England; and is what the said Marquis de Canales, Ambassador from his Catholic Majesty, neither ought nor could be ignorant of, after so many years residence in it. Notwithstanding which the paper is full of contumelious terms to his Majesty's Person, making use of several artifices, of insinuations and threats, purposely to breed a misunderstanding and dissention betwixt his Majesty and his Subjects; an attempt, which no Sovereign Prince can suffer in his dominions: And therefore the King of Great Britain, his Master, found himself necessitated to stop, as soon as possible, a mischief, which by the industry of the Marquis went on spreading itself daily, by ordering he should be required to go out of his Kingdoms; and finally, the said paper, being both in words and substance, affrontive to the Majesty and Sacredness of Kings, the King of Great Britain, his Master, does not believe it possible, that the Marquis writ or published it by the orders of his Catholic Majesty, but on the contrary, persuades himself, that this his resentment will be much to his Royal satisfaction, as made for the common cause of all Kings; and that Don Alexander Stanhope will hope, that Don Antonio de Ubilla pass all this to the Royal knowledge of his Catholic Majesty, whom God preserve, remaining Don Antonio's most humble and affectionate servant.

Mr Stanhope to the Earl of Manchester.

Nov. 12, 1699, N. S.

The next day after my last, which was November 5, I had certain notice from several hands, the King had taken his resolution of ordering me to be gone; whereupon at midnight I dispatched to the Escurial my agent, with the paper, of which the inclosed is a copy. The Secretary of the Despacho Universal, Don Antonio de Ubilla, would not receive, but was willing to hear the contents by word of mouth, and that was as much as I desired. Two days after, the Conduécter, or Master of the Ceremonies, came to order me in the King his Master's name to be gone out of the Spanish dominions within eighteen days, and not to stir out of my house till I should begin my journey. Your Excellency has the answer I gave my Conduécter in the same sheet with the former. I have every day since solicited my passports, being ready to be gone whenever they give them me; and am told the reason of the delay is to know by next post, whether any passports, and in what form they were given to the Marquis de Canales in London, that they may exactly imitate the same with me.

1700. the Imperial Court persisted with little variation, except that their refusals became stronger and sharper, they more they were pressed; and sometimes they pretended, what they could not believe, that Charles II was in a fair way of recovery, and might have posterity of his own. This was the language of their public memorials; but the Counts Harrach and Kaunitz, the principal Ministers of Leopold, talked in a higher and more confidential stile to the French Ambassador, the Marquis de Villars. 1700. They expressed, in their private conferences, the strongest resentment at the conduct of the Maritime Powers, not unmixed with terms of disrespect towards King William, and insinuations, that domestic factions had rendered his Government weak and contemptible. Madrid, November 6, 1699.

Mr Stanhope's answer to the Conduktor of Ambassadors, when he came with a message from the King to order him to leave the Spanish dominions in eighteen days, and not stir out of his house, till he should begin his journey.

You will please to tell his Catholic Majesty from me, that I will punctually comply in all that you have intimated to me by his Royal order, because in so doing I shall obey the orders of the King my Master, as his Catholic Majesty cannot but have been informed by Don Antonio de Ubilla, to whom I communicated it two days ago by my Secretary at the Escurial, desiring at the same time passports necessary for my voyage; that I am glad to see their two Majesties minds so unanimous, and desire they may continue the same in all other matters.

The Substance of the Earl of Manchester's audience of the French King at Versailles, on Sunday, Nov. 15, 1699.

S I R,

The King my Master having found, that Monsieur de Tallard was, by his instructions, obliged to quit Holland before he signed the treaty, which was projected with your Majesty, relating to the succession of Spain; his Majesty has ordered me to desire this private audience, to assure you, Sir, that the King continues in the same sentiments he was always of in regard to that treaty. Your Majesty knows very well the good offices employed by the King my Master, to make the Imperialists enter into it. He has also done all he could to make the States like it. His Majesty continues to act as he did. As to what concerns the King's signing it, he caused the Earl of Jersey to come into Holland expressly for this end; and I doubt not, but the Count of Tallard will have told your Majesty, how often the King my Master has offered himself to sign it, to shew, that he was ready to do all that depended on him. Your Majesty will give me leave to be a little long, in telling how this affair has passed, that so your Majesty may have it perfectly cleared up, that there is no alteration in the intention of the King my Master. The business was proposed to the States of the Province of Holland, as to those, who were the most interested in it; for it was not apprehended, that any obstacles should be met with elsewhere, if the consent of that Province was had. That was also the best way to make the secret of this affair less apt to be divulged.

Sir, If it has been represented to you, that the King my Master might have made use of the credit he has with the States, to cause this treaty to be concluded; I will own, that the King has a great deal of credit in that country. But this credit does always conform itself to the manners and customs of the country; and, tho' the States had found no objection, the business could not have been ended without the consent of every city, which could not be had in less time than a month or three weeks, as the Pensionary and the Earl of Portland have given Count Tallard to understand. But, whilst his orders did not give him leave to wait for the conclusion of the affair, the King my Master hopes, that your Majesty will renew your orders to Monsieur de Tallard, or will send orders to Monsieur de Bonrepos, to endeavour to remove all obstacles, that so the project of the treaty may have its effect.

The French King's answer.

I own I was a little surprized, that the affair was not finished at the expiration of the time, and before the King your Master did set out for England. I am satisfied with the assurances, which you now give me from him, that he continues still in the same intention; and I hope he will still continue to contribute all he can with the States. As for me, I am still of the same mind, and I act with the same sincerity. I will soon send Monsieur de Tallard with the necessary instructions.

When I said, "That the reason the States of Holland were not sooner acquainted with it, was, that it could not be proposed to them, till it was known, whether the Imperialists would come in or no;" the King said, They have had time enough given them, and even too much. As to Count Tallard's having orders to come away, the King took no notice of it, nor that he had been informed of every step. Upon my saying, "Monsieur Tallard has been informed of all that has been done in this affair, and has even seen all the letters, which Mr Hop wrote to the Pensionary; and, it being first proposed to the Province of Holland, it seemed that he was satisfied in these points," I took occasion to see, if Monsieur de Bonrepos had any orders, saying, "That the King my Master is desirous that your Majesty should be informed by Monsieur Tallard, or Monsieur de Bonrepos, of all that passes; and even the States will always have a great regard for all that comes from your Majesty." The King answered, In this affair I confided only in Monsieur de Tallard; and I know very well, that the King your Master has more credit than I in Holland on this occasion. When I said, "That the King had recommended it to the care of the Pensionary, and that we hoped, that the difficulties were such as might be surmounted," The King answered, That he hoped so too; and that he imagined, that somebody would come from the States into England; and that the treaty would be signed there. The King said also, As you know, I have it under the hand of the King your Master, as he has it under mine. Then I said, "I have also, Sir, particular orders to tell your Majesty from the King, that as he has acted on this occasion with an open heart, and with all possible sincerity; so he will continue to act on all other occasions that may be able to contribute to the strengthening the friendship and good correspondence with your Majesty." The King an-

1700. England and Holland, for the preservation of Spain and the Indies in his family, and, at the same time, robbed him of the Milanese. They threw out frequent overtures, that his Imperial Majesty was willing to take up with the Dauphin's share of the partition, or to concert a new one with Lewis XIV, which should coincide better with their respective interests. But whether these offers were despised at Versailles, or the sincerity of them suspected, the Marquis de Villars received no other instructions in answer to them, than that the King did not think it right to admit any alteration, without the consent of his Allies. The Emperor's obstinacy in rejecting the treaty, amazed all those, who were acquainted with his circumstances. His Cole. troops, if complete, did not amount to seventy thousand men; but, for want of recruits, they were far short of that number. He was indebted between twenty and thirty millions of florins; and his Chamber of Finances had scarce credit enough to supply him with necessaries. It was generally believed, that he placed his chief reliance on the chapter of accidents, or

swered, You may assure the King, your Master, that I will do the same.

Mr Prior set out, on the said 15th of November 1699, with this account of the audience, for London.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jerley.

Paris, Nov. 21, 1699.

The same day Mr Prior left this place, I went to Versailles, and had my audiences, where passed what is usual on such occasions. The King expressed himself in very obliging terms, mentioning the great desire he had to continue the good correspondence, that was now so well established; and that he did again repeat to me what he had formerly assured me of, &c. I made Monsieur de Torcy a visit, where I took occasion to discourse of what had passed in my private audience. I knew he expected it, and was also willing to find out his sense of the matter. He said, That the King had acquainted him with it: That I had fully explained the whole proceeding to his Majesty: That Monsieur de Tallard was to set out on Monday next. He did still seem to insist on the great credit our King had with the States, and, laughing, said, he wondered I should lessen it. I told him, I did own the States had always shewn a great regard to every thing, that was proposed by his Majesty: That the assurances, I had given this King, were, that he had recommended it, and would continue to do it; so that nothing would be wanting on his part: That, though there were great hopes of a good conclusion, yet, till it was agreed to by the States, it was more than could be said, that they would certainly do it. On the whole, I find the Court impatient till it is done, by saying, No time was to be lost: That the King of Spain's life was very uncertain: That, by the last account they had, he was ill again. I waited on Monsieur de Tallard this morning, and his discourse was much the same. He gave me to understand, that, though Monsieur de Bonrepos would seem to be concerned in this affair, he was not: That he hoped to find all things ready at his return into England, which would be on Saturday next: That he had all the duty imaginable for the King: That his intentions were and always would be, to endeavour to continue a good understanding between our Masters. To which I replied, as was proper on such an occasion, 'I hope Monsieur de Tallard will be so just, as to give it the same turn in England, he does here.'

The Earl of Manchester to the Lord Chancellor Sommers.

Paris, Decemb. 8, 1699.

As to the affair, that passed in Holland this summer, I cannot see why the States should make any difficulty, since the year before they did agree to a proposal of that nature; and the same reason does still continue, unless they were desirous to see first the success of their Tariff there, which was yesterday settled and exchanged.

The House of Austria will never agree to any thing till it is too late. Besides, they think our interest is so much concerned, that we shall at all times procure them some conditions; and, on the other side, the fear they have of disobliging Spain makes them so very cautious, as not to come into any proposal whatever. I must confess, I am impatient to see the conclusion of this matter. For, in case it has not the effect we always proposed, I shall be sorry it has gone so far: And I know this Court will be much dissatisfied with us, and may be with some reason. All I have acted in it has succeeded as was desired.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jerley.

Paris, December 23, 1699.

I was this day with Monsieur de Torcy. — He took notice, that the affair of Spain was still depending, and not agreed to, which might be a great prejudice to this King, since they had now a good opportunity of turning matters to their advantage, the Queen of Spain being dissatisfied with the Court of Vienna. He did not mention the occasion, but I fancy it is something in relation to the Countess of Berlip. All I said was, that I was assured, that the King my Master would contribute all he could to bring that matter to a good conclusion. He answered, that the King was fully satisfied of it.

Count Zinzendorf had an audience of the King this day, having just received a Courier with the news, that the Queen of the Romans was brought to bed of a daughter. The King told him, as he says, in a very obliging manner, that he had given orders to Monsieur de Villars to take his audience of the Archduke in the manner the Emperor should think fit. So that at present this Court seems desirous to oblige the Emperor as much as they can.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jerley.

Paris, Decem. 31, 1699.

I never see Monsieur de Torcy, but he speaks to me of the great affair. On Tuesday last I was there; I found him appearing a little more concerned: He said, that matters were still under such uncertainties, that they could not tell what to depend on: That he did not find, that this affair was any way advanced: That the King of Spain had been indisposed again since his return to Madrid, and might die of a sudden, which probably would produce a new war in Europe, in case those measures, that were proposed, were not first agreed to. I could give him no other answer, than that I believed he was satisfied nothing would be wanting on the King my Master's part; and that I believed Monsieur de Tallard was acquainted with what passed. He said he believed not; for that he had asked an audience of the King, but could not have it, by reason the King was to go to Hampton-Court; and that at that time there arrived three posts from Holland. I told him, that I did not doubt but Monsieur de Tallard had told him how easy of access the King was: that I had seen him speak to the King about business, even without so much as asking an audience, or acquainting the Secretary of State with it. I said, as for myself, that I thought, if Monsieur de Tallard had not left Holland so soon, it might have facilitated this affair. To which Monsieur de Torcy answered, that they had nothing to do with the States, having only treated with the King of England: That Monsieur de Bonrepos was come to Paris, so that they had no Ambassador there, seeming to insist very much on this point, that it was not in the least their business: That

But the true spring of his refusal was, that, in June this year, the King of Spain made a disposition in favour of his second son, which they knew at Vienna, and yet took no measures to render it effectual, by marching troops into Italy, or sending the young Archduke with a sufficient force into Spain; both which schemes had been in agitation.

The affairs of Spain were all this summer in a terrible ferment. The King had frequent returns of his illness; and it was expected, that every relapse would carry him off. The Administration was in a most feeble and disjointed state; the Nobility split into factions; the People mutinous and discontented. On the first knowledge of the treaty, they appeared highly incensed, that three foreign powers should undertake to transfer their allegiance, and parcel out their Dominions. They considered a partition as the greatest diminution of the splendor and strength of the Spanish Monarch. The Grandees several months were passed since the time they had reason to believe this matter would have been finished, &c. I cannot tell but he expected some light from me, or it may be Monsieur de Tallard is uneasy, and has made them so. I found by Monsieur de Tallard, the night before he went from hence, that he thought by Christmas this matter would certainly be ended. He said, in case it had a good conclusion, he should be very glad to stay in England; if not, he hoped he should be recalled, and some other should be sent. It may be, that this Court was of the same opinion; and that, finding the contrary, it makes them doubtful of what the success will be. Monsieur de Torcy nevertheless did not seem to make any doubt; he only said, that in cases of this nature time was not to be lost.

Paris, Jan. 6, 1700.

I am in hopes the grand affair goes on well, since Monsieur de Torcy, discoursing yesterday with me, as he generally does, told me, that the Pensionary of Holland had told Monsieur de Bourenpos that the Province of Zealand had given their consent; and, there being since some time past, it is hoped we shall soon know the success; which will make this Court easy. Monsieur de Torcy pretends they have proposals of treaties from all parts, but that the King does much more desire and seek that with the King of England than any other. Monsieur de Torcy has received by an express a letter from Monsieur de Tallard of the 30th of December, N. S. which is two days fresher than ours. He seemed much better satisfied than the time before.

The Earl of Jersey to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, Jan. 11, 1700.

The great affair is come to a good conclusion; the Province of Holland, having consented to it, except some little reserve, which will be of no consequence. Your Excellency will be pleased, as you may occasionally discourse with Monsieur de Torcy, to let him know this; which may prevent any thing, that Tallard may represent otherwise, on this subject.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, Jan. 27, 1700.

I was, yesterday, with Monsieur de Torcy; who had received an express from Monsieur de Tallard, with news, That the affair was concluded: That the only difference that remained, at present, was, That the States would have their part signed in Holland; and Monsieur de Torcy did not well know how this could be done, the French King having no Minister there. I found Monsieur de Torcy very well pleased; and, in case that matter is not otherwise agreed on, I could perceive, that would be no obstruction; but the French King will send a person into Holland.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, March 31, 1700.

The treaty is come from Holland, though the counterpart be not yet, because, as Monsieur de Torcy said, they could not tell, but the Courier might have been stopped in Flanders; so they would not send them together. It does begin to take air, and Count Zinzendorf has some notice of it, having discoursed to me of the several heads. I have been far from giving him any light into that matter; only so far, as I have often said before, when I found him alarmed at the illness of the King of Spain, That I thought it would be happy for Europe, if there could be a compromise; but that that would very much depend on the Emperor. He said, I might be assured the Emperor would agree to any thing, that was reasonable. I avoided, always, going any further, without orders; though I cannot see, but he will be soon informed of this whole matter, whenever it is again propoled at Vienna.

I do believe, this Court will do what they can, in order to a peace in all parts. The reason why I think so, is, because Monsieur de Torcy says, It would be necessary, that most of the Princes in Europe consented to what is agreed on in England; which cannot be so well done, if they are in war one with the other.

Paris, May 8, 1700.

I desired Monsieur de Torcy would let me know, when he would mention the late treaty to the Emperor's Minister; and what measures they intended to take, that I might act conformable to them: He said, He should take no notice of it to him, till next Tuesday sevensnight: That they would send orders to Monsieur de Villars (with a copy of the treaty) to communicate it to the Emperor; and to send back the Courier at the expiration of eight days, in case he had no answer, and to declare, that this King shall look upon it as a refusal: That, left the Emperor might engage the Pope, the French Ambassador at Rome is to communicate it also, and to desire it may be kept a secret: That they think proper to act in the same manner with the Republick of Venice, and they will impart it to their Ambassador here about the same time they mention it to the Emperor's Minister. As for Spain, they thought it not yet proper. He said, they should now soon see the success of this great affair, and the King would have the honour of it, and the case was extremely changed in two years: That the King had now all the obligations and interest to wish for the life and welfare of our King, assuring me of the great concern he was under some time this winter, when they heard from Monsieur de Tallard, that he was a little indisposed. This, I take it, is not unlikely, it being plainly their interest; else I should not easily be persuaded of their good intentions. I wish it was so elsewhere.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, May 19, 1700.

Yesterday Monsieur de Torcy acquainted the Emperor's Minister of the whole affair. He seemed mightily surprized, and complained much of the proceedings of our King, taking notice of the many engagements, that have been made between his Master and Him. To which Monsieur de Torcy answered, That he thought he had no reason to complain, after what had passed on that subject at Vienna, and that the Emperor had been 1700. dees, in particular, could not endure to be deprived of so many lucrative Governments; and it was the universal cry, that France alone could maintain their Succession intire, and recover them out of the calamity, to which they were reduced. It is the common opinion, that the seeds of this great Revolution were laid by the capacity and address of the Marquis d'Harcourt, during his embassy at Madrid in 1698; and that he found means to gain over the Cardinal Portocarrero, the Marquis de Monterey, and de los Balbazes, besides several others of the principal

Nobility, Lawyers, and men of note in Spain. However this may be, it is certain, the mismanagements of the present reign, and the rapacious and violent carriage of the Queen Mariana, aunt to the Archduke Charles, had intirely alienated the hearts of the whole nation from the Germans; and that they were disposed to receive with open arms a grandson of Lewis XIV., provided they were assured of never becoming a province to France. Nor did the reflection, that a Prince of the Austrian line must owe his chief support to Heretics, carry a small weight along been informed of every thing, that was now agreed to: That this matter was not of a new nature, for that there had been a secret treaty between the Emperor and France concerning the Succession of Spain in 1668. When I saw Monsieur de Torcy, he told me all that had passed, and I was glad to hear of this secret treaty, that being a good argument to Monsieur de Zinzendorf, as you will find afterwards. He soon took notice of it to me, and began much in the same manner as with Monsieur de Torcy. I told him, I wondered to see him so much surprized, since for some time he always assured me, there was such a matter in agitation, and that it was concluded: That, if he would consider a little, he would be convinced, that the King had not only considered the interest of Europe, but in particular that of the Emperor: That what might be very doubtful, and even not likely to be obtained by a war, might now be secured by a peace if they pleased. He said, What faith can be expected, if the Pyrenean treaty, and the renunciation, that France made, was not valid? To this I answered, That I believed the Emperor did not take it to be a full decision in relation to Spain; else he would not have made a secret treaty with France in 1668, wherein he yielded much more, as I was informed. I then proceeded to shew him the situation of affairs. I represented the power of France, the interest they have in Italy, as also in Spain; and besides what he had often told me, that it was feared, that the Spaniards would declare themselves for a Prince of France; that I was of opinion, that he himself would think at last, that this was the only way to prevent it, and that they had it now in their power. Upon the whole matter he seemed partly convinced, and he begins now to think, that the King could obtain no better conditions, and that the only difficulty, that will remain, is what relates to Milan. I left him to judge, whether he thought the Princes of Italy would be contented, that either France or the Emperor was master there. After this discourse he went again to Monsieur de Torcy, and desired a copy of the treaty, which he said he would send him, and then made him some proposals as from himself, that he might be the better able to inform his Master; which he afterwards acquainted me with, and which I send your Lordship in his own words, as well as I can remember them. He is now so apprehensive lest Spain should declare for France, as you will see by the questions he asked Monsieur de Torcy, that he will do what he can for the treaty; and it is thought he is very well with the Emperor. He sends this day an express to Vienna, and, I think, one to Count Harrach in Spain, as does also the Spanish Ambassador, whom Monsieur de Torcy has acquainted with the treaty, and given him a copy of it. He only said, it was a matter above his understanding, but he would not fail to inform his Master of it. The Venetian Ambassador is also acquainted with it; and Monsieur Calliere goes this week to the Duke of Lorraine to notify it to him. So your Lordship will judge it will not be long a secret.

Count Zinzendorf asked Monsieur de Torcy of his own accord, after the agreement betwixt England, France, and Holland had been shewn him:

Monsieur de Torcy’s answer:

France does consent to it, on condition that the Emperor accepts the conditions.

‘ 2. Whether, in case the Spaniards would make choice of a French Prince within the given term of three months, it be agreed not to give ear to the proposals of Spain?

Yes, it is agreed.

‘ 3. That the cession of the Kingdom of Naples ought, in my opinion, to be understood as only to the descendants of Queen Mary Teresa; and that it is by no means to be incorporated with the Crown nor the House of France?

That this will be made easy, and that there will be no difficulties about it.

‘ 4. Whether there was any room to hope, that France would change or accommodate some things in the treaty?’

That the King was in so good a disposition, that he would come into anything; and that this treaty was not of that nature, that nothing could be changed in it, so it be done by the common consent of England, France, and Holland.

The Earl of Jersey to the Earl of Manchester.

Hampton-Court, May 13, 1700, O. S.

I have your letter of the 19th, and laid it before the King. His Majesty approves of what has been said to Count Zinzendorf, concerning the treaty, only as to the second query:

‘ Whether, in case the Spaniards would make choice of a French Prince within the given term of three months, it be agreed not to give ear to [attendre] the proposals of Spain?

A. Yes, it is agreed.

‘ The sense of these words is it not this? That, though the Spaniards should, within the three months, propose to make choice of any Prince of the House of Bourbon, yet the French shall not in that case hearken to such a proposition, but shall adhere to what is literally prescribed in the treaty. Your Lordship will see, in discoursing with Monsieur Zinzendorf, if he does not understand it thus; and take care, that it be so explained to Monsieur de Torcy, as to leave no room for any difficulty.’

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, May 26, 1700.

I have acquainted your Lordship already, that the only discourse we have here is concerning the treaty with England, and I have made some enquiry, which way it could come to be so soon public; and it happened thus: The King sent for Monsieur on Thursday last, and informed him of it, and even of the particulars, saying it was no longer a secret, for he had informed most of the Princes of Europe of it. This was sufficient to make it known; and it was certainly designed along with it in the minds of a superstitious people. Portocarrero for the repose of the King's conscience, which sometimes suggested to him the unnatural part he was about to act, in depriving his own family of their just rights, advised him to consult the Pope on this momentous point of regulating the Succession. Innocent XII., who was firmly attached to France, after taking the opinion of a college of Cardinals, determined against the validity of Queen Maria Teresa's renunciation, as being founded on compulsion, and contrary to the fundamental laws of the Spanish Monarchy; and exhorted his Catholic Majesty to make his will in favour

which he would effectually contribute to the propagation of the faith, and the repose of Christianity. As soon as this infallible decision was procured, the Cardinal of Toledo redoubled his efforts, to persuade his Master to act in conformity to it; who accordingly signed his Testamentary disposition, in the beginning of October, N. S.

With regard to the conduct of the French King, whilst this transaction was depending, it is too extraordinary not to be a little insisted on. Some have thought, and not without sufficient grounds of probability, that in the proposal designed so. It does occasion different opinions, tho' I find, that, the more they consider, the more they approve of it. The Italian Ministers were the most alarmed by what the French are to have in Italy, with the several ports, which makes them matters there whenever they please. But the chief point is, that all these places are annexed to the Crown of France. They say, if they were to go to a younger son, that might make all that matter easy. We are to see here Monfieur de Torcy to-morrow, the Court being still at Marly, and then I shall be better able to give you an account how affairs stand. I hear the Spanish Ambassador does act very prudently, and has softened the matter as much as possible to the Court of Spain.

Paris, May 29, 1700.

I never fail, when the Ministers here speak of the King, to assure them of the particular esteem he has for his most Christian Majesty, &c. and I had yesterday a good opportunity of repeating it at a conference I had with Monfieur de Torcy about the treaty, &c. I am of opinion, that the Emperor's Minister here will press that matter at the Court of Vienna, he being more convinced than ever, that it is for his Master's interest to agree to it; and Monfieur de Torcy did own to me, that he found him much altered since the last time he saw him; and he told me of the propositions he had made him, and which I have already acquainted you with. The Courier, which was sent to Monfieur de Villars, is expected back every day, and will give us some light as to which way this will turn. The Duke of Lorraine has acceded, but it is at present a secret, as Monfieur de Torcy says, because he is willing to keep measures with the Emperor, as you will be told by Monfieur de Tallard, if he has not told you already.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, June 2, 1700.

I had the honour of your's of May the 13th, and am sensible the second proposition of Monfieur de Zinzendorf might have been plainer by the word écouter instead of attendre; but I was willing to keep his own words, not having then discoursed with Monfieur de Torcy: though I now find his answer went further, and on that query he said, 'provided the Emperor within the term of three months signed and ratified; else they should not think themselves obliged.' This he added, in order to leave him in more doubt, which he thought was proper at present; though he said it was not very likely the Spaniards would now be more their friends; and besides, this King would keep strictly to what is prescribed by the treaty. I afterwards talked to Monfieur Zinzendorf, who understands it in your Lordship's sense, and I did explain to him further what Monfieur de Torcy had told me concerning that matter. At first he did not intirely agree to it, though there was little difference, so that there can be no ill consequence from it; and this matter is so settled, that I hope the King will approve of it.

Monfieur de Torcy made some excuse to me, and said, the time would not permit them to consult first with the King in relation to the Duke of Lorraine, and told me, they had sent a project to be signed by him, and it was not convenient to let this matter cool: That some conditions were sent, but such as would cause no disputes: As, 1. That the Duke is not to quit Lorraine till he is in possession of Milan. 2. That Milan should go to his heirs and family, as Lorraine now does. 3. That the Dauphin should renounce all his claim. 4. That they would not agree with the Emperor 'till the investiture from him was settled, if necessary, in relation to Milan. Monfieur de Tallard has a copy of this project; and, when it is signed, which will be very soon, it will be necessary, that the King and the States-General should sign an act to confirm the same. Monfieur de Villars has communicated the treaty to the Emperor, who declared in general terms, that he was very much inclined to the peace of Europe. By the Couriers, which he was to send eight days after, he will explain that matter further. Monfieur de Torcy says, they have an answer from the French Ambassador at Rome, and the Pope seems to approve of the treaty. After this he said, it would be very convenient, England and France should always act in concert in the affairs of Europe; and let fall some words, as if he understood there was a treaty on foot between England, the Emperor, Denmark, and Poland: That the Danish Ministers had made several offers in England, &c. I told him, I thought there was nothing of that nature, and it was not very likely, because we sent our fleet to assist Sweden, which was in a manner declaring against Denmark and Poland: That I supposed their Minister here had made proposals to this Court, at least it was said so. But, since the assurances he had given me, that no alliance or treaty should be made with them, till matters were composed, without communicating it to the King my Master, I was intirely satisfied, and I hoped he would be so likewise, reports of this nature being generally spread to create misunderstandings.

The secret treaty of 1668, was signed by the Father of Count Auerberg, who is now with you. The Emperor then consented, that France should have Naples and Sicily, all Flanders and the Philippine islands. Count Zinzendorf says he was banished for that reason.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, June 9, 1700.

The Courier, which Monfieur de Villars was to send back from Vienna eight days after his arrival, is come back. Monfieur de Villars writes, that he had discoursed with Count Casintz; that he was pressed to stay some days before he sent back the Courier; that, when they found he could not do it, they let him know, that the Emperor would, in ten days time, give him a positive answer; and that he would not take any measures with Spain; and they believed it would be such an answer, as he would think worth sending by another express. So they think here, this matter is in a good way. He told me further, that

1700. and conclusion of this Partition, his sincerity ought to be unquestioned; and that he really considered it at that time as more for the immediate interest of his Crown, to annex to it for ever those dominions, which were to be given him as an equivalent for the Dauphin's pretensions, than to put his grandson in possession of the whole Monarchy. But the Emperor's unexpected refusal of his concurrence, the abhorrence, which the Spaniards shewed for being dismembered, and, above all, a persuasion, that England would not renew the war, induced him to break through his engagements, by accepting the will. We must however confess, that it has been the more prevailing opinion, that his most Christian Majesty meant only to deceive and amuse from the beginning, and made use of what was his own proposition, as an argument to persuade Charles II. to leave the Duke of Anjou his sole heir. Let this be as it will, the treaty was no sooner ratified, than his Ministers at foreign Courts co-operated with those of England and the States-General, in pushing the acceptance of it; and when King William, having received some intelligence of Harcourt's negotiation, expostulated with him upon it by letter, the French King not only denied his knowing any thing of the matter, but declared under his

the Duke of Lorraine desired an explanation concerning the Sovereignty of Bisch, which, by the treaty, is to go to the Prince of Vaudemont; that the Duke had reasons to think he had no right to it at present, and therefore whatever he signed should not prejudice his title, till the treaty took place. This we have allowed him, and they understand that the Prince of Vaudemont is to have the Sovereignty, when the exchange is made. Monsieur de Torcy took notice to me again, that the French King would act in nothing without consulting the King, and he supposed he was fully satisfied of it, and that he approved of what had been done. I thought it proper to assure him of it, &c. It is certain, the credit and reputation of the King was never so great here, as it is now. Though I can never be persuaded they love him, yet I am confident they esteem him, and desire his friendship I must tell your Lordship, all agree, that the Duke of Sevoy is rightly served. His Minister here is very uneasy.

The late league concerning the Spanish Succession makes a great noise in the world. If the Emperor be pleased, it is no great matter what others say or do.

Mr Paul Methuen to Mr Abraham Stanyan.

Lisbon, June 15, 1700.

We are likely to have a more busy scene of affairs than has been usual; for, the last day of May, there arrived a Courier in eleven days from Versailles to the French Ambassador; which is an extraordinary diligence. The day after his arrival, the Ambassador desired a secret audience of the King, which being granted, he remained an hour in private with him, no body being in the room but the King and himself; during which he shewed him the treaty in French, that was signed by the Earls of Portland and Jersey, Count de Tallard, Count de Briord, and eight Dutch Plenipotentiaries, for the dividing the Spanish Monarchy between the Arch-duke and the Dauphin, if the King of Spain should die without any children. After he had shewed the treaty, and explained the contents of it, he made a speech to invite him into it, setting out his Master's great kindness shewed to the King of Portugal on this occasion, in giving him so sudden notice of what concerned so nearly the interest of this Kingdom. The Ambassador received no answer from the King at his audience; so he dispatched back the Courier to give his Master an account, that he had obeyed his orders; and four days after he sent one of his servants post with the answer he received from the Duke of Cadaval, his Commissary, which was, that, this being a business of great consequence, it required some time to consider of it; and that in the mean time the King returned his most Christian Majesty thanks for this particular demonstration of his kindness, and assured him, that no body could desire more earnestly than he, whatsoever was for the good and peace of Christendom. By this answer it seems probable, that the King of Portugal will not take any resolution of being comprehended in the treaty, until he sees what the Emperor does; and that, in order to it, he will wait for Count Wallenstein, who has been some time at Madrid, and is expected here in a few days, the King's barges being already gone to wait for him on the other side of the river.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, June 16, 1700.

I find the French design very soon to communicate the treaty in all parts, as Monsieur de Torcy says, since England says there is no occasion of deferring it, especially in those parts of Germany, where the King has no Ministers; but, where he has, it is necessary they should all act at the same time. The French intend and think it convenient to do it to the Prince of Hesse-Darmstadt and the Duke of Saxe-Gotha, who were forgot. As for the Electors of Hanover and Bavaria, they leave that to us, the Elector of Hanover not being yet owned as such by this Court. The French Minister at Mantua is to have orders to communicate it there and at Parma, &c. And they have given their order for Turin. The Duke of Lorraine has not yet signed, though he pretends he will. He has called a Council of twelve persons, since which he has desired many explanations from this Court to what concerns his own country, that so they may have the same privileges when under France. Some are allowed, but he desires also not to be a Guarantee of the treaty, which desire is of such a nature, that it cannot be agreed to. We shall soon find, whether all this is not to gain time, and to see what the Emperor will do.

Mr Robert Sutton to the Earl of Manchester.

Vienna, June 19, 1700.

Understanding, that it would not be unacceptable to your Excellency to know what measures the Emperor takes in relation to the treaty newly concluded with France, I could not but rejoice at an occasion of doing your Lordship any pleasure, and take the liberty to acquaint you, that the Emperor has not hitherto taken any resolutions touching the treaty. All that has been declared is, that the Emperor, for reasons very well known, thought himself obliged to communicate with Spain, which is the party most concerned in his opinion, and that afterwards he would return an answer; which perhaps we may be forced to wait for till towards the end of the term allowed him. In the mean time your Excellency will easily judge the agreements to be very unwelcome to this Court. Some of the Ministers do not hide their high dislike of it. But nevertheless, though they do not explain themselves, I believe it is past doubt, that the Emperor will at length enter into it. The necessity of it is very clear, and will be often repeated to them.

Mr Stanhope to the Earl of Manchester.

Hague, June 24, 1700.

Here is a perfect good understanding between the French

1700. own hand, in a letter to the King, that, though a will should be made in favour of his family, he would take no advantage of it, but adhere to the Partition. Nay further, when Count Zinzendorf, the Imperial Minister at Paris, demanded in a Memorial, What part France would act, in case Spain should voluntarily place a grandson of the French King on the Throne? Monsieur de Torcy returned answer in writing, that it would by no means be listened to: And to the very last moment the Court of Versailles expressed, in all their steps, a fixed resolution of adhering to the treaty.

When the secret of the Partition was divulged in England, it was presently writ and talked into an unpopular measure, though visibly the only one, that could be taken to prevent a new war, in which the nation then seemed unwilling or unable to engage. The different censures it underwent were, that so important an affair ought not to have been concluded without the advice of Parliament: That it was contrary to the first separate article of the Alliance: That, unless concerted with the King of Spain, it was unjust in the contrivance, and hazardous in the execution: That the terms, which France had obtained, were prejudicial to the interests of this country, and destructive of the balance of power,

French Ambassador, the Count de Briort, and me. I dispatched two days ago by his Courier copies of the late treaty about the Spanish Succession to our Ministers at Hamburg, Copenhagen, Sweden, and Berlin, to be communicated to those Princes, with instructions to endeavour to persuade them to approve and enter into the Guarantee for executing it. I am told your Excellency has done the same to Mr Methuen in Portugal.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, June 26, 1700.

The Court being at Marly, Monsieur de Torcy came on Thursday last to Paris, and, in the conference I had with him, he told me, that the Duke of Lorraine had himself signed the treaty with Monsieur de Calherre, and at the same time had wrote to the French King, that, notwithstanding he did not insist on the several explanations, and the proposals he had made, yet he hoped they would be granted him. The chief point, and which he desires most, is, that he may not be looked upon as a Guarantee, since he had neither troops nor money to maintain it, in case of a war. Besides, to act against the Emperor, he thought, was what in gratitude he ought not to do. It was not proper to allow him this, as I take it, for very good reasons, since it would have been an example to others to make the same difficulty, and especially to those, who have not the same advantage by this treaty. Yet it is explained to him, that it is not expected he shall give any other assistance than a free passage through his country, in the same manner, as he is already obliged to do by the treaty of Ryswick. He also consents to send some full power to sign it at the Hague, as I understand the King desires. Most of the other things he desires, and of which I think I formerly acquainted you, relate to his own country, when it shall be subject to France, and most of this is granted him. It was well he did not stay for an answer from Vienna; for, as I perceive, there is but little inclination there to agree to the treaty, as it is now; for, I take it, you will see them play another sort of game. Monsieur de Zinzendorf's Courier is returned, and he told me, that his orders were to assure me, that his Master was as much inclined as any body to preserve the peace of Europe; but, as the treaty was communicated in Spain, he could not come to any resolution, till he had heard from thence, I did perceive there was something more, and especially since I saw him so impatient to see Monsieur de Torcy, which he did press very much; and he saw him on Tuesday at a House near Marly, where he told him, he had orders from the Emperor to offer the Dauphin, instead of what he was to have in Italy, the West-Indies. Monsieur de Torcy said (as he tells me, and I cannot but think this Court will act sincerely) that the proposition was of such a nature, that he did not think it proper to acquaint the King with it, neither could he imagine that England and Holland could agree to it. To which Monsieur Zinzendorf answered, That France was able to maintain it by their fleet and troops, if they would accept of it. When he found this would not do, then he proposed, as from himself, that France should have Sardinia and Luxemburg, in lieu of Lorraine, and the Emperor Milan. This was as extraordinary as the other. At last he said, it was impossible for the Emperor to agree to the ninth article, viz. That the Kingdom of Spain shall never descend to any one, who shall be at the same time Emperor or King of France, &c. After some further arguments, that passed, Monsieur de Torcy asked, Whether the Emperor would sign the treaty, in case this article was suppressed? He could not say any thing positively to that. I cannot tell but France would be easy enough in this alteration; but I take it to be against the interest of Europe to have it so. When Monsieur de Torcy acquainted me with this, I told him, that what he had proposed, was, in my opinion, of great consequence, and very unlikely to be agreed to by whoever might approve the treaty. Spain might then possibly be joined to the Empire, &c. He did own it would have difficulties, and said, the French King would not hearken to any proposal but by common consent. I must take notice to your Lordship, that Monsieur de Villars was only acquainted with the first proposition, viz. that of the Indies, and even that was not communicated to Mr Hop. I have not taken any notice of all this matter to Monsieur de Zinzendorf, nor do I intend it; though Monsieur de Torcy said, I might as to the first proposal, he having declared he made it by order. Monsieur de Torcy then told me, that the treaty had been communicated to the King of Portugal, who talked of it, as if he could never consent to it; and accordingly the French Minister there sent away on the 4th instant the Courier. When the King perceived this, he soon changed his mind, and so another was dispatched, by whom he agrees intirely to the treaty on the following conditions:

1. If the Emperor does not consent within the time limited, that then he may be one in the naming of another Prince.
2. That he may have two places yielded to him, that formerly belonged to Portugal: One was Alcantara, but I do not remember the other.
3. That, if he be attacked by reason of the treaty, those, who are concerned in it, shall be obliged to assist him.

Monsieur de Torcy did seem to think it was worth granting him these terms, since it was the only way to engage him heartily in it; and, as for the first article, there would be still three against one. The same Courier brought letters from Madrid with this account, that the Council, that had been assembled upon the notification of the treaty, where the King was not present, had agreed, that the best advice they could give the King, was, that he should declare a Prince of France for his Successor; the Count d'Alquilar being the only one that did not consent to it: That the Queen had pressed the King to disapprove of this resolution, which he would not do; and that as yet he had not declared himself. The Count de Harrach had discoursed with several of them, and especially with the Cardinal Portocarrero, and others, whom he thought in the Emperor's interest; and they all answered, that it was the only advice they could give their King.

The almost extinguished hopes of the Jacobites began to revive on this occasion, and upon the sad event of the Duke of Gloucester's death. As they knew, whatever tended to create a general dislike to the King's measures must be of service to their cause, they were the forwardest to inflame the minds of the people, and had a book sent to the press against the treaty, in which all those, who were supposed to have had an hand in it, were severely treated. Mr Grabam, Lord Preskon's brother (as the Earl of Manchester wrote over from Paris) was dispatched to St Germain's by Sir Christopher Muirgrave, and others of the Tory party, with a proposal to get the Succession settled on the pretended Prince of Wales, and to assure King James, that a vote would

This matter is not yet public here. Monsieur de Torcy thinks it proper, that our Envoy in Switzerland should have orders to speak privately to several of the chief of them, and say, it is expected they do give leave to any troops to pass their country in case of a war, this King intending to give the same instructions to Monsieur de Puyfieux, and order him to say, that they were to observe the same method our King had done, and not to mention this matter in public.

The Earl of Manchester to Sir Lambert Blackwell, Envoy at Florence.

Paris, July 3, 1700.

I have received the inclosed from my Lord Jersey, and have taken this way of sending it you by a Courier, who brings orders of the same nature to the French Envoy. I suppose you will find you are to act jointly, and to take your measures together. It is in relation to the late treaty with France concerning the Succession of Spain. I cannot tell how acceptable it will be to the Great Duke.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, July 7, 1700.

I suppose the packet was gone before your's of the 20th of June came to Whitehall, because it came by itself, and I did not receive it till I was returned from Versailles, so that I could not discourse with Monsieur de Torcy concerning those matters. He told me however, as to what you write in relation to the ninth article, that he had mentioned it to M. de Zinzendorf, who has promised to send immediately a Courier to Vienna, for he had no positive orders to say, that this was the only point the Emperor insisted on. M. de Zinzendorf also took notice of it to me, and says he will do what lies in his power. I must tell your Lordship, that he does what he can to be well here, and endeavours to procure merit to himself both with the Emperor and this Court.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, July 8, 1700.

Monsieur de Torcy has asked me, if the King approved of the manner, in which they have communicated the treaty. I said I had no reason to think otherwise. This may be occasioned by what Monsieur de Zinzendorf may have said to him, for he has as good as told me, that in England it was not liked, that the treaty should be made so public. Monsieur de Zinzendorf is of opinion, that the King of Spain will never declare for a Prince of France, but rather for the Arch-duke. This we shall now soon see. The Spanish Ambassador has as yet received no orders, and carries himself in the same manner as he did before the treaty.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Sutton at Vienna.

I am obliged to you for your letting me know what thoughts they have where you are concerning the treaty, and I find you write much the same with what they have here from thence. I cannot but think the Emperor will judge so well of his own interest as to accept it at last, especially, when he sees Spain is inclined to settle the whole Succession on a Prince of France, which I suppose you have heard of. All the Council, except Count d'Aguilar, were of opinion, that the best advice they could give the King, at this juncture of affairs, was for him to declare the Duke of Anjou his Successor. I cannot tell but this may make some alterations at your Court, and bring them to a speedy resolution. I am told, that Count Cannitz is ill, and that this makes the affairs not so well as otherwise they would.

No. 27. VOL. III.

Mr Sutton to the Earl of Manchester.

Vienna, July 10, 1700.

As to the treaty of regulation of the Spanish Succession, I have only to acquaint your Lordship, that this Court will not return any positive answer yet. They have received newly a Courier from Spain, but will not discover what dispatches he has brought, and conceal their intentions as much as they can till the return of their own Courier from Madrid, alledging; they can ground nothing upon the advices they have hitherto received thence. However, it may be presumed, they will accept the treaty, though it be very displeasing to them. They take no visible measures to prevent the execution of it; from whence one may reasonably conclude, they see the necessity of admitting it; and one cannot wonder at their managing the affections of the Spaniards.

P. S. I thought not to conceal from your Excellency, that it appears pretty plainly, that this Court would absolutely reject the treaty, if they had any hopes of bettering themselves: But, esteeming the business irrecoverably concluded on our side, and not knowing how to remedy it, they are likely to turn their thoughts more upon the ways of preserving what is allotted them, than upon catching at the shadow, and leaving the substance, especially if the Spaniards will comply therewith.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, July 17, 1700.

The last time I saw Monsieur de Torcy, he told me (which he said was forgot) that it would be proper I should have orders to take notice of the treaty concerning the Succession of Spain, to those Italian Ministers, that come from Courts, where our King has none, and to desire their Masters to enter into the treaty, as France has already done, as a means to secure the peace of Europe. I said I had no orders, but that I would write about it. As for Mosdena, I thought it was not proper for me to take notice of, which he agreed in; so that there are Savoy, Venice, Mantua, and Genoa. I intend to speak again to Monsieur de Torcy, and have a further explanation.

I send you a letter from Monsieur d'Herauert, who has communicated the treaty: Monsieur de Torcy tells me, that it is thought, that the Swiss Cantons will hardly enter into the Guaranty, but they may consent to have troops raised in their country, in case of a war. On that occasion, he said also, that he had sent to the French Ambassador in Portugal a copy of the treaty to be signed by that King, in the manner it

Such was the perplexed and melancholy ſituation of affairs, when the King left Loo to embark for England, where he arrived the 18th of October, not a little chagrined at the difficulties, in which he found himſelf involved, and which had a viſible effect both on his health and temper.

Affairs of Scotland. Before his return, he made good his declaration to the Scots, in allowing their Parliament to meet on the 28th of October, and ſent them a letter from Loo, containing in ſubſtance, ‘That, The King, having adjourned their Parliament on account of his going beyond ſea, he then promiſed what he was now ready to make good to them, at this meeting. That he had conſidered their addreſs in 1698, in behalf of the African Company, and would comply with their deſires, in relation to that national concern; and moreover do all eſſe, that could be required for maintaining and advancing the peace and welfare of their Kingdom. He was agreed on in England. He tells me, that the Duke of Savoy answered with great profeſſions, but in general terms, when the treaty was communicated to him. That the French Ambaſſador there had now orders to let him know, that the King his Maſter had reaſon to hope he might have had a more poſitive answer from him, eſpecially ſince there was a diſcourſe, as if he had made a treaty with the Emperor: Which, as he did not believe, ſo it was neceſſary ſuch diſcourſes ſhould be diſcouraged, and that the world ſhould ſee the contrary. That, as for Monſieur de la Tour’s going to England, the French King was glad, that he took all the ways to cultivate the friendſhip of the King of England. This will certainly put him on ſome difficulties how to explain himſelf.

Mr John Robinſon to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Malmo, July 7th, 1700.

I have ſeen a letter from the King of Spain to the King of Sweden, giving him an account of the treaty made about the Succeſſion to his dominions; but only adding, that it is a matter of great importance, and that he (the King of Spain) is deliberating upon it. They intend, I think, to answer, that the King of Sweden will do ſo too.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jerſey.

Paris, July 23, 1700.

Monſieur de la Tour is here; and, as ſoon as he has waited on this King, he intends for Holland. I have ſeen him; and, by his diſcourſe, I find he does not think to go into England, when the King returns; though the Savoy Ambaſſador, here, told me, That he was to reſide there; and ſo he told this Court. It will depend much on the ſucceſs of what he goes about; and, I muſt tell you, that it occasions many conjectures here, eſpecially, ſince it is known, that the Duke of Savoy has, of late, ſent many expreſſes to Vienna, which this Court does not like: And, I have reaſons to think, it will preſs him to declare, what his intentions are; it being his miſfortune to be ſo well known, that it will be hard for him to play the game over again. His Ambaſſador, here, is much dejected; and, at the laſt conference I had with Monſieur de Torey, he was ſeen to come from him in great diſorder. It was eaſy to imagine, that this was occaſioned by what I have mentioned to you.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, July 24, 1700.

As to the affairs of the North, I cannot ſee, but this Court is as deſirous as we to accommodate them, at leaſt, in outward appearance, they are ſo: Beſides, I take it to be their intereſt, ſince the King of Denmark is willing to enter into the treaty concerning the Succeſſion of Spain.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, July 28, 1700.

Monſieur de la Tour leaves this place in a few days; and you are not like to ſee him in England; neither does he propoſe to ſtay above three weeks in Holland. His buſineſs there is to lay before the King the great debts, that are due from the King of Spain to the Duke of Savoy. He had an audience from this King; and aſſured him, That his Maſter has no engagements with the Emperor; nor does he in the leaſt diſpute the right of the Dauphin. I find this Court is ſatisfied, now, with his going; and will be glad to help him; though, if he acts otherwiſe, they will ſoon find him out.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Blathwayt.

Paris, July 30, 1700.

The letters from Spain of the 17th bring nothing very conſiderable; only, that the great men there are ſtill inclined for a Prince of France, that ſo their Monarchy may not be divided. The King of Spain has his health better than ever, as they pretend.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Sutton.

Paris, July 30, 1700.

I had the favour of your’s, of the 16th; and, I find, that, where you are, matters are ſtill uncertain. The Emperor muſt now ſoon come to ſome reſolution. His Courier, that went to Spain, paſſed, lately, here, in his return to Vienna; and, it is thought, that, in caſe the King of Spain is not inclined to declare the Archduke his Succeſſor, the Emperor will ſign the treaty. I am of opinion, that the reſolutions of Spain, whatever they be, will not ſignify much, they being not in a condition to ſupport them: And it is certain, that the great men, there, are almoſt all for a Prince of France, for the whole Succeſſion; and they would not have the Monarchy divided; and think, if the French would accept it, they are able to maintain it better than the Emperor. I wiſh your Court [of Vienna] may ſee ſo well their intereſt, as not to loſe this opportunity, by putting it out of the power of the King, our Maſter, to help them; which muſt certainly be the conſequence, if they do not accede.

Sir Lambert Blackwell to the Earl of Manchester.

Florence, July 30, 1700.

I wrote to your Excellency, the 23d, adviſing what paſſed at my audience with the Great Duke; and, at midnight (after the poſt was diſpatched) I received from Cavalier Montemagni, Secretary of State, a few lines; bringing me his Highneſs’s answer. Copies of both I incloſe, by which your Excellency will find the Great Duke expreſſes himſelf very much obliged to his Maſteſty; but ſeeks to gain time, by his general answer, without mentioning, whether he will, or not, enter into the Guaranty of the treaty: My opinion being, that his Highneſs is willing firſt to know, what the Emperor and Venetians reſolve; and accordingly will take his meaſures. I do likewiſe ſend your Excellency a copy of his Highneſs’s answer to the French Envoy; being much to the ſame purpoſe, which the Envoy diſpatched to his moſt Chriſtian Maſteſty, by a Courier Extraordinary; and till the return (which, he tells me, may be in fifteen days) will move no farther. He also promised to encourage manufactures, and assented to whatever else should be offered for clearing and securing property, strengthening and facilitating the administration of justice, restraining and punishing crimes, preserving peace and quietness, &c. also wait his Majesty's commands; though I intend to let the Secretary of State know, that my hopes were, his Highness would have been more particular.

Mr James Cresset to the Earl of Manchester.

Hamburg, July 30, 1700.

Your Excellency plainly sees the tricking of the Danish Court, in shuffling the King our master into a mediation, to elude the force of his Guaranty. Count Chamilly juggles to serve the Court, where he resides; which subsists only upon poor shifts and lyes. If our Spanish treaty cannot find better and surer supports than at Copenhagen, I shall be sorry for it. Your Excellency may please to acquaint the French Ministry (if you think fit) That, notwithstanding all the confidence the Danish Court has in their Ambassador, the Count Chamilly, it has made a mystery to him of a letter lately sent from the King of Spain to the King of Denmark, upon the subject of our late treaty: And this matter came out by accident, at supper, at my house, two nights ago; where I had only Count Chamilly and the Spanish Minister.

Monsieur d'Hervæert to the Earl of Manchester.

Berne, Aug. 1, 1700.

You have seen, by my last letter to my Lord Jersey, which I took the liberty to send you unsealed, what I had done, pursuant to the orders of the King, about the treaty of Succession of Spain, which you had the goodness to send me. I communicated it, in conjunction with M. de Puyfieux, to the Cantons, assembled by their Deputies; he and I having invited them to enter into it, and to subscribe the Guaranty. Their answer was such as we foresaw; that is, the Deputies promised, that each would make a report to it's Sovereign. It is easy to judge, that they will endeavour to gain as much time as they can. As the Dyet is finished, we can have no positive answer from the Cantons; but, at another, which must be called on purpose: And we intend to push for it, when we shall think it a fit time. If we cannot persuade them to engage themselves, in form, in the Guaranty for the execution of the treaty, we flatter ourselves, that we shall, at least, obtain, that they will not permit that the troops, which the Emperor might send to oppose it, shall pass. At this we work with all our might; that is, M. de Puyfieux and I; as also M. Valkenier; who is arrived in Switzerland, within these eight days, to assist us, by order of the States-General, his Masters.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Aug. 11, 1700.

An express arrived yesterday from Madrid, in his way to Vienna. He brings no further account of the Queen of Spain's being with-child; yet Count Harrach had complimented her upon the report; which, some think, he might as well have let alone. Her answer to him was, That God would do what he pleased. I find, that, in Spain, they are resolved to court the King, our Master. Schonenberg has been admitted to an audience of the King; and what passed, in relation to Canales, in England, will be forgot, and another will be named. Don Quirós is certainly ordered to return to the Hague. All this matter has been brought about by the Queen: And it is said, that our King has wrote to her; which has produced this good effect. In short, the Spanish Ambassador here takes all occasions to oblige me; which I return in the same manner. They find it their interest to be well with England.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Blathwayt.

Paris, Aug. 13, 1700.

The Emperor's Envoy has received a Courier from Spain; whom he dispatched, the same day, for Vienna. He assures me, That Monsieur Schonenberg has had an audience of the King of Spain: That Don Quirós has orders to go to the Hague; and that they will take no further notice of the affair of Monsieur de Canales, but intend soon to name an Ambassador to the King. The only measure, they seem to have taken, is to put themselves in a posture of defence.

Mr Methuen to the Earl of Manchester.

Lisbon, Aug. 15, 1700.

This goes by a Courier, which the French Ambassador sends, to give his Master an account, that he has concluded a treaty of Guaranty with this Court; by which the King of Portugal is obliged to maintain the late treaty of Repartition, and the execution of it.

Aug. 18, 1700.

I have been forced to break open my letters, to acquaint your Lordship, that the French Ambassador told me, positively, he had signed the treaty, the 15th; yet he did not, having observed, just as he was going to sign, that the Portuguese had, in one of the articles, inserted a clause, by which they might afterwards pretend, that they were not obliged to make war on the Emperor, or Spain, until they began it. This occasioned a dispute between the Ambassador and the Portuguese Commissioners; but all was, at last, accommodated to the satisfaction of the Ambassador, and the treaty signed this evening.

Mr Secretary Vernon to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, Aug. 5, 1700, N.S.

I received, yesterday, your Excellency's letter, of the 11th instant. That the Spaniards are so obliging, of late, does not proceed from his Majesty's having writ to them; but, I rather think, they are endeavouring to create jealousies and suspicions between us and France; and that they have a mind to have a Minister here, next winter, to blow the coals in Parliament, if he can, and to persuade people to find fault with the treaty about the Succession to their dominions: But, I suppose, we shall be very well contented, that the peace of Europe may be preserved upon these terms.

The report of the Queen of Spain's being with-child, I conceive, is the more cherished, that it may give the Emperor a pretence for returning no answer, whether he will come into the late treaty, or not. The three months, propoed for his declaring himself, are, now, near expired; and we hear nothing more from Vienna, but that a certain Courier, they expect from Madrid, is not yet arrived. In the mean time, we hear, the French squadrons, under the command of Nesmont and Pointi, are like to join. One would be glad to know what they are designed for. It is said, they will winter at Cadiz, if they do not make themselves masters of Gibraltar.

Mr Sutton to the Earl of Manchester.

Newstadt, Aug. 17, 1700.

I am sorry to acquaint your Excellency, that the resolution we have so long expected from the Emperor, in relation to the treaty for regulating the Succession of Spain, is not such as was desired. Count Harrach has, to-day, acquainted the M. de Villars, and Monsieur Hep, separately, That he was commanded by the Emperor, to impart to them, for their Masters information, that his Imperial Majesty, considering the King of Spain to be in good health, and of such an age, that he might very well, with the blessing of God, hope for issue of his own, did not think it becoming, especially him, that was his Uncle, to make a division of his Succession. He added to the M. Villars, That the Emperor hoped this answer would not interrupt the good intelligence between Himself and his most Christian Majesty; and that he would not proceed to the nomination of a third, which would but embroil matters the more: That, when the Succession happened to fall, the Emperor thought it justly belonged to him; and, after the extinction of the male line of the House of Austria, to the Duke of Savoy, according to Philip the IVth's will. He told Monsieur Hep also, That the Emperor desired to continue in a good understanding with the King and the States-General. I cannot see Count Harrach to-night; but shall, doubtless, receive the same answer from him tomorrow. If there be any thing different in it, I will acquaint your Lordship with it, by the first opportunity. Your Excellency is much abler than I am, to judge of the consequences of the Emperor's resolution. He certainly reckons upon the friendship of the Spanish Court; but, although he be sure of it, I cannot see how it will answer the expectation he may have of it; or, what other means he has, to hinder the performance of the agreement already made.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Bladway.

Paris, Aug. 20, 1700.

In the conferences I had with Monsieur de Torcy, he told me what had passed at the audience, which the Spanish Ambassador had some days ago. The substance of it was to dissuade the King from proceeding any further in the treaty concerning the Succession.
He said, that the King his Master was like to live a long time; that his health was better than ever it was; that he had named no person to succeed him, nor would he. This King answered, that no body wished more for his Master's health than himself: That all men are mortal: That he had no other design in what he had done but the peace of Europe. The Spanish Ambassador discoursed afterwards with Monsieur de Torcy, who took notice to him, that the resolutions, that were taken in Spain about suppressing all pensions, were in order to maintain a considerable number of forces, which might create jealousies, especially if they were foreign troops. To which he answered, that they had been long enough the jeft of Europe, by having their affairs in so ill a condition; that every man was master in his own country, &c. I find by Monsieur de Torcy, that the French are apprehensive, that the Emperor's troops are to go to Milan and Naples; and he said it had been already proposed to the Republic of Venice to pass twenty thousand men thorough their territories; and, if so, he thought it would be necessary, that the French troops, that are near Catalonia, should have orders to march to the frontiers of Spain;

not that he believed there would be any occasion of proceeding further, but that this would be sufficient to hinder the Germans from going into Italy. This he desired the King should know. I am satisfied, that there is something of this nature in hand by what Monsieur Zinzerdorf lets fall sometimes in his discourses. Monsieur de Torcy said, that they intended to press for the Emperor's answer concerning the treaty, and that it would be convenient we should do it also.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jerley.

Paris, Aug. 27, 1700.

Monsieur de Torcy acquainted me yesterday with the answer the Emperor has given to Monsieur de Villars.
He refuses to enter into a treaty concerning the Succession of Spain, as long as the King of Spain lives; and hopes they will not proceed to the naming of another Prince, which may have ill consequences, and oblige him to take measures to defend his right. He said, had he seen me in the morning, he should have complained very much of the coolness and indifference they shewed in Holland in this affair. That though Monsieur de Tallard did assure them, the Emperor had concerted with Spain, that his troops were to march into Italy; yet it was not thought fit to take any measures to prevent it; but that, by the letter he just then received from Monsieur de Tallard, he sees and tells me, that the King our Master does agree, that both in Spain and Vienna their Ministers shall have orders to declare against it. This Court does intend to press the Duke of Savoy to enter into a treaty with France, if he is not already engaged with the Emperor. It cannot be his interest to have the German troops so near him; and, in case he refuses France, it will be demonstration, that he is acting otherwise than he has assured them.

Mr Robinson to the Earl of Manchester.

Helsingburg, Aug. 25, 1700, O. S.

The accession of this Crown [of Sweden] to the treaty about the Spanish Succession goes very slowly forward, and these Ministers seem to think the circumstances of their affairs ought to excuse them at present from taking part in it, since the Emperor has so many ways to incommode them, especially while the war the King of Poland has began against them continues. They seem much persuaded, that their friends will not press them to expose themselves, but rather first help them to a state of safety, and then they shall be in a condition to make returns.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jerley.

Paris, Sep. 17, 1700.

Yesterday I saw Monsieur de Torcy. I do find by him, that they are very well satisfied with the proceedings in Holland in relation to the great affair, and I do like the proposal to engage those, that will not enter into the Guaranty, to be neutral. I did hear from other parts, that the French Ministers were uneasy, and of opinion, that we did not act fairly; but I assure you, that they have no such thoughts here at present.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Septem. 18, 1700.

I can now assure you, that this Court is intirely satisfied

1700. their settlement at Darien (1). This occasioned the Company to represent to the Parliament, the first day of their Session, 'That, for want of due protection abroad, some persons had been encouraged to break in upon their privileges even at home.' This representation was seconded with a national address to the King upon that subject, whose answer was, 'That he could not take farther notice of it, since the Parliament was now met; and he had made a declaration of his mind for the good of his people, with which he hoped all his faithful subjects would be satisfied.'

Though people were in so bad a humour, that much practice was necessary to bring them into any temper; yet, after some heats about the miscarriage of the Darien affair, the Session, in conclusion, ended well. After having sat about three months, the Parliament came to this resolution, 'That, in consideration of this great deliverance by his Majesty, and, in that, next under God, their safety and happiness depended wholly on his preservation and that of his Government, they would support both to the utmost of their power, and maintain such forces, as should be requisite for those ends.' Accordingly an act passed for keeping on foot three thousand men, till the 1st of December 1702, and another for a land tax to maintain those troops; which done, the Commissioner produced the King's letter, wherein it was desired he might have eleven hundred men on his own account to the 1st of June following; which was readily complied with, and then they were prorogued to the 6th of May. The troops, that were ordered to be broke, were sent to the States, who were now increasing their force. This Session was chiefly managed by the Duke of Queensberry and the Earl of Argyle, and, in reward of it, the one had a Garter, and the other was made a Duke.

In October the Pope died; and at the same time all Europe was alarmed with the desperate state of the King of Spain's health. When the news came to the Court of France, that he was in the last agony, Monsieur de Torcy, the French Secretary of State, was sent to the Earl of Manchester; the English Ambassador there desiring him to let the King his Master know the news, and to signify to him, that the French King hoped, that he would put all things in readiness to execute the treaty of Partition, in case it should be opposed; and, in his whole discourse, he expressed a fixed resolution in the French Councils to adhere to it. A few days after that, the news came of the King of Spain's death, and of his will, declaring the Duke of Anjou, second son of the Dauphin, the universal heir of the Spanish Monarchy; and, in case that Duke should die without children, or should inherit the Crown of France, then the whole Spanish Monarchy should go to the Duke of Berry; and, if the same should happen to him, then the Archduke Charles and his heirs were to inherit; and that Monarchy was at last limited to the Duke of Savoy and his heirs. The will likewise recommended, that the Duke of Anjou should marry one of the Archduchesses. It is not yet certainly known by what means this was brought about, and how the King of Spain was drawn to consent to the will, or whether it was a mere forgery, made by Cardinal Portocarrero, and some of the Grandeess, who partly by practice and corruption, and partly for safety, and that their tified with the proceedings in Holland, in relation to the treaty, and there are no grounds for what is said in other parts. I do not doubt but that there are too many, that would have it otherwise; but I am of opinion, that it is not in their power to effect it.

Monsieur Schonenberg to the Earl of Manchester.

Madrid, September 23, 1700.

I do not doubt but your Excellency is informed of the answer of this Court to the last memorial of the French Envoy Extraordinary, to make it change its resolution of receiving any Imperial or other Foreign troops into its domains in Italy; as I have also represented on the same subject, by express order as well of the King our Master, as the Lords the States-General, they have, almost word for word, answered to it in the same manner; that is to say, in short, that they pretend here to be at liberty, and under pretence of recruiting the foreign troops; who serve in the Spanish pay, to introduce them, when they shall judge it to be proper. The said Court plunges itself more and more into strange disorders, in regard to the Succession. The King and Queen are absolutely for the Imperial Court; and on the other hand the Council of State runs blindly and head-foremost in favour of the Duke of Anjou, flattering themselves, that his most Catholic Majesty will embrace this affair. In the mean while every thing grows worse and worse; many deliberations and consultations, but no good resolutions. The King keeps his bed since yesterday, by reason of a new flux, &c.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sep. 25, 1700.

Here is a Courier arrived from Madrid to the French Court. He also brought letters from Mr Schonenberg, No. 27. VOL. III.

which I have sent forward. The French Minister there having given a memorial, as was agreed in Holland, to the Court of Spain, in order to dissuade his Catholic Majesty from receiving the Emperor's troops, or any foreigners in Italy, or in his other dominions; the answer was, that at present the King did not see any occasion of recruiting his foreigners, that were in his service; but, when he did, he should follow the example of the King his Master, and other Princes.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Methuen.

Paris, Octob. 3, 1700.

All things are very quiet here, and will continue so, unless the measures, which Spain may take with the Emperor, occasion the contrary; which, I take it, is not their interest; and I hope, that the declaration, that has been made at Madrid and at Vienne, will prevent it. I hear your neighbours are very angry with what the King of Portugal has done. I wish others were as well convinced, that it is the only means to preserve the peace of Europe, and I am satisfied they will at last.

(1) The Spaniards had, some time before, ousted the Scots, and retaken what the latter had possessed themselves of by articles of capitulation, signed by Mr Gibson, Mr Vetch, and others, of the Caledonian Council and Settlement; which were, 1. That the Scots should have liberty to retire, with their ships and effects, unmolested. 2. That the prisoners, on both sides, should be exchanged. 3. That, if any ships came thither, in six months, they should have leave to anchor in the harbour, and the privilege of wood, water, and provisions, if they needed them. Thus ended the affair of Darien.

1700. Monarchy might be kept intire (they imagining, that the power of France was far superior to all, and that the House of Austria would not be able to engage in it's interests) had been prevailed on to prepare and publish this will; and, to make it more acceptable to the Spaniards, among other forfeitures of the Crown, not only the Successor's departing from what they call the Catholic faith, but even his not maintaining the immaculate conception of the Virgin, was one (1).

As soon as the news came to Rome, it 1700. quickened the intrigues of the Conclave, so Clement XI they set up Cardinal Albano, a man of fifty-two years of age; who, beyond all men's expectation, was chosen Pope, and took the name of Clement XI. He had little practice in affairs, but was very learned; and in so critical a time, it seems, a Pope of courage and spirit, not sunk with age into covetousness or peevishness, was thought the fittest person for that See. France had

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Octob. 9, 1700.

I am of opinion, that we shall now soon see matters of great importance transacted all over Europe; because it is expected, that, in a few days, we shall hear, that the King of Spain is dead. They have, at Court, received a Courier from Madrid; and, on the 26th of September, the King was so ill, he having continual vomitings, and a great looseness, that his Physicians believed he could not live a week. Last night, late, the Emperor's Envoy was with me, who had just received news of the 30th, by an express. His letters mention, That the King had received the Sacrament, the Extreme Unction, &c. and that he had taken leave of the Queen, &c. so they despaired of his life: But, on the day this was wrote, there was some little hopes of him, his looseness having abated. He told me, he was then going to Fontainebleau. It is certain, that the whole Council of Spain, and even those, that were creatures of the Queen, who is entirely for the House of Austria, are all for the Duke of Anjou. They flatter themselves, that the French King will accept this offer. I hope the Emperor, before it is too late, will see it his interest too sign the treaty.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, Octob. 11. 1700.

Monsieur de Tercy told me, That they had an express from Spain, with letters of the 26th of last month; and that the King of Spain was so extreme ill, that his Physicians thought he could not live eight days. That, thereupon, they had dispatched a Courier to Monsieur de Villars, with orders to acquaint the Emperor with it, and to let him know, That, as they had not yet named a Successor, so it would be necessary to know his further resolutions, since the case might soon happen, which would oblige them to take such measures, as would be proper, in case the Emperor did not think fit to sign the treaty. Monsieur de Tercy made an excuse, that the time did not permit the first concerting with the King; that, else, it would have been done; though he did not see any difficulty, but that his Majesty would approve of it. He desired I would write; which I assured him I would not fail to do: And then I took notice of the augmentation of their forces, which will amount to twenty-six thousand foot. There is to be also one of the horse; but the number is not yet declared. I said, That I heard, that Monsieur de Nesmond was to remain at Cadix. He said, As to the first, that, as affairs stood, it was convenient; but, as for the latter, Monsieur de Nesmond had orders to return to Toulon. There was also a Courier sent to Monsieur de Tallard, who will already have informed you of all this matter. I returned to Paris the same day; where I found the Emperor's Envoy at my house. He had received a Courier from Madrid of the 30th; which confirms the same news of the King; but says much more, that he had received the Sacraments, and had taken leave of the Queen, &c. That all about him took it for granted, he could not live: Yet, in a postscript, they write, That that night they had some little hopes, his looseness, which had been very violent, had been abated. He went straight to Fontainebleau, and is very uneasy, and the more so, because all of the Council of Spain are entirely for the Duke of Anjou: Cardinal Portocarrero and Count Aguilar, who are in the Queen's interest, being also for it; and they flatter themselves, that the offer will be accepted with France. There is no Courier arrived since; though, at this place, the only discourse is, that the King of Spain is dead. I am of opinion, that we shall soon hear it. I hope your Lordship will send me what directions his Majesty thinks proper, in case this should happen, that I may act accordingly.

Madrid, Octob. 21, 1700.

It seems, that the 8th has been the day we call here, critical in sickness, because that was properly the time, that the King gave probable proofs of mending. In effect, his looseness is so much abated, since that time, that his health is grown better, daily; so that, if no relapse, or unforeseen accident, comes across, the Physicians judge, unanimously, that he is absolutely out of danger. In the mean while, his Majesty suffered himself to be persuaded, when he was in the height of his illness, that is, on the 3d instant, to sign a testamentary disposition, in favour of the second son of the Dauphin: But, since he is better, he shews such indignation against those, who, under pretence of conscience, persuaded him to make this step, that he is grown dissident of all his Ministers; inasmuch that he has even recalled the power given to the Secretary of State, for the universal dispatches, relating to the most pressing affairs; which he had trusted, during the greatest violence of his illness, to three or four Counsellors of State, in conjunction with the said Secretary, his Majesty not thinking it proper to confide in those who inspired him with a resolution to make a will.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Octob. 22, 1700.

We have, this day, letters from Madrid of the 8th, by the ordinary post. The Spanish Ambassador has one, of the 9th; and his Depeche is signed by the King himself, as several others were, that are sent into Italy. I suppose, this was done, to convince them, the more, that he was in a way of recovery: But you will find, by the inclosed, that there is little hopes of it. We have had no Courier, of late, which, since that time, would have come, in case of any alteration. That, which occasions the greatest discourtesy, is, his will; which he signed on the 3d. By all the letters, it is thought in favour of one of the Princes France; and, as to the persons concerned, and, who were witnesses to it, it is certain, they have been ever that way disposed, to prevent their Monarchy's being dismembered. Some letters do also say, That, since that, the Queen has prevailed with him to add a codicil: That some, that were named for the Regency, are changed; at last, the Queen seemed, after that, very easy. In short, there are all conjectures; and I am of opinion, that it will not be known, what it contains, till the King's death.

The Emperor's Envoy is gone to Paris, to meet Count

1700. had sent no exclusion to preclude him, not imagining he could be thought on. At first, the French Court did not seem pleased with the choice, but it was too late to oppose it; and therefore they resolved to gain him to their interests, in which they succeeded beyond what they then hoped for.

The King of Spain's will is accepted.
Burnet.

When the Court of France had notice sent them of the King of Spain's will, real or pretended, they seemed to be at a stand for some days; and the letters wrote from the Secretary's office gave it out for certain, that the King would adhere to the Partition treaty. But Madam de Maintenon had an unpeakable fondness for the Duke of Anjou; she therefore prevailed with the Dauphin to accept of the will, and set aside the treaty; and she engaged Monsieur de Pontchartrain to second this. They being thus prepared, when the news of the King of Spain's death came to Fontainebleau, where the Court was at that time, a Cabinet Council was called within two hours after, which met in Madam de Maintenon's lodgings, and late about three hours. Pontchartrain was for accepting the will, and the rest of the Ministry for adhering to the treaty. But the Dauphin joined, for accepting the will, with an air of positiveness, that he had never assumed before; so that it was believed to be done by concert with the King, who was reserved and seemed more inclined to the treaty. In conclusion, Madam de Maintenon said, What had the Duke of Anjou done, Count Aversberg, in his way to Spain, who, it is believed had some further instructions; and, it may be, in case the King of Spain was dead, the Emperor has given orders to declare, he accepts the treaty, though with some alterations. I cannot but think, that he has no other way to take, unless he has a mind to lose the whole. We shall, now, soon see, how our Parliament will behave in this affair.

Mr Stanhope to the Earl of Manchester,

Hague, Octob. 22, 1700.

The King arrived here last night.—His Majesty questioned me this morning what news of the King of Spain. I had not then received your advices, but answered him to the same purpose, by what Don Quiros had communicated to me. He intends to embark for England on Wednesday next, if wind and weather permit; though it is probable, an express, with what we fear from Spain, may keep him here some days longer, that being the important affair now on foot in Europe; yet whether in order to that, his Majesty's presence here, or in England, be of greater concern, I shall submit to greater Statesmen to determine. Don Quiros sets a good face on a bad game; says the militia of Spain, in the memory of men, made the Prince of Condé, as great a Captain as the Marquis d'Harcourt, raise the Siege of Fontarabia with dishonour, though he had fifty thousand men all regular troops; and he promises himself no less bravery from the present Spaniards in a cause, where their Honour, as well as their Monarchy, is at stake. This way of reasoning seems to us very extraordinary; and I am obliged at the same time to do him justice, in saying he has as little of thatrodomontade humour, as any of his countrymen I have ever known.

Monsieur Schonenberg to the Earl of Manchester.

Madrid, Octob. 22, 1700.

After having sent my dispatches of the 21st instant to the post, I just now learn, that the Catholic King, angry at those, who were present at the signing of the former will in favour of a second son of the Dauphin, made them all come before his Royal Person, and he has signed another will, that was closed up. Some say, that it was only a codicil relating to the first testamentary disposition, &c.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Fontainebleau, Octob. 24, 1700.

We have been expecting every day to hear the death of the King of Spain; but your Lordship will see by the inclosed, that he is rather better, it being the best account that is come. I have had none from Mr Schonenberg this post, which I wonder at. The Spanish Ambassador has a letter signed by the King himself, as others were that went into Italy. Notwithstanding all this, Monsieur d'Harcourt set out yesterday for Catalonia, and the troops are marching on that side. Monsieur la Prata, chief Engineer under Monsieur de Vauban, went some days before. The Emperor's Envoy is gone to Paris to meet Count Aversberg in his way to Spain. I found by him, that he was in hopes to have some further instructions. I do not know what they mean at Vienna, for all letters do agree, that the will, which the King of Spain has made, is in favour of a Prince of France for the whole Succession. Whether we shall agree to that, is another question, if France was willing to accept of it. I suppose you have had work enough with the Count de la Tour. His Master would fain find his account in this affair, as I perceive by his Minister; and the common report is, that he would give Savoy to France in lieu of Naples, which they will hardly persuade them to with all their rhetoric.

[While King William was at Loo, the Count de la Tour, the Duke of Savoy's Minister, came with a secret Commission from his Master. Don Bernardo de Quiros imagined it was to try to get the Duke named in the room of Archduke Charles. But the truth was, that the Duke, having learnt by the treaty of Partition, that he had no part in it, thought to reap some advantage from thence. For this reason, he had sent la Tour to the Court of France to complain, as he did, that, notwithstanding his consanguinity, the most Christian King had done nothing for him. At the same time, la Tour made a proposition, with an offer, if it was accepted, that the Duke should guaranty the treaty. The proposition was, that the Duke would resign to France the Duchy of Savoy with all its pretensions, in exchange for the Kingdom of Naples. The answer of the French Court was, that his proposition should be considered, but it must also be laid before the other Allies, England and Holland. This la Tour did, but without success. One of the principal reasons of its being rejected by King William and the States, was, that, the King of France having Savoy, with all its pretensions, just and unjust, he would be better able to assert them than the Duke; and, by that means, Geneva and the country of Vaud, where the Protestant Religion is professed, might be in danger. Besides, it was not disagreeable to give the Duke some mortification, for having, after his peace with France, caused a speech to be made to King James, which seemed directly contrary to that which la Tour had made at London, upon the King's advancement to the Throne. Lambert, Vol. I. p. 120.]

Vienna, Octob. 26, 1700.

There is no answer given to the new invitation made by the contracting parties to the Emperor to come into the treaty of Division, before which it cannot be said positively what his Imperial Majesty will conclude upon. Your Excellency judges very justly, that it appears to be his interest to accept the offer, when the condition of his affairs is considered; but his having refused it before, and the King of Spain being 1700. done, to provoke the King to bar him of his right to that Succession? And upon this all submitted to the Dauphin's opinion, and the King seemed overcome with their reasons.

The Duke of Anjou declared King of Spain.
Nov. 10.
N. S.
Lambert,
l. 230.
Though the matter was resolved on, yet it was not published till five days after. For then the French King, sending for the Duke of Anjou into his closet, said to him in the presence of the Marquis des Rios: 'Sir, the King of Spain has made you King. The Grandeess demand you, the People wish for you, and I give my consent. Remember only you are a Prince of France. But I recommend to you to love your People, to gain their affection by the lenity of your Government, and render yourself worthy of the Throne you are going to mount.' All the Princes of the blood came to congratulate the new King; but, The Duke however, the Duke of Orleans, the King of Orleans France's only brother, and his son the Duke of Chartres, protested against the will, because the Archduke was put next in the Succession to the will. Duke of Berry; whereas they alledged, that Ibid. the Duke of Orleans and his heirs ought to come before him, as younger son of Aime of Austria, whose renunciation could be of no more force than that of Maria-Teresa. However, this was no obstruction to the new King's setting out for Spain, which he accordingly did on the 4th of December, accompanied by his two brothers, being in some measure recovered, make it probable, that he will answer again in the negative. Nevertheless it is invincible what measures are taken to fence off the blow. It is true, there have been many consultations but either nothing is concluded in them, or no conclusion executed. And yet one sees very little emotion in the Imperial Family at the alarming news of the King of Spain's desperate illness, which would persuade one, that they very leisurely expected another miracle to be wrought in their favour. If the offer be made them after the King of Spain's death, perhaps the seeing themselves evidently unable to withstand the execution of the treaty may force them to yield to it, though their aversion to it be so great, that it must be a great stress to bring them to it. They have rather chosen hitherto to abandon themselves to providence and chance. They seem to flatter themselves, that their steadiness will make some impression, and procure them fairer offers. The Duchy of Milan, the Marquisate of Final, and the Stato delli Presiditi, would in all likelihood buy their consent; and they would rejoice heartily at the bottom to see them added to the Archduke's share, to which they would join themselves the Duchy of Mantua after the Duke's death. I am afraid they are not likely to be gratified in their desire; but they seem to think, that, rather than enter into a chargeable war, his most Christian Majesty will enlarge their portion. Your Lordship will be more easily and better informed, than I, of what disposition there may be hitherto.

Your Excellency will observe by the following account, in what condition this Court is to oppose the execution of the treaty. They have discouraged a good while of remounting and recruiting their troops, and give out, that they have money ready for it. I can scarce believe, they have money sufficient for remounting according to their own reckoning, and a great part of the Colonels will not undertake the work at the rates the Court offers. Yet it is said, that assignments are delivered to some of them. Their troops would amount to seventy thousand men, if they were complete; but they are far from it, and the cavalry half dismounted. They cannot dispense themselves from having near thirty thousand men in Hungary and Transylvania. Their places upon the Rhine are very thinly garrisoned, and will never be well furnished or repaired, though there be some artillery passed by from Buda towards Brisac. They have no forces near Italy, and very few within a great distance of it in quarters. The Emperor is between twenty and thirty millions of florins in debt, and pays extravagant interest. It has been discoursed, that the hereditary countries would take the payment of the debts upon them. I do not find any certainty thereof; but, if it should happen, there must be a term of years allowed for it, and they will scarce be able to give the Emperor any further aid. The Chamber of Finances is in so bad a reputation, that they have no credit, and have had much ado for a long time to supply the Emperor's necessities. I do not hear of any recruits, that are yet making, though I hearken after it; but peradventure in two months they may begin to make them, and they must begin some time, otherwise they will shortly have no troops at all. In fine, my Lord, it is apparent, that, whenever the King of Spain comes to die, this Court will be found unprepared to make any great resistance, as I believe any body, that is acquainted with the present constitution thereof, would easily own. But they will presume things cannot go worse for them, than according to the disposition of the treaty. They now hold daily conferences. We shall shortly see the result of them. I have asked audience three days together, and cannot yet have the honour to have one to deliver the King's orders.

Paris, Nov. 3, 1700.

Before I left Fontainebleau, I was with Monsieur de Tercy, who, I find, is well satisfied with the proceedings in Holland. I must own, that, during my stay there, the King took all occasions to oblige me. You know already, that Monsieur Galliere is gone to the Duke of Lorraine. The Duke of Savoy has declared, that he will not act against the treaty. His Ambassador here is now more in hopes than ever, that his Master will have some advantage in the Partage; but I found by Monsieur de Tercy, that the French King was satisfied with the division already made, and yet he would consent to any reasonable alteration, if that was to make the King, our Master, easy. This was meant in relation to our trade in the Levant; and, I suppose, that Monsieur de Tallard has already told you as much. He arrived here on Monday, late at night; and, the next morning, I was to wait on him. He expressed a great sense of the King's favours to him: That he was just going to Fontainebleau, to give the King's Master, all the satisfaction possible of the friendship of the King, and of the States-General; which he could do with great truth. In short, he seemed extremely pleased.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Nov. 3, 1700.

Here are letters from Madrid of the 22d past, by an express; which say, That, on the 21st, the King of Spain made a new will, in favour of the Archduke: That he called on those, that were present, and had persuaded him, in his sickness, to make the former in favour of the second son of the Dauphin; and shewed a very great dislike to what they had done, signing, in their presence, another. This last action has still increased the factions and discontents here.

Mr Methuen to the Earl of Manchester.

Lisbon, Nov. 4, 1700.

The 13th of the last month I received by an express, which came from Paris to the French Ambassador, his Majesty's commands to propose to the King of Portugal the forms or projects of the two acts of Accession and Admission, for his being comprehended in 1700. thers, who went with him as far as the frontiers of that Kingdom (1).

The King of France's An express of the King of France's accepting the will being sent to the Count de Briord at the Hague, he immediately went to the Pensionary, and, pursuant to the orders he had received, told him, that his Master, having taken into consideration the present situation of affairs, and seeing the Emperor had not acceded to the treaty, nor but few of the northern Princes, and that the King of England was uneasy at Sicily being in the hands of the French, he had, after two days mature deliberation, resolved to yield to the desires of the Spaniards, and give them the Duke of Anjou for King. My Master (added he) is very sensible he shall be a great loser by it; but he had rather renounce the advantages which would accrue to his Crown by the treaty of Partition, than give occasion for a war to the disturbance of all Europe; and therefore hopes his resolution will be approved, as being conducive to the public tranquillity. The Pensionary was struck with this, and made strong but fruitless remonstrances against it to Count Briord. The reason of the Count's speaking of King William's uneasiness about Sicily, was, because the King, before his departure for England, had proposed the giving it to the Elector of Bavaria, for fear (said Briord) the Parliament might be disgusted, if it remained to France, on account of the Levant trade, which might be obstructed by it.

The day after this notification, the States-General met earlier than usual to consider of it, 1700. but came to no resolution, because they wanted to know King William's intentions. However, after many consultations, they sent orders to Heemskerke, their Ambassador at Paris, to represent in a memorial, that they did not expect the resolution which his Most Christian Majesty had taken of accepting the King of Spain's will, contrary to the late treaty; and hoped, that as the time for the Emperor's acceding was not yet expired, and as they had, upon news of the King of Spain's death, renewed their instances to him, his Majesty would take the matter into consideration again, and adhere to the treaty in every article. To this memorial a very long answer was sent to the States, which was also dispatched with the King of France's resolution to all the Courts of Europe, the substance whereof was, That the King of France considered chiefly what was the principle design of the treaty, namely, to maintain the peace of Europe; and therefore, to pursue this, he departed from the words of the treaty, but adhered to the spirit, and chief intent of it. This infamous excuse, for so notorious a breach of faith, seemed to be an equivocation of so gross a nature, that it looked like the invention of a Jesuit Confessor, adding impudence to perjury. With this answer the King of France sent a letter to the States, wherein he told them, that the peace of Europe was so firmly established by the King of Spain's will in favour of his grandson, that in the Guaranty of the treaty of Repartition, that of Accession to be signed by the King of Portugal, and that of Admission by his Majesty. I have at last prevailed with the King of Portugal to sign that of Accession, which will be sent to England by the same express, which carries this; so that the King of Portugal will be Guaranty of the treaty for the division of the Spanish Monarchy, without any particular treaty or convention with England or Holland for that purpose.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Nov. 6, 1700.

The account we have from Fontainebleau is, that the King of Spain is very weak, and extreme ill again, and not like to live any time. The last will, which he made, and which I have already given you an account of, is kept here as a very great secret, and there is no mention made of it at Court, though I am satisfied it was the occasion of sending an express. There may be reasons for concealing it till they see what the Emperor will do.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Nov. 9, 1700.

We have now news, that the King of Spain died the 1st instant between two and three of the clock in the afternoon, which the inclosed will inform his Majesty of. The Cardinal Portocarrero was declared, by a Commission under the Privy Seal, chief Governor during his illness; and by the testament, which they have since opened, he is continued. He sent Monsieur de Blecourt a copy. The substance of it is, That whereas the King of Spain was satisfied, that the intention and design of the renunciation, which the late Queen of France, &c. made, was only in order to prevent the union of the two Monarchies in one person; and whereas the Dauphin has several sons, to whom in conscience the Succession does belong; he does therefore appoint and declare the Duke of Anjou his heir. In case he should die without children, or inherit the Crown of France, then to the Duke of Numb. XXVIII. VOL. III.

Berry, and, if the same should happen to him, then to the Archduke and his heirs: And he limits it at last to the Duke of Savoy and his heirs. He does also recommend to the Emperor and the King of France, a marriage between the Duke of Anjou and one of the Archduchesses, in order to keep up the same good understanding, that is at present.

The Queen finding, that she had no part in the Government, is fallen very ill. I waited upon Monsieur de Torcy, who gave me an account of these matters, and I did endeavour to learn what measures they intended to take. The King ordered a Council immediately, and I believe you will soon see Monsieur de Tallard. I can see they are very well pleased here with all these circumstances; and, what effect they will have, time must shew; though I am of opinion, that they will keep firm to the treaty, as that is most for their advantage.

Monsieur Zinzendorf assures me, that he has no private directions concerning the Emperor's accepting the treaty, in case of the news of the death of the King of Spain, as it was thought. I have had some discourse with him, and he is satisfied now, that there is no other party for the Emperor to take, and he does intend to write as much. He is very apprehensive lest France should now press the naming of another, as by treaty they may, the time being elapsed.

(1) This account may be compared with the following letter.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Jersey.

Paris, Nov. 12, 1700.

I am just come from Fontainebleau, where I received yours of October 28, concerning the Duke of Savoy; but I must now acquaint you, that there is an end of our treaty. This morning I was with Monsieur de Torcy, who began with saying, that he did not doubt I was sensible, that since they had an account of the King of Spain's death, and the disposition he had made by his will, great difficulties must have arisen: That the King had well considered the occasion and the intent of the late treaty with England, &c. which was 1700. that he did not doubt their approbation of his accession to the Spanish Crown. To this letter the States did not return an answer till the 8th of December, wherein they hoped, that his Majesty would consider, that they could not immediately declare upon an affair of so great moment, without consulting their respective Provinces. Besides, it was a matter which concerned in common both themselves and his Britannic Majesty, and consequently they could not act without his concurrence. This letter being delivered to the King of France by Monsieur Heemskerke, he replied, That the States did well to wait for the resolution of their Provinces, according to the constitution of their Government, and hoped their resolution would be agreeable to his wishes. In the mean time, he 1700. should be ready to concur in whatever the States should desire, for the security of the Spanish Netherlands.

These fair words were by no means satisfactory to the States, especially when they considered the haughty expressions in the long answer, not fit to be used to a Sovereign State. Soon after Don Bernardo, the Spanish Ambassador, received a letter from the new King for the States, dated December 18, at Poitiers. When this letter was offered to the States, the President of the week made some scruple to receive it, and desired the Ambassador to stay a few days before he delivered it. But, being told that it was ordered to be immediately presented, to prevent a war in Europe. That the Emperor not having signed, and the Duke of Savoy actually refusing to accept of Naples and Sicily; that there having appeared discontents both in England and Holland against the French being masters of those two Kingdoms, in relation to the trade of the Levant; besides that none of the Princes, that the treaty has been communicated to, have promised more than a bare neutrality; the King could not but think there was a necessity of accepting what the will of the King of Spain declared in favour of the Duke of Anjou. Then he read to me the motives, which he had drawn up, that I might the better inform his Majesty. I desired he would let me take the copy, which I send your Lordship, and most, that passed, is contained in it. You may easily imagine I had little to say, when he told me of the resolution the King had taken. It is certain, that the proceedings of the Emperor have put them in some measure on this necessity, for Monsieur de Torcy observed to me, that, if the King had refused, the Archduke had then a double title, viz. that of Philip IV. and that of the late King's will: And he could not tell but the Spanish Ambassador had orders to send word to Vienna, that, the moment the Emperor consented to the treaty, the Duke of Savoy had a good title; and his humour is so well known, that we are sure he would not let slip such an opportunity; and then there must have been a war, not likely to be soon ended, whatever the success would be: That the whole Kingdom must be conquered, the Spaniards being intirely against dividing their Monarchy. That the ships, we and Holland were to furnish, would not be sufficient for such a war: That it was very doubtful, whether England and Holland would engage themselves in a greater expence; which must necessarily be the consequence. That it was certain, that the treaty was more advantageous to France, and was what the King could have wished. He then ended, saying, That the King hoped, that the strength of these reasons would so far prevail with the King, our Master, that there might be still the same good understanding as ever; which was so necessary for the good and quiet of Europe. I made no other answer, than that I would faithfully acquaint the King with what he said to me, by order, on this subject. I only asked him, If I might have a copy of the will. He said, he would first ask the King, and then send it me. It will, now, be seen public. I have already acquainted Mr Secretary Vernon with the substance of it; but, for fear my servant, whom I dispatched on the 9th, should not be arrived, I now repeat, that the disposition of the will is in favour of the Duke of Anjou, and his heirs, &c.

The account of the King of Spain's death came on Tuesday, the 9th, about one o'clock in the afternoon; and, at three, there was a Council in Madam de Maintenon's lodgings; at which she was present, with the Chancellor, the Duke of Beauvillier, and Monsieur de Torcy. The Dauphin was out a-hunting. The next morning, there was another Council, in the same manner, when the Dauphin was present. Monsieur Bleau had sent a copy of the will, which the Regents had given him. On the 10th, the Spanish Ambassador received a Courier, with orders to notify the King's death. He had a letter also for this King, signed by the Regents; and the Queen's name was first. He went straight to Monsieur de Torcy; and, that night, there was another Council, where the matter was determined, as I suppose. On the 11th, the Spanish Ambassador had a private audience, when the will was read, all over, to the King; who declared, he accepted it. Soon after this, the Spanish Ambassador sent a Courier for Spain; and there is no doubt, but, as soon as he arrives, the Duke of Anjou will be proclaimed. I did perceive, that this would be their resolution; but Monsieur de Torcy did not explain himself to me, till this morning. The King will not declare it till on Monday next, when he will be at Versailles; and, I believe, the Duke of Anjou will, soon after that, go for Spain. Monsieur de Tallard desired me to let you know, That he should have sent the account of the King of Spain's death, as he promised; but that I did. He tells me, he has orders to be ready; and says, he shall soon be in England. I think, he ought to go. As to what is to be judged at this Court, by their look, I did perceive, that, the moment this resolution was taken, the King was very civil; but looked always much concerned, whenever I came near him.

It is, without dispute, by the Queen's signing, that she has been all along in the French interest, whatever she seemed to the Emperor's Minister. And, if the present posture of affairs is considered, as she was hated by all, this was the only way to save herself; and it was so managed, that, in June last, the King of Spain signed a will in favour of the Archduke; which was sent to Vienna. That made the Emperor proceed as he did. Besides, they have never obliged her in any thing she desired. The King of Spain cancelled that, and made this on the 2d of October. Monsieur Zinzendorf told me this in discourse; and he would not believe what he sees, now, to be possible; though he does not yet know, that the French King has accepted the will.

I cannot tell what resolution the King will take; and I am far from giving any opinion, though, if your Lordship will permit me, I cannot see but we must acquiesce. You are sensible of the posture of our affairs, and of the discontent there was in England against the treaty, inasmuch that my Lord Portland, and all, that were concerned in it, were the next Sessions to be sacrificed, if possible. I am satisfied, that this was the design; whether the Parliament will approve of it, is what I cannot say. I must desire of your Lordship, that you send my instructions in French, especially if I am to have an audience of the King, that so I may make use of the same expressions, which I will punctually observe. This is so nice a matter, and of so great a consequence, that you will forgive me, when I desire it.

It is observable, that, not long after the King of France's accepting the will, he caused Letters Patents to be registered in the Parliament of Paris, to preserve to the King of Spain, his grandson, his right to the Crown of France; in case the Duke of Burgundy, his elder

1700. presented, the President received it, adding, that it must not be thought strange, if the States did not answer it so soon as expected (1).

The Spaniards throw themselves into the hands of the French. Burnet.

During these transactions at the Hague, the Spaniards seeing themselves threatened with a war from the Emperor, who declared against both the treaty and will, and apprehending that the Empire, together with England and the United-Provinces, might be engaged to join in the war, and being unable to defend themselves, delivered all into the hands of France. And upon that, both the Spanish Netherlands, and the Duchy of Milan, received French garriſons; the French fleet came to Cadix; a squadron was also sent to the West-Indies; so that the whole Spanish Empire fell now, without a stroke of the sword, into the French power. All this was the more formidable, because the Duke of Burgundy had then no children; and, by this means, the King of Spain was in time likely to succeed to the Crown of France. And thus the world saw the appearance of a new universal Monarchy, like to arise out of this conjunction.

Great apprehensions of the danger Europe was now in. Ibid.

The King of Spain wrote to all the Courts of Europe, giving notice of his accession to that Crown; only he forgot England. And it was publicly given out, that he had promised the pretended Prince of Wales, that, in due time, he would take care of his interests. The King and the States-General were much alarmed, when they beheld the French possessed of the Spanish Netherlands. A great part of the Dutch army lay scattered up and down in those garriſons, more particularly in Luxemburg, Namur, and Mons; and these were now made prisoners of war. Neither officers nor soldiers could own the King of Spain, for their Masters had not yet done it. At this time, the French pressed the States very hard to declare themselves. A great party in the States were for owning him, at least in form, till they could get their troops again into their own hands, according to capitulation. Nor were they then in a condition to resist the impression, that might have been made upon them from the garriſons in the Spanish Guelder, who could have attacked them before they were able to make head. The States therefore came to a resolution of owning the King of Spain, and accordingly wrote a letter that same day to the French King for that purpose. This being done, their bat-talions were sent back, but they were ill used, contrary to capitulation, and the soldiers were tempted to desert their service; yet very few could be prevailed on to do it.

There was at this time a black appearance of a new and dismal scene. France was now in possession of a great Empire, for a small part of which they had been in wars (broke off indeed in intervals) for above two hundred years; while England, who ought to have protected and defended the rest, was, by wretched factions and violent animosities, running into a feeble and disjointed state. The King indeed, upon the news of the French King's resolution to accept the will, and recede from the treaty, was full of indignation to find himself so much abused, but he appeared quite the contrary. Inſomuch, that his cold and reserved manner, upon so high a provocation, made some conclude, that he was in secret engagements with France; and that he was resolved to own the new King of Spain, and not to engage in a new war (2). This seemed elder brother died without heirs. These letters were given in December; but were not sealed till January, nor registered till the 1st of February. They were, says Lambert, (l. 388.) not only contrary to the renunciation of Maria Teresa, but may moreover, one day, occasion disputes, to set aside the famous, but trifling renunciations, made at the peace of Utrecht.

(1) While the States were thus delaying to declare themselves, an accident happened, by which they gained some time. Briard, after a public audience, having invited to dinner, according to custom, some of the Members of the States-General, and the entertainment lasting a good while, he wanted to make water. But thinking it uncivil to rise from table on that account, he brought upon himself a stoppage of urine, which was like to have killed him. Surgeons were sent for from Amsterdam, but, the indisposition continuing, an express was dispatched to Versailles, and Count d'Avaux was sent to carry on the negotiations. However, by this means above a month was gained, for d'Avaux did not come till Feb. 6. N. S.

(2) The reader may see the progress of affairs in this remarkable period, in the following extract from Mr Cole's Memoirs.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Count Zinzendorf had an audience of the King soon after the ceremony of declaring the Duke of Anjou King of Spain. That was appointed before he knew of this: It was to acquaint the King, That the Queen of the Romans was brought-to-bed of a Prince. He made all the haste he could to Paris, to let me know, that the Duke of Anjou was declared. I fear, the Emperor may thank himself; for it is probable, that he might have prevented it. He tells me, that he has news, by a Courier, that the Emperor's troops are marching for Italy; but I do not always rely upon his news: We shall soon hear, if it be so.

I do assure you, there is great joy at St Germain's. The late King goes, this day, to wait on the Duke of Anjou. I was, last night, at Monſieur's, who is at Paris, where I found Lord Melfort; who gave himself other airs, than he used to do.

I am just now told, That an offer is made to the Elector of Bavaria, to continue in the Government of the Netherlands, during his life; and that this new King of Spain will confirm it to him.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Novem. 20, 1700.

Since my last, there is another Courier arrived to the Spanish Ambassador, with the intire will; for, before, they had only an abstract. There is also a codicil, which was added to the will on the 21st of October; and relates only to the Queen's dowry, which was but three hundred thousand ducats, and, now, it is four. She has the choice of Naples, Milan, Sicily, or Flanders; where she is to govern with a Council; which the new King has power to appoint. There are some letters, which say, That Count de Harrach, the Emperor's Minister, has made a protestation against the will, both as to the matter and manner; where he alleges, that the King's hand was guided.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Novem. 27, 1700.

My being at Fontainebleau was the reason of my being so soon informed of the intentions of the Court. They could not well do otherwise than tell me; for, when we had the news of the King of Spain's death, I pressed Monſieur de Torcy to tell me what measures they would keep, in relation to the treaty. He answered me, from time to time, in a doubtful manner,

1700. so different from his own inclinations, and from all the former parts of his life, that it made many which gave me reasons to suspect what was doing: So, at last, he had orders to acquaint me with it. Besides, he said, it was proper, that the King should know it, otherwise, than by the public news.

Mr Secretary Vernon to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, Nov. 18, 1700. O.S.

I have received your Excellency's letter, of the 24th instant, N.S. and have laid it before his Majesty; but the King has not given me any thing, in command, at present, to write to you. Their resolutions are taken; therefore his Majesty may be allowed to consider a little, what may be the consequence of so sudden a change in that Court; as likewise to expect, what are the sentiments of other Princes and States, who are equally concerned in the preservation of the peace of Europe, and the preventing the balance of power from being broken, by the uniting too many Dominions under any one Prince; which was the just foundation of the late treaty. But, how does it yet appear, that the security of Europe is better provided for, by a Prince of France being made King of Spain? Or, what care is taken to satisfy the world therein?

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

I was very much in doubt about my going to Versailles, till I received your's of the 3^d instant, which determined me. I had a very good excuse, because all, that go there now, have put their coaches in mourning, and mine are not yet done. They do already say at Court, that, till I had orders to compliment the Duke of Anjou, I do well not to appear there. I did find by the Dutch Ambassador, who went yesterday for an answer to a memorial he had given in by order of the States, that Monsieur de Torcy did intimate to him as much, as from himself.

The Duke of Anjou is to set out on Saturday next. I cannot tell but it may be deferred; and, if so, I shall be under some difficulties. Monsieur de Tallard was with me. He talks of going, but he has as yet no orders. I am still of opinion, that you will not see him very soon, unless the King our Master does signify his consent to what has passed here.

The Prince of Pavement has proclaimed the Duke of Anjou, and has writ to the Spanish Ambassador here to assure the new King of his fidelity, and he hopes he shall receive his orders before he goes for Spain, which he will punctually observe. The Savoy Ambassador has received orders to compliment him on his accession to the Crown, which he did yesterday. The Emperor's Envoy has no orders as yet; and they do here not seem to value what the Emperor can do. I am nevertheless told for certain, that a marriage will be proposed to the Emperor for one of the Archduchesses, according to the desire of the late King of Spain, by his will. If that is not accepted, then they will marry him to a daughter of the Duke of Savoy, who is about thirteen years old.

They begin to say here, that, as for Holland, if they are dissatisfied, the King of Spain ought to bring them to obedience, as formerly belonging to that Monarchy. And, if we dispute, the little Gentleman at St. Germain's is to be made use of. I wish that may not be the consequence at last, though we should act otherwise.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Stanhope.

Paris, Dec. 3, 1700.

The Duke of Anjou sets out to-morrow for Spain—We here as yet of no proposals to make the Dutch secure; and I believe there is no thought of it, since they seem to say, that this will depend on Spain, and not on them. Monsieur de Bedmar has been here, and was at Marly. I am told, that the French King assured him, that, if there was occasion for his assistance in Flanders, he would send what troops they desired. I cannot think, that the Elector of Bavaria will keep the Government long, notwithstanding what he has done, neither will the Dutch troops be permitted to stay there. Whatever proposals will be made to the States, they will come from the French Ambassador at the Hague, and I hope you will let me know what steps he makes—I fear that the affairs of Europe are in a very ill condition, and that in a few years France will be master of us all. There goes a report about Paris, that I have asked an audience of the King, which he denied me, because I did not acknowledge the Duke of Anjou. You will do well to let every body know, that there is no such thing, and that I have no orders of that nature. What I had to say was much the same with what the Dutch Ambassador said, and I only acquainted Monsieur de Torcy with it, and did not give it in writing.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Dec. 4, 1700.

I take it for granted, that the Duke of Anjou is to set out this morning.—I intend to go to Court on Tuesday next, and see what is doing.—I do take all the care I can to behave myself as prudently as is possible at this juncture, since all persons eyes are upon me; which I conceive is right, whatever the King's resolution may be at last. But it is impossible to prevent idle discourses here. I suppose you will hear, that I had asked an audience of the King, and was refused, by reason I had not complimented the new King of Spain. There was no ground for this; you know very well, that I had no occasion of doing it, having received no orders of that nature: Yet I am of opinion, that this might possibly have happened, if I had, and that there will be soon a declaration, that those Ministers, whose Masters do not own the Duke of Anjou, will not be received here. Their way has always been to carry things high. Not that I think, that they are in a condition of doing it, were other Princes united.

Yesterday I received the inclosed from Monsieur Schonberg to the King. What he acquaints me with is not worth taking notice of; but I am told from other hands, that there are a great many Spaniards dissatisfied, and who do not approve of the conduct of the Regents. The Queen does not come to the Council; perhaps this is only, that the House of Austria may have a better opinion of her. The Count de Harrach has entered a protestation; as has also the Pope's Nuncio, in relation to Naples; and, his pretence is, that the King, dying without children, it reverts to the Pope, as his Fief. Both these protests I have sent you, with the French King's letter, in answer to those of the Spanish Regents. The style is worth observing. I am told, that orders are given for a fleet to be set out. It is not yet known of what number of ships it is to consist. Some of the forces, that were towards Bayonne, have orders to march this way.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Decemb. 8, 1700.

I can now assure you that Monsieur de Tallard takes his leave of the King, to-morrow, and will be soon in England. I did perceive by Monsieur de Torcy, that he has a letter to the King; so that a little time will shew what we are to expect. I did not enter into discourse on that subject, nor on the late proceedings of theirs; and it is to no purpose. The less I say, the better, unless I do it by order. What assurance Europe will have of it's security, I cannot tell, unless what they say here will be thought sufficient, viz. that the French King will end his days in peace, and that his ambition is now satisfied. Here is arrived a Courier from Madrid. The letters say, That they had proclaimed

1700. many conclude, that he found himself in an ill state of health, the swelling of his legs being much increased, and that this might have such effects on his mind, as to make him less warm and claimed the Duke of Anjou; and that there were shewn great expressions of joy in all parts. They have also the same account from Naples. We shall soon see what the Emperor thinks of all this matter. It is certain, this might have been prevented, if he had accepted the treaty. And, as it is, it may be very fatal to England, even without remedy. We are not united enough at home, to expect any good; and, I fear, that those, that disapproved of the late treaty, will soon have reason to wish it had took place. My being in France has not given me a better opinion of their sincerity, or good inclination towards us: And I cannot see, let this matter turn which way it will, that there is any great occasion for the King to be at the expence of an Ambassador, here; neither do I believe, that Monsieur de Tallard will stay long with you.

Hague, Decem. 10, 1700.

A Courier was last night dispatched by the States to Paris, with their answer to the King's haughty letter. The answer contains, after such thanks as he expects, that his Majesty knows very well the nature of their constitution to be such, that they can take no new resolutions, especially in matters of this great importance, without communicating them first to their Provinces; which they are more indispensably obliged to observe in this case, because the treaty of Partage was in a most solemn manner communicated to, and approved, and ratified by, them; and therefore they cannot lay the treaty aside, but with the same essential formalities it was made: That they would immediately communicate his Majesty's letter to their Provinces, and hoped he would please to allow them so much time, as till they could know their minds about this weighty affair, seeing it was impossible for them to take any resolution of themselves. Something I hear was mentioned of the King, as their Stadtholder, whom they must also consult. The same in substance was sent last night in writing by the States Agent, both to the French and Spanish Ambassadors, here. This expedient will, probably, give them a little more time to consider what they do. They seem to be grown much cooler, and more moderate, than they were at the first news, when they talked of nothing but war; and I am now verily persuaded, the party, acknowledging the new King, will, e'er long, prevail, by a great majority. One said to me, to-day, They would have been pleased, if their Ambassador at Paris had done it, tho' without orders; for then they had been at liberty to have owned or disowned his action, according as they found it suit with their interest afterwards. The Emperor's Court makes a great noise, and talks of sending an army into the Milanese early in the spring: But little is to be expected from a Prince so irresolute, and whose finances are in so lamentable a disorder; besides that, the German name, by their barbarous actions in the last war in Italy, is become much more odious than the French; and, besides that, their unreasonable project, of reviving his antiquated pretensions to the Imperial Fiefs, has made all there fear, and consequently hate, the nation.

While things are in this uncertain condition between this State, and France, and Spain, nothing can be moved on either side about the Dutch troops in Flanders. It would be most natural to expect the proposals from the French, rather than Spain; because they are jealous of the French, and not of Spain: But, in discourse with the French Ambassador on the subject, he told me, If these people had any thing to move concerning it, they ought to address themselves to the King of Spain; for it no way concerned the King, his Master.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Decemb. 11, 1700.

I cannot tell from whence they have, at St Germain's, No. 28. Vol. III.

an apprehension, that the Prince of Wales will be carried away into England, with his own consent; and, upon this, they have increased his guards; whereas, formerly, he had six, he has now fourteen. They think their game so very sure, that there is no occasion he should make such a step. Besides, the changing of his religion will never be suffered; and they have lately declared, That they would rather see him dead.

Just as I had wrote this letter, Count Zinzendorf came to me, and told me, He had received orders to go to Court, now the Duke of Anjou is gone, as he used to do. He is to represent to Monsieur de Torcy the right the Emperor conceives he has to the Crown of Spain. He also tells me, That the Count de Gees, at the Hague, has full instructions; and that there is an Envoy named for England, who will be soon there. In short, I do perceive the Emperor is willing, now, to do any thing the King shall like—Count Zinzendorf says also, That orders are given for the troops to march towards Italy and the Rhine.

Paris, Dec. 15, 1700.

Monsieur de Tallard is now with you, which will bring this great affair to a point. I cannot perceive, that he has orders to make any proposal in relation of what may make England and Holland secure; and I am unwilling to make any steps that way, in order to find out what their thoughts are here, till I am a little informed of the opinion the King is of, and in what manner he could wish this would end. Some pretend, that they will give all the assurances, that can be desired; but I take it, that we should, if possible, have something more substantial. To others they say, that what relates to Flanders, is not in their power, but what proposals are to be made, must be made to Spain, which cannot be done, till we acknowledge the new King. Here is a discourse, as if Spain would exchange Flanders for Roussillon, or some other place near them. It is not improbable, but this may be done in time, though at present they know their interest too well to give such jealousies, as this would do. The Emperor's late proceedings, and the account, that he is sending forces into Italy, have made the French take the resolution of sending Count de Tessé to Milan. He is declared General of the French forces, and goes away post on Saturday next. Twenty-five battalions, and three thousand horse, are marching with all diligence towards Savoy. It is said, Count Tessé is to see in what condition affairs are there, and to concert with Prince Vaudemont; whom, as I believe, they begin to mistrust, notwithstanding what has passed. There is no doubt but he is to ask the Duke of Savoy for leave to pass through his country; so that now he must explain himself, and they are not sorry it happens so. Monsieur Zinzendorf was yesterday at Versailles. He had orders to acquaint Monsieur de Torcy, that the Emperor had received a letter from the States-General, jointly with their Confederates, the Kings of England and France, whereby they still invite him to sign the treaty, and say, that he had yet time to do it: That Monsieur de Villars had, notwithstanding this, declared, that his Master had accepted the will, and that the Duke of Anjou was King of Spain, which was a sort of contradiction. The answer, which Monsieur de Torcy made him, was, That he did not know what the States may have done, but that the King had no part in it: That he knew what had passed here in relation to the Duke of Anjou, and that the King was resolved to support him with all his forces, which he did not doubt but was easy to do. This was the substance of what Monsieur de Torcy told me. Count Zinzendorf did only set out the Right of the Emperor to Spain, by the will of Philip IV, the renunciation of France, and several treaties. There is no doubt but that the answer he had to all this was in very high terms,

1700. and active, less disposed to involve himself in new troubles; and that he might think it too inconsiderate a thing to enter into a new war, 1700 that was not likely to end soon, when he felt himself terms, which I think could not have been expected otherwise.

Monsieur de Schonenberg to the Earl of Manchester.

Madrid, Dec. 16, 1700.

The Marquis of Harcourt is returned hither since Monday last. They care for him extremely, and it is certain, that his Commission extends itself to affairs of more importance, than the regulating only what relates to the reception of the new King. It seems, that those, who have the greatest credit in the Junta of the Regency (that is to say, the Cardinal Portocarrero and his adherents) have made a vow to abandon the fate of the Monarchy to the arbitration and the good-will of France. Who would have thought, two years ago, that the Spaniards should become so cordially tractable on this article? Thus it is true, that political maxims are no less subject to variation than other affairs. In the mean while, this Court has sent orders to the Government of the Netherlands, ordering all, without exception, absolutely to obey every thing, that his most Christian Majesty shall judge proper to order the new King to do. Orders are also sent to transport into the Milanese the few troops, that remain in Catalonia; and it is resolved to raise fifteen hundred men in Italy, to be transported to Flanders, whence they will, no doubt, endeavour to remove the foreign troops, to put the French in their places.

It is almost inconceivable how much animosity the ill-intentioned at this Court shew against England and the United Provinces; but we have reason to hope, that the perfect union of those two Protestant powers (so absolutely necessary in the present conjuncture) will dissipate the ill designs of their implacable enemies.

What is most ridiculous in these indiscreet Ministers is, that the Monarchy is so generally decayed, that of themselves they can do nothing; so that, if they should come to be attacked by very moderate forces, they would be every way exposed to irreparable losses, and especially in America. It is true, that they would be safe under the protection of France; but, in order to make them secure every way, as powerful as that Crown is, it would be obliged to exhaust itself.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Dec. 18. 1700.

The Dutch Ambassador had yesterday his audience. The King's answer was, that he waited with impatience for the last resolution of the States, which he hoped would be comfortable to what he so much desired, the peace and quiet of Europe; and that he might assure his Masters of his friendship, which he would be glad to continue to them. Monsieur de Torcy told him afterwards, that the King was ready to give the States all the assurances they could desire, in relation to their security. I am told, that the French Ambassador at the Hague has the like orders. It is certain, that here they are not for war, if it can be avoided; and that is not to be doubted, since they cannot hope for any advantage by it more than they have. They seem to value but little what the Emperor can do, yet they are resolved to take right measures in case of the worst. The posture of affairs at Vienna is such, that, if the Princes of Italy were not resolved to oppose the Imperialists, yet they would not be in a condition to march these three months; but it seems, there is such hatred against them there, by reason of their proceedings in the late war, that I find by all the Italian Ministers, that they like French troops better than Germans; so that I cannot see, but the great preparations, that are now talked of, will come to nothing. The Emperor would be glad, that others would undertake his cause.

The Envoy of the Great Duke had on Thursday last a public audience, to congratulate the King on the Duke of Anjou's accession to the Crown of Spain.

I have your's of the 2d, and I shall take what care I can to inform you of what orders are given in relation to the fitting out of a fleet. There is no doubt, but they are taking their measures to have it in readiness; and they say here, that we are doing the same.

Mr Secretary Vernon to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, Decemb. 10, 1700.

I now send you back Mr Chetwynd, his Majesty having thought it proper, that he should bring you the inclosed letter for Monsieur Schonenberg; which his Majesty would have you send to Madrid, by the quickest and safest way you can think of. I send you the letter unsealed, that you may see it contains the copy of an instruction, which his Majesty gives to Dr Aglionby, who is appointed to carry his Majesty's answer to the letter, that his Majesty received, the last week, from the Regency of Spain, notifying the King's death, and the disposition he made of the Crown. He is ordered to go by the way of Graye, and, I believe, will set forwards to-morrow. His Majesty would be glad, that he might reach Madrid, before the King of Spain's arrival there, it being of consequence, that no time should be lost in executing these instructions. But, since he may be delayed by contrary winds, his Majesty has thought fit, that a copy of the instructions should be sent directly, and with speed, to Mr. Schonenberg, that he may, in the mean time, make his Majesty's intentions, of living in his former friendship with Spain, rightly understood, and use his endeavours, either to keep them in, or bring them to the same disposition towards us.

Now your Excellency sees, what will be his Majesty's conduct towards Spain, if he meets with suitable returns from thence; his Majesty would have it serve as an instruction to you, how to govern yourself in the conversations you may have an opportunity for with the Spanish Ambassador, residing at Paris, or with such of the Grandees, as are coming thither from the Regency, to prevent their taking any ill impressions, in relation to his Majesty and his Kingdom. But you will defer acquainting him with what his Majesty has now ordered, since it may be doubted, what use he would make of such an information in that Court. It seems fit likewise, that nothing be said of the particulars to the Emperor's Minister.

—Monsieur Tallard took occasion to tell me, yesterday, That he never intended to stay in England above three months. That he will be expired in March next; and therefore, about February, he hoped to have orders to return home; but his Master would send another to supply his place, and such a one, as should be agreeable to his Majesty. He touched upon the alterations, that had happened since his being here last, as to their accepting the will. He said, The reasons for it were contained in a memorial sent into Holland; which he did not doubt but I had seen, and he could repeat them all by heart, if it were necessary. He did repeat most of what shewed the necessity of accepting the will, thereby to prevent the Emperor's and the Duke of Savoy's having a new title to the Crown of Spain. He said, if the Emperor thought of invading Milan, his pretensions would be unjust, since they had the original grant, by which Charles V conferred that Duchy upon Philip II, and his heirs, as well females as males. I asked him, whether, if the Emperor thought he had a right to Milan, and would assert it, that that ought to give jealousies, or disturbances in parts far remote from it, and whether that would occasion the marching of French troops into Flanders. That we were surprised to hear of messengers sent to the Elector of Bavaria, to tell him, that the French troops should march into Flanders, where-ever he thought it necessary. I asked if Holland had given any occasion for it, or whether they imagined any alarm could come from thence. All he answered to it was, that he had not heard of any such messages or orders. I told him, that the advantages, which accrued to France and Spain by the accepting the will, were visible; but what had others to rely upon, who saw their treaty laid aside, from whence they promised themselves a prospect of peace and tranquillity? His answer was, that Spain would remain as it has been, and they might have the same contests with them hereafter, as they had formerly. But his Master lost by complying with the will, but was satisfied, that justice had been done to his family, and the preserving of peace was all he aimed at.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

I was yesterday at Verfailles, and I continue to go as I did formerly. I know they are a little suspicious of what we are doing, and will be more so in case Monsieur de Tallard believes all that is said at London. I did take notice to Monsieur de Torcy, in general words, of the change of the scene of Europe in a little time: That all Princes would now be obliged to begin again, and to take measures conformable to the present posture of affairs. He could not but allow it; but still he was of opinion, that the peace of Europe was much more secured by this alteration. When I mentioned Portugal, he said they could not think themselves in any danger, since the King had ordered his Minister there, as soon as he accepted the will, to assure the King of Portugal, that he was ready to enter into a league offensive and defensive with him.

By this you will see they are before-hand with any proposal or offer the Emperor can make. As to Holland, the French Ambassador there will have given them assurances; but you may rely on what I acquaint you, that it will be on condition, that their troops leave Flanders, which they will not admit here on any terms; and I am apt to think, that they will be ingenuous enough to own it. Yet at the same time they will send no French troops, but in defence of the country, in case the new King of Spain desires it. They will, if possible, make the States declare themselves before the meeting of our Parliament. There is nothing stirring at St Germain's. They now disown and are ashamed of what I told you concerning the Prince of Wales.

Whitehall, Decem. 3, 1700.

Count de Tallard at his audience delivered his letter to the King, saying very little at the presenting of it, and then stood silent. The King said something to him about his own inclinations to preserve the peace of Europe, in manifesting whereof he might perhaps have advanced too far; but he was very desirous, that all the world should be satisfied of his dispositions towards the public tranquillity. I understand the Ambassador's answer was to this effect, That his Master had the same inclinations to peace, and thought he had given a proof of it by accepting the King of Spain's will. His Majesty seemed not to understand how that could be made out, and the Ambassador proceeded no farther, but only made a compliment on his own account, how much he valued the honour of returning hither again, to assure his Majesty of his profound respects, and so took his leave, and went immediately back to London. His Majesty had not opened the letter, while the Ambassador was with him, it not being usual; but, reading it afterwards, he finds it is there said of the Ambassador, "That he will explain distinctly the just reasons, that have obliged us to prefer the public tranquillity to our private interests, by accepting,

"as we have done, the will of the late Catholic King, in favour of the King our grandson." And therefore his Majesty seems a little surpris'd, that he did not enlarge further at his audience, or desire some other time for the doing it.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Decem. 25, 1700.

A person of distinction is come here from Prince Vaudemont; his name is Colmanero. It is thought, that he brings an account of the affairs at Milan, and of the march of some of the Emperor's troops towards Italy. Whereupon sixteen batallions are ordered thither, who are to embark, the eighth of next month this style, at Antibes.—All the forces, that were in Catalonia and towards Bayonne, are marching into Dauphiné. The army, that is intended for Italy, is to consist of sixty batallions, and eighty squadrons of horse; four Lieutenant-Generals, and six Major-Generals. The two first of the Lieutenant-Generals are to embark with these sixteen batallions. It is said, that the whole army will amount to forty thousand men, if there be occasion. There is no doubt but they will send what they can, since they may by these means not only oppose the Imperialists entering into Italy, but they may attack them in their country.

I was yesterday to make a visit of ceremony to Monsieur de Chamillard. I was willing to know his thoughts a little on what has happened, by way of discourse, which cannot have any consequences. His expression, as to Holland, was, that he owned it was very difficult to prevent people's fears of what may happen hereafter; but that in great measure it may be done by making of leagues offensive and defensive with each other, &c. and that the King would contribute all he could towards it. It is certain, that at present they do not desire to break with England. What they will aim at, here, is the sending the Dutch troops out of Flanders, and I am satisfied that is their design; so that it is very proper, that Monsieur de Tallard should be brought to explain himself on that subject. His coming so abruptly to Hampton-Court, before he had an answer from you, shews the nature of the man. But besides, as they suspect what we are doing, so I see they are here in the last impatience to know our resolutions; and there is not a time I go to Verfailles, that they do not expect I should say something of that matter.

Whitehall, Decem. 16, 1700, O. S.

Count Tallard has not been at Court since his audience on Wednesday, nor have I seen him, or heard from him, since I made him my visit that day. I do not know, whether he has taken any thing amiss; that he can have no reason for it, you will judge by the accounts I have sent you. If you find therefore, that the accounts he has writ into France are different from what I sent you last post, you will endeavour to make things rightly understood, that we may not fall into coldness upon being misapprehended. But this reserved humour, M. de Tallard seems to be in, looks as if he had writ something home, upon which he expected further orders.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Dec. 29, 1700.

Monsieur de Torcy mentioned to me the project of a league between England, France, Spain, and Holland, for the securing of Flanders; and any other Prince may come into it. Monsieur Lelienrost had made this proposal; and the King, here, is ready to consent to it, and give all sort of assurances, that can be desired; and Barnet.

The Earl of Rochester was now set at the head of affairs, and was to bring the Tories into the King's and he hoped, I had, or would acquaint the King with the disposition they were in, to contribute towards the public peace. I said, That it could not be doubted, but the King had the same desire and concern for the peace of Europe, which was manifest by the treaty; and it was plain, that he could have no other prospect. As to the proposal of Monsieur Lelienroot, I knew nothing of it; but, I supposed, the meaning of it was, that all things, in Flanders, should remain as they are. Then he explained himself, and said, That, as the King did not intend to send any troops there, so it could not be expected, that the Dutch should stay there, except only such as belong to the King of Spain. I have long perceived, that this was their design; I only said, that I thought Spain could never apprehend any thing, from the Dutch troops remaining there, though I could not tell, but it might give apprehensions to others, if they were removed. He would have argued the matter, but I avoided it. I am confident that, if in Spain it should be approved of, it will be opposed here: Yet, if the Emperor can make any head, so as to be able to give them trouble, and Portugal should be dissatisfied, as, I hear, they are, I cannot but think they may be brought to what terms we please.

Monsieur Schonenberg to the Earl of Manchester.

Madrid, Dec. 30, 1700.

The affairs, here, continue to represent a lively image of the infancancy of human affairs, the Regency of Spain doing all that it can to draw on it the yoke of France; but, provided England and Holland keep firm, there may be means found to make them return to their true interest, and to maintain the new King in a convenient independency.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 1, 1701.

I cannot in the least complain of Monsieur de Torcy. He is extremely civil to me; but, in general, there is a mighty shyness, of which I take no sort of notice, and do as I used to do. All things move, here, as the King takes notice of them; and, since the accepting of the will, he has never spoken a word to me, tho' I continue to make my Court every Tuesday.

I am told, That the French King has wrote again to the States, to declare themselves, by such a time; else he shall look upon them, as taking measures with the Emperor, and act accordingly, to prevent their designs. By what I perceive of things, this was not so peremptory, as it was said; though, that they will press the States, is not to be doubted. I am informed, just now, That an express is come from Madrid; and that the Regents have desired the French King to accept the Generalship of the Monarchy of Spain; and, that they have sent orders to all the Viceroyes, Governors, &c. in all parts, to obey his orders, punctually, in all matters whatsoever. If this be true, as it is very probable, one may judge what will be the consequence.

Whitehall, Dec. 23, 1700, O. S.

Your Excellency's letter, of the 29th instant, arrived yesterday; and, as soon as I had decyphered it, I laid it before his Majesty, being then at Hampton-Court. His Majesty commanded me to acquaint you, That he does not know what Monsieur de Lelienroot's project is, any further, than the account you give of it; nor does he know upon what grounds he proposes it; but he supposes it arises from Monsieur Lelienroot, or Monsieur Palmguist, without any directions from the King of Sweden.

His Majesty approves of what you replied to Monsieur de Torcy, upon his explaining, That it was the intention of that Court, not to allow of the continuance of the Dutch troops in Flanders. If these methods are pursued, it will be hard to make it understood, that they are meant to free people from their jealousies and apprehensions.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 8, 1701.

I had the favour of your's, of Decemb. 23. I take it, that the proposals, which Monsieur Lelienroot makes, are of himself, and not by order; and that Monsieur Palmguist does the same thing here. They might have their ends in it, for the service of their Master; but the success, the King of Sweden has had lately, may be, will put an end to all those projects.

Mr Secretary Vernon to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, Dec. 30, 1700, O. S.

Count Wratisslaw, the Emperor's Envoy, arrived here on Saturday last. He goes, to-morrow, to Hampton-Court, where his Majesty has appointed him a private audience. I hear, he already begins to discourse of both the Emperor's pretensions, as well to the Spanish Succession, as to the Fief of Milan; and that they are publishing a manifesto at Vienna, in maintenance of each of those titles; and are resolved to justify them, though they stand alone in the defence of them; but, they say, they cannot fall alone, since their ruin must draw others after them.

His Majesty is not very well; his appetite abates, and his legs are more swelled; but it chiefly arises from great thoughtfulness, in relation to the public.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 12, 1701.

I cannot but think, by the proceedings of the Regents of Spain, that they are resolved to have the French King for their King; and that the Duke of Anjou is to have only the name. There is another express come from them; by which they acquaint this King, That they have sent orders to their Ministers in all Courts, to act in concert with the French, and to obey the orders, which the French King shall send them; and to let them know, that Spain shall be included in whatever treaty France shall think fit to make; and that they may sign it, without staying for further orders from them. It is certain, that this King said, on this occasion, that he was Le premier Ministre du Roy d'Espagne: I am of opinion, that the use he will make of this power, is, that he will shew all Europe, that, whoever intends to keep any measures with Spain, it must be by the means of France, or, at least, with their approbation. Besides, having such a power, the French troops may possess themselves of what places they please. So that there is some reason to fear, that, in case things should begin to look like a war, the Dutch troops in Flanders may pass their time ill. I am satisfied, that the French will avoid doing any thing of this nature, as long as they can, in hopes of preventing a war; and the measures, they now seem to take, are such, that they may not be esteemed the aggressors, but rather on the defensive. They are too sensible of the condition of France, where there are no means left to raise any considerable sum, but by a capitation, which is already signed; but, unless there be occasion, it will not be levied. It is a very hard tax on the people, especially when all other impositions remain as they were, during the late war, with an augmentation of five millions of livres for this year. The lottery, which, it was thought, would have succeeded, comes to nothing.

It is now thought, here, that the war in Italy is certain; and this Court endeavours to persuade the Pope, and the rest of the Princes of Italy, to form a league against the Emperor; for, say they, without something 1700. King's service. He was himself declared Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1); and, that the most eminent man of the Whigs might not oppose them in the new Parliament, they got Mr Montague, now Auditor of the Exchequer, to be made a Baron. He took the title of Hallifax, which was sunk by the death of that Marquis without issue-male. The Lord Godolphin was made first Commissioner of the Treasury; the Lord Tankerville Lord Privy-Seal, in the room of the Lord Lenfale deceased; and Sir Charles Hedges, one of the Judges of the Admiralty, was appointed one of the Principal Secretaries of State, in the room of the Earl of Jersey. The Tories had continued, from the King's first accession to the Throne, in a constant opposition to his interests. Many of them were believed to be Jacobites in their hearts, and they were generally much against the Toleration, and violent enemies to the Dissenters. They had been backward in every thing, that was necessary for carrying on the former war; they had opposed taxes as much as they could, and were against all such, as were easily levied, and less sensibly felt by the people; and were always for those, that were most grievous to the nation, hoping, that, by these heavy burdens, the people would grow weary of the War and of the Government. On the contrary, the Whigs, by supporting both, were become less acceptable to the nation. In elections their interests was much sunk; every new Parliament was a new discovery, that they were become less popular; and the others, who were always opposing and complaining, were now cried up as the Patriots. In the three last Sessions, the Whigs had shewn such a readiness to give the King more force, together with a management to preserve the grants in Ireland, that they were publicly charged as betrayers of their country, and as men, who were for trusting the King with an army. In short, they were accused of too ready a compliance with the humours and interests of Courts and Favourites, and were therefore generally censured and decried. And now, since they had not succeeded to the King's mind, some about him possessed him with this, that either they would not, or could not serve him. In some of them indeed, their principles lay against those things, whereas the Tories principles naturally led them to make the Crown great and powerful. It was also said, that the great opposition made to every thing, which the King desired, and the difficulties, that had been of late put upon him, flowed chiefly from the hatred borne to those, who were employed by him, and who had brought in their friends and creatures into the best posts. And they were now studying to recover their lost popularity, which would make them cold, if not backward, in complying with what the King might desire for the future. The Whigs also began to complain of the King's conduct, of his minding affairs so little, of his being so much out of the Kingdom, and of his ill choice of favourites; and they imputed the late miscarriages to errors in conduct, which they could neither prevent nor redress. The favourites, who thought of nothing but to continue in favour, and to be still safe and secure in their credit, concurred to press the King to take other measures, and to turn to another set of men, who would be no longer his enemies, if they had some of the best places shared among them. And, though

thing of that nature is done, that country will, in all likelihood, be the seat of war.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 15, 1701.

There is nothing now left to make the great union betwixt France and Spain complete, but the settling their trade; and it is said, that all the impositions on the produce of Spain will be taken off here, as the like will be done there, in relation to the produce of France. Several other regulations are considering of, and there is no doubt but France will find their account. The great point will be, whether France can furnish them with commodities proper for the Indies. If so, we may greatly suffer.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 19, 1701.

I often meet the Spanish Ambassador, and I observe your directions. I do not in the least take notice to him of what his Majesty's intentions are. He began to talk with me yesterday at Versailles, and asked me, whether we would break with them; making many professions, that whatever had passed, yet in Spain they had the same desire to cultivate and increase, if possible, the friendship with his Majesty. I told him, that I did not know, but that there might be the same desire on the King my Master's part; but that he must allow, that the late proceedings of the Regents cannot but have given great jealousies to Europe, and the Regents had acted, as if they were desirous of being in a manner tributary to France, which would be also of fatal consequence to themselves at last. His answer was natural enough: He said, What would you have them do, whilst they are threatened with war from all parts, and are not in a condition to help themselves? But, if there was any disposition on our side to continue the ancient good understanding, we should soon see another effect. This he spake in a manner as if he had orders for what he said; and that, if I doubted, he might venture to give it under his hand, that they would renew all treaties, &c. I find, that even here they are so apprehensive of a general war, if England should engage itself, that they will, I am satisfied, consent to almost any thing to prevent it, even to leave the Dutch troops in Flanders, rather than fail. These matters are proper to be transacted in Spain, where there may be some faith still left. I am of opinion, that I partly know the proposals Monsieur Wratislaw will make; but I cannot see the Emperor is able to perform his part; and it is said, that Prince Lewis of Baden is not for having the Emperor engage in a war.

No. 28. Vol. III.

(1) The King writ the following short letter, to the Earl of Galway, a little before the Earl of Rocheester's promotion.

Lee, Aug. 15, 1700.

It is some time since I received your letter of the 13th of July, in which you desire to know on whom I have cast my eyes for the Government of Ireland; and, as I am sure, that what I write you will be secret, I scruple not to tell you, that I intend to give it to Lord Rocheester, and to declare it at my return to England; but he will not go to Ireland till the next spring. You will easily conceive the reasons of it. I shall expect your thoughts of a matter that concerns you, and you may always rely on my friendship.

William R.

(1) This

this method had been almost fatal, when the King had followed it soon after his accession to the Crown, yet there seemed to be less danger in trying it now, than was formerly. The nation was in full peace; and it was commonly said, that nobody thought any more of King James, and therefore it was fit, for the King's service, to encourage all his people to come into his interests, by letting them see how soon he could forget all that was past. These considerations had so far prevailed with him, that, before he went out of England, he had engaged himself secretly to them. It is true, the death, first of the Duke of Gloucester, and now of the King of Spain, had very much changed the face of affairs, both at home and abroad; yet the King would not break off from his engagements.

It might have been expected, that, when such a new unlooked-for scene was opened, the King should have lost no time in bringing his Parliament together, as soon as possible. It was prorogued to the 20th of November; and the King had sent orders from Holland to signify his resolution for their meeting on that day. But the Ministers, whom he was then bringing into his business, had other views. They thought they were not sure of a majority in Parliament for their purposes, and therefore prevailed with the King to dissolve the Parliament; and, after a set of Sheriffs were appointed, fit for the turn, a new Parliament was summoned to meet on the 6th of February.

The man, on whose management of the House of Commons, the new Ministry depended, was Mr Robert Harley, the heir of a family, which had been hitherto the most eminent of the Presbyterian party. His education was in that way; but he, not being considered at the Revolution, as he thought he deserved, had set himself to oppose the Court in every thing, and to find fault with the whole Administration. He had the chief hand both in the reduction of the army, and in the matter of the Irish grants. The high party trusted him, though he still kept up an interest among the Presbyterians; and he had so particular a dexterity, that he made both the High Church party and the Dissenters depend upon him; so it was agreed, that he should be Speaker.

All this while the new Ministers talked of nothing but negotiations, and gave it out, that the French King was ready to give all the security, that could be desired, for maintaining the peace of Europe. At this time the Emperor sent over to England Count Wratislaw, to set forth his title to the Spanish Monarchy, settled on his House by ancient entails, often repeated, and now devolving on him, by an undoubted right, since by the renunciation made by the late Queen of Spain (as was stipulated by the treaty of the Pyrenees, and then made by her in due form) this could not be called in question. But the new Ministers were scarce civil to the Count, and would not enter into any consultations with him. But the Dutch, who were about the King, and all the foreign Ministers, spoke in another style. They said, that nothing but a general union of all the powers in Europe could hinder the conjunction of the two Monarchies. So, by what those, who talked often with the King, gave out, it came to be soon known, that the King saw the necessity of a new war, but that he kept himself in a great reserve, that he might manage his new Ministers and their party, and see 1700-1. if he could engage them to concur with him.

It will not be improper to close the relation of this year, with which the Century ends, with an account of the King of Sweden's glorious campaign. He made all the haste he could to relieve Livonia, where not only Riga was for some months besieged by the King of Poland, but Narva was also attacked by the Czar, who hoped, by taking it, to get an entrance into the Baltick: The Czar came in person against it, with an army of one hundred thousand men: Narva was not provided for a siege: It had a small garrison, and had very poor magazines, yet the Muscovites attacked it so feebly, that it held out beyond all expectation, till the end of the year. Upon the King of Sweden's landing at Revel, the Saxons drew off from Riga, after a long siege at a vast charge: This being done, and Riga both opened and supplied, that King marched next to Narva; the Czar, upon his march towards him, left his army in such a manner, as made all people conclude, he had no mind to hazard his person; the King marched through ways, that were thought so impracticable, that little care had been taken to secure them; so he surprized the Muscovites, and broke into their camp, before they apprehended he was near them; he totally routed their army, took many prisoners, with all their artillery and baggage, and so made a glorious entry into Narva. This is the noblest campaign that we find in any history; in which a King, about eighteen years of age, led an army himself against three Kings, who had confederated against him, and was successful in every one of his attempts, giving great marks, both of personal courage and good conduct in them all.

On the 6th of February, the Parliament met, but was prorogued to the 10th, when the Commons were directed by the King to chuse a Speaker. Sir Thomas Littleton had been sent for by the King, who told him, that he thought it would be for his service, that he should give way at that time to Mr Harley's being chosen into that office; which Sir Thomas acquiesced in, and accordingly absented himself from the House on the day of election, when Mr Harley, being the first person proposed for Speaker, and afterwards Sir Richard Onslow named by others, the former had two hundred and forty-nine votes for him, against one hundred and twenty-five in the negative. The next day, the King made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

OUR great misfortune, in the loss of the Duke of Gloucester, has made it absolutely necessary, that there should be a further provision for the succession to the Crown in the Protestant line after me and the Princess. The happiness of the nation, and the security of our religion, which is our chiefest concern, seems so much to depend upon this, that I cannot doubt but it will meet with a general concurrence; and I earnestly recommend it to your early and effectual consideration.

The death of the late King of Spain, with the declaration of his Successor to that Monarchy, has made so great an alteration in the affairs abroad, that I must desire you very

 "I make no doubt, but your resolution there-

"These things are of such weight, that I

*A party for France in the Parliament.
Burnet.*

As soon as the Parliament was opened, it appeared, that the French had a great party in it.
 It is certain, great sums came over this winter from France; the packet-boat came seldom without ten thousand Louis d'Ors; it often brought more. The nation was filled with them, and in six months time a million of guineas were coined out of them. The Merchants indeed said, that the balance of trade was then so much turned to our side, that, whereas we used to carry over a million of our money in specie, we then sent no money to France, and had at least half that sum sent over to balance the trade. Yet this did not account for that vast flood of French gold, that was visible in the nation. And, upon the departure of Monsieur de Tallard, the French Ambassador, whose place was supplied by Monsieur Poussin, with the character only of Secretary, a very visible alteration was found in the bills of exchange.
 For which reason it was concluded, that great remittances had been made to that Ambassador, and that these were distributed among those,
 who resolved to merit a share in that wealth, which came over so copiously beyond the example of former times.

Upon the view of the House it appeared 1700-1.
 evidently, that the Tories were a great majority; Partiality, yet they, to make the matter sure, resolved to in judging clear the House of a great many, who were en- elections gaged in another interest. Reports were brought to them of elections, that had been scandalously purchased by some, who were concerned in the new East-India Company. Instead of drinking and entertainments, by which elections were formerly managed, now a most scandalous practice was brought in of buying votes, with so little decency; that the electors engaged themselves by subscriptions to chuse a blank person, before they were trusted with the name of their candidate. The old East-India Company had driven a course of corruption within doors with so little shame, that the new Company intended to follow their example, but with this difference, that, whereas the former had bought the persons, who were elected, they resolved to buy elections. Sir Edward Seymour, who had dealt in this corruption his whole life-time, and whom the old Company was said to have bought before at a very high price, brought before the House of Commons the discovery of some of the practices of the new Company. The examining of these took up many days. In conclusion, the matter was so well proved, that several elections were declared void; and some of the persons so chosen were for some time kept in prison, after they had been expelled the House. In these proceedings great partiality appeared; for, when in some cases corruption was proved clearly against some of the Tory party, and but doubtfully against some of the contrary side, that, which was voted corruption in the Whigs, was called the giving alms in the Tories.

A design was laid in the House of Commons, A design to open the Sessions with an address to the King, laid for that he would own the King of Spain. The an address matter was so far concerted that they had a- to own, by greed on the words of the vote, and seemed King of not to doubt of the concurrence of the House. Spain.
 But Mr Monkton opposed it with great heat, Burnet.
 and among other things said, that, if this vote was carried, he should expect, that the next vote would be for owning the pretended Prince of Wales. Upon this occasion it appeared, how much popular assemblies are apt to be turned by a thing boldly said, though the consequence is ever so remote; since the connexion of these two points lay at some distance; for the issue of the debate was quite contrary to that, which was designed, and the address was laid aside.

On the 14th, upon reading the King's speech, An address the consideration of it was adjourned till the of the Com- next day; but in the mean time the House came mons to to this resolution, "That they would stand by support the
 "and support his Majesty and his Government, King.
 "and take such effectual measures, as may best
 "conduce to the interest and safety of England,
 "and the preservation of the Protestant Religion."
 This resolution was presented to the King by the whole House, on the 17th of February, to which he gave them this answer:

"I thank you for this address, and your The King's
 "ready concurrence to those great ends therein Answer.
 "mentioned, which I take to be extremely Pr. H. C.
 "important to the honour and safety of En- "gland; and I assure you, I shall never propose III. 128.
 "any thing, but what is for our common ad"vantage

1700-1. "vantage and security. Having this occasion, I think it proper to acquaint you, that yesterday I received a memorial from the Envoy Extraordinary of the States-General, a translation whereof I leave with you. As to the first part of it, I think it necessary to ask your advice; and, as to the latter part, I desire your assistance."

The memorial of the Dutch communicated to the Commons Cole, P. 320.

In this memorial, mentioned by the King, the States-General acquainted his Majesty, "That they having considered, that their delay of owning the Duke of Anjou for King of Spain was subject to malicious interpretations, as if their aim had been only to gain time to put themselves in a warlike posture, they thought themselves obliged to acknowledge the Duke of Anjou without any condition, reserving to themselves to stipulate, in the negotiation ready to begin, the necessary conditions to secure the peace of Europe; in which negotiation they are firmly resolved to do nothing without the consent of his Majesty and the other powers interested in the maintenance of the peace, as they have expressly declared to the Ambassador of France. That therefore they prayed him to send to his Minister at the Hague, necessary instructions and orders to act conjointly in this negotiation, and that nothing be concluded but wherein England and Holland may equally find their security, and which at the same time may tend to strengthen the public tranquillity. But as it may happen not to be possible to agree with France and Spain on reasonable conditions, and that, the negotiation being interrupted, they may be suddenly attacked by the numerous troops, which France has ordered to move towards their frontiers, their Envoy is to represent to his Majesty the urgent necessity they should have, in so great a danger, of the assistance of England, and to desire him to get the succours, stipulated by the treaty, in readiness, that they may rely on them, if occasion required."

The next day, this memorial was communicated to the House of Lords. And the Commons, upon report of the King's answer to their address, resolved, "That an humble address be made to his Majesty by such Members, as are of his Privy-Council, that he will please to cause the treaty between England and the States-General of the 3d of March 1677, and all the renewals thereof since that time, to be laid before the House." Which being done by Mr Secretary Hedges; the House resolved, "That an humble address be made to his Majesty, that he will please to enter into such negotiations, in concert with the States-General of the United-Provinces, and other Potentates, as may most effectually conduce to the mutual safety of these Kingdoms, and the States-General, and the preservation of the peace of Europe; and giving him assurances of support and assistance, in performance of the treaty made with the States-General the 3d of March 1677."

It is observed, that the desiring the King in this address to enter into new alliances with the States for our mutual defence, and for the preservation of the peace of Europe, was not carried without much difficulty; those words being considered, as indeed they were, an insinuation towards a war.

The address was presented, the day following, by the whole House, when the King made them this answer: "Gentlemen, I thank you heartily for the advice you have given me, and your unanimous resolution to support and assist me in making good the treaty mentioned in your address; and I will immediately order my Ministers abroad to enter into negotiations in concert with the States-General and other Potentates, for the attaining of those great ends, which you desire. Nothing can more effectually conduce to our security, than the unanimity and vigour you have shewn on this occasion. And I shall always endeavour, on my part, to preserve and increase this mutual trust and confidence between us."

On the 17th of February, Mr Secretary Vernon communicated to the Commons by his Majesty's orders a letter, which came to London not designedly, as is supposed, in the French mail. This letter, was dated the 13th of February, N. S. and was written by the Earl of Melfort to his brother the Earl of Perth, then Governor to the pretended Prince of Wales. It contained his schemes to set on foot another invasion, and discovered that he held a close correspondence with the Earl of Arran, now Duke of Hamilton. Melfort urged in it many arguments, to get the Earl of Middleton discarded, and recommended himself, as much fitter to be trusted.

This letter was also communicated to the House of Lords, who ordered it to be printed (1), and the

(1) This letter was as follows:

My dearest Brother,

Since I promised to put in writing what we had not time to talk fully of, I am set down to it in the morning, that my letter may be ready for the messenger, if any call. I told all that I had heard at Versailles, and the favourable audience I had of Madam Maintenon; for which I beg it of you to return my most humble thanks to the Queen, and beg her to be so good, as to thank Madam Maintenon, and know of her, what can be done in that matter: It will be a great charity in the Queen. I told you, among other things, the great fleet the King intends to put out, this summer; the orders being given, and the money ready, the stores full, and every one concerned active in their station. There is no doubt, but this fleet will be master of the sea, for some time, if not for all the summer; because the Dutch dare not stir, till the English be ready; and they have long debates, yet, before they can be in a condition to act, if they have the will; and it is a question, if they will have it at all. The King never had so favourable a conjuncture, if he can persuade this King, that his affairs are really in the circumstances they are in; but there is the difficulty. The King and Queen have more authority with the King, and with Madam de Maintenon, than any other in the world can have; but that is not all. There should be some one, acceptable to the Ministers, who should lay before them those proofs their Majesties cannot enter into the detail of, and explain the reasons, make plans and memoirs, by their Majesties approbation, to convince them of the necessity, and shew the easiness of restoring the King, the glory it brings their Kingdom, and the advantage to Religion. How this will be done, their Majesties are wise enough to consider; and, I think, it is not a subject fit for me to enter upon; but their friendships, in general, who know not

" Humbly returning their thanks and acknowledgments to his Majesty for his concern expressed in his speech for the Protestant Religion, and his care for it's preservation, by recommending to their consideration a further provision for the Succession to the Crown in the Protestant line. They added, that, being deeply sensible of the weight of what his Majesty had further recommended to them, they could not but desire he would be pleased to order all treaties made by him, since the late war, to be laid before them, that they might thereby be better enabled to give their advice. They likewise requested his Majesty to engage in such alliances abroad, as he should think proper for preserving the balance of Europe, assuring him, that they would readily concur with whatever should be conducive to the honour and safety of England,

" preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the peace of Europe. Next they humbly thanked his Majesty for communicating the Earl of Melfort's letter to them, and desired he would be pleased to order the seizing of all horses and arms of Papists, and other disaffected persons, and have those ill men removed from London, according to law; but especially they desired he would please to give directions for a search to be made after arms and provisions of war mentioned in the letter. Lastly, they requested, that such a fleet might speedily be fitted out, as his Majesty in his great wisdom should think necessary for the defence of Himself and Kingdoms." His Majesty thanked their Lordships for this address, and for the concern they expressed in relation to the common security both at home and abroad; and told them, he would give the necessary orders for those things they desired of him, not the half of what I know, in this matter, think, that it will not be well done by a Protestant Minister, lazy in his temper, an enemy to France by his inclination, tainted with commonwealth principles, and against the King's returning, by any other power, than that of the people of England, and upon capitulation and terms; who is suspected of giving aid to the Compounders, if not worse. That Mr Carrill is qualified, no body doubts, but in society with the other. Those, who must be instrumental, will not trust him, as they ought; so that, so long as the other is within distance of penetrating the affairs, they will never be secure. And yet the King has no such game to play, as by these very persons, who are thus diffident; namely, the true Church of England party, the Catholics, and the Earl of Arran; and I shall say something of every one of them.

The King cannot but be sensible, that the true Church of England party, and their principal head, now the Bishop of Norwich, has been silent for a long time; and their Majesties may remember, what weight the Court of France laid upon their joining the King (I mean the Non-swearing Clergy) in case of a landing. Therefore all arts should be used, without delay, to get them to enter into a correspondence again; and every impediment ought to be removed, I say, without exception. And though, sometimes, it is of hard digestion for Sovereigns, who ought to be obeyed, without reserve, to yield to the humours of subjects, yet prudence should teach them, when they cannot, without injuring their affairs, do what they would, to do what they can; and remember the fable of the dog, who lost the substance, by catching at the shadow. Assurances from the Non-jurors, the soundest and most venerable part of the English Church, would be of great use, at this time, to persuade to undertake this great affair; for, besides their own example, at a landing, and their preaching and writing to the people, that their Religion was in no danger, it is most certain, they know better than any other can do, what the Church of England, in general, would do for the King's service; and they, being to run all the hazard, would be better believed at the French Court, than any other, as I found by experience.

As to the Catholics, and other affiliates with them, unfortunately for the King, they were thought to have too much inclination for me, and so have been reckoned as useless to the King. And I must beg leave to say, that undertaking was the best feather in his wing; and was most justly thought so by him, and the Court of France, even to that degree, that they pretended, if this, and the other article, concerning the Clergy, could be made appear, they would concur with the King to invade England. They consisted of seven Regiments of horse and dragoons; their arms, trumpets, kettle-drums, standards, &c. were all ready, and are yet in surety. Their men were all lifted, and their officers chosen, and they had twenty horses to a troop; which troops lying at a distance, in a horse-country, twenty horses would soon have mounted the rest. Those, who could not divine the greatness and use of the undertaking, blamed the rashness of it; and even some Churchmen have not been disapproved, for endeavouring undutifully (because contrary to the King's written orders) to break the design. But I desire you, now, for all this, to believe, that you have not such an argument to use to the Court of France, as this. And, if you can make it appear, as it might have been, some years ago, I should have very good hopes of this summer's work; nay, let the King have what other hopes, even promises, you please, from the Court of France, this is to be put into the circumstances it was in. For, if there will ever be a landing in England, to purpose, it must be before they can be armed; and they cannot be armed, before the Parliament come to a resolution concerning the war; and, considering the few troops in England, suppose these men to be no better than militia, what a diversion would it be? It is not necessary for me to say any more of this article, till I know whether their Majesties have as good an opinion of this undertaking, as I have. If so, I shall shew what I think is to be done in it; if otherwise, I save the pains. As to the Earl of Arran, it would be of great use to have an understanding with him. He will have none, where * ——— can pry. His all is at stake, * Middle-and he ought to be wary with whom he ventures to ton. deal. I think it better for the King's service, that the Court-party prevailed, in the manner they have done, in the Parliament of Scotland, than that the Country-party should have got their will. Opposition swells the water to a flood; and, so long as the Country-party is not discouraged, they gain more ground in the Kingdom, than they lose in the Government; so that the disaffection to the Government will increase; and one may judge of the nation, in general, which is of another temper, than this pretended Parliament, or, rather, Presbyterian rabble, in representing the nation. For, since even in it there is such a struggle against the Government, what would there be in a free Parliament, which the Prince of Orange durst never hazard to call? The nation, then, at least, a great part of it, being disaffected to this Government, it is of great consequence, that the Earl of Arran may know what to do, in case of an invasion of England; or, in case he and his friends be obliged, for self-preservation, to rise in their own defence. The army, who are, and ever were, well affected, are to be gained by money; and a little goes a great way with them. The disbanded troops would be engaged, and the officers are well inclined. The places of strength would be secured, and such as can be put in defence, with-

All about Exchequer bills. Drake's Hist. of the late Parl. p. 27. Among other inconveniencies occasioned by the dissolution of the last Parliament, and delay of the Session, which was the consequence of it, one was, that the allotted time for circulating Exchequer bills was so near elapsed, that the credit of those bills must necessarily sink, unless some effectual remedy were provided, which the shortness of the time seemed not to allow. However such diligence and dispatch was used, that, on the 26th of February, a bill for renewing the bills of credit, commonly called Exchequer bills, was brought into the House, and on the 6th of March sent up to the Lords; and on the 13th passed the Royal assent.

mark, the Commons took the same into consideration, and on the 3d of March resolved, "That, for the preserving the peace and happiness of this Kingdom, and the security of the Protestant Religion by law established, it is absolutely necessary, a further declaration be made of the Limitation and Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, after his Majesty, and the Princess, and the heirs of their bodies respectively. And that further provision be first made for the security of the rights and liberties of the people." The new Ministers spoke for this resolution with great zeal; from which their friends made inferences in their favour, that certainly men, in the interests of France, would not promote a design so destructive of all they drove at. This was so little of a piece with the rest of their conduct, that those, who were still jealous of their sincerity, looked on it as a blind to cover their out expences, fortified. To do all this, at least, such a part of them, as can be begun with, a small sum will serve; and he ought to have hopes of it, and of the command.

These being only heads to be discoursed of, and much to be said of every part, it is not to be thought, that this letter can carry a final conclusion; for it may be, upon discourse, I might change my mind, or be more confirmed in it, and see further. This makes me insist, again, to you, upon two things, as appearing, to me, absolutely necessary to put things upon a right foot. The first is, the removing of all impediments out of the way, and sending all suspected persons to Champagne or Burgundy, according to their guilt. And the second is of the last use, both to their Majesties and the Prince; which is, the establishing of such a number, under no qualifications, to talk of their affairs, in their Majesties presence; with whom we can freely converse, and propose what may be for their Majesties service.

As for the first, it will be for the King's reputation, both at the Courts of Rome, France, and with all his true friends in England, for many reasons. As for the second, it is according to scripture, In the multitude of Counsellors there is safety. Nothing is so dangerous, as to determine what one will do, and then hear reasons against it, and imitate the deaf adder, who hearkens not to the voice of the charmer, let him charm never so sweetly. Reasons, against a resolution taken, offend; and, the more force they have, they offend the more; whilst, before the resolution be taken, reason has it's effect, and the determinations are not the effect of humour and faction, but of prudence and justice. If in any thing I fail, I'll swear it is want of understanding, and not of will. And I beg, that their Majesties may be persuaded, that it is no humour nor vanity, but their service, I have in my view; who am,

My dearest Brother,

Most humbly your's.

There are some remarkable circumstances, relating to this letter, in Mr Cole's Memoirs; as will appear from the following extracts.

Mr Secretary Vernon to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, Feb. 17, 1700, O. S.

I cannot but mention one expression in the letter, viz. "That this opportunity must be improved, now the Court of France is dissatisfied with the Prince of Orange, for his treacheries discovered in their hands." His Majesty does not know what they should mean by it, unless it arises from the letters Jolly brought, which his Majesty knows nothing of.

You know all that we have sent to Spain; which is assurances of friendship, if they have the same disposition on their side, and to exhort them to preserve their liberty. If this be an offence, it is impossible to avoid it, with France. I suppose, you will hear a good deal of this letter, and that the parties concerned will not well like, that it is come hither, and made thus public.

Mr Secretary Vernon to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, Feb. 20, 1700, O. S.

I send you, inclosed, the Earl of Melfort's letter, printed by order of the House of Lords. I suppose, there will be no question made at St Germain's, whether the letter be genuine, or not; at least, Monfieur de Tallard does not call that in doubt, though he seems much offended at the letter's being communicated to the Lords and Commons. He endeavoured to speak with me on Monday night, but I was gone to Kensington; and, upon his writing to me, next morning, that I would appoint him a time, when he might speak with me, I went to him. He was full of expostulation, of the letter's being carried to the two Houses, by my Lord Chamberlain and myself, as if it were done to create an animosity between the two nations, and to give the alarm, That the French had formed a design to invade England; whereas this appeared to be only a chimerical notion of Melfort, who (as he often repeated) was un fou & un extravagant; that he was banished from the Court of King James, and had nothing to do in the Court of France; that his waiting upon Madam de Maintenon was only to get two of his daughters put into the nunnery of St Cyr; that he had no access to the French Ministers, but was spinning cobwebs of his own; and there ought to have been no occasion taken, from thence, to create jealousies and misunderstandings. That the French had shewn their disposition to live in friendship with England; and he thought care ought to be taken, on our side, not to give any grounds to believe, that we were picking a quarrel with them; and this he thought necessary to tell me, as a matter that deserved attention.

I told him, The letter contained something, that might appear notional, and like a project of his own; but other parts of it laid down facts, that it extremely concerned us to provide against; such as the fitting out a fleet in France, that was like to be master of the sea, this summer; that we could make no provision for our safety, but in Parliament; and therefore it was fit they should be acquainted with our danger, and that the proofs of it should be laid before them. That, in France, they could dispatch every thing dans le cabinet. We had not so ready a way, in England, but what we did must be publicly, and dans le marche. Whoever had suppressed such an advice, here, might

1700-1. ill designs, and to gain them some credit; for they could not but see, that, if France was once possessed of the power and wealth of Spain, our laws, and every thing that we could do to support them, would prove but feeble defences. The manner, in which the motion of the Succession was managed, did not carry in it great marks of sincerity. It was often put off from one day to another, and it gave place to the most trifling matters. At last, when a day was solemnly set for it, and all people expected, that it should pass without any difficulty, Mr Harley moved, that some things previous to that might be first considered. He observed, that the haste the nation was in, when the present Government was settled, had made them go too fast, and overlook many securities, which might have prevented much mischief; and therefore he hoped they would not now fall into the same error; since nothing pressed them at present. He moved then, that they would settle some conditions of Government, as preliminaries, before they should proceed to the nomination of the Person; that so they might fix every thing, that was wanting, to make their security complete. This was popular, and took with many; and it had so fair an appearance, that indeed none could oppose it. Some weeks were spent upon it. Suspicious people thought, this was done on design to blast the motion, and to offer such extravagant limitations, as should quite change the form of the Government, and render the Crown titular and precarious. At last, these preliminaries were agreed on:

I. That whoever shall hereafter come to the possession of this Crown, shall join in communion with the Church of England, as by law established.

Heads of the bill of Succession.
Pr. H. C.
III. 130.

II. That, in case the Crown and Imperial dignity of this Realm shall hereafter come to any person not being a native of this Kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories, which do not belong to the Crown of England, without the consent of Parliament.

III. That no person, who shall hereafter come to the possession of the Crown, shall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without consent of Parliament.

IV. That, from and after the time, that the further limitation by this act shall take effect, all matters and things relating to the well governing of this Kingdom, which are properly cognizable in the Privy Council, by the laws and customs of this Realm, shall be transacted there, and all resolutions taken thereupon shall be signed by such of the Privy Council, as shall advise and consent to the same.

V. That

justly have expected an accusation of treason against him.

He said, He did not disown, but they were fitting out ships to sea; but they did it upon the preparations making in Holland, where they were at work, night and day, as well Sundays, as other days, to get out their fleet; therefore, they could not do less, in France; but they were not fitting so many ships, as was represented; and that they had no thoughts of being at sea these three or four months.

I told him, I should be glad there might be no occasion for any fleets coming out on either side. I was sure, all that we aimed at was, to be on the defensive; and I should be much better pleased, and think it more our interest, to be disarming of ships, than arming them. As to the character he gave my Lord Melfort, of fou & insensé, when we saw him treated as such in France, we should be willing to have the same opinion of him; till then, we could not but remember, what an instrument he had been, in promoting the intended assassination and invasion, and must be concerned, that he is bringing himself again into play, upon the same bottom; and, by his way of writing, at least, one must suspect, that he is admitted into conversations with the French Ministers. It seemed very extraordinary, that he should press the improving this opportunity, now the Court of France had resentments, upon the discovery of some treachery they thought his Majesty guilty of. He said, this was a pure fiction of Melfort's. I told him, I was glad to hear them say so; and his Majesty was very well satisfied, that he had given no occasion for any one's having such hard thoughts of him. I asked him, once or twice, whether he knew of any discovery of this kind. He said, he never heard any thing like it, and there was no such thing, in reality.

In conclusion, he said, that people ought rather to appease jealousies on both sides, than inflame them. I told him, he could contribute a great deal towards it, and, I hoped, he would make use of his power. What I could do, in any case, would be inconsiderable; but no endeavours of mine should be wanting to remove misunderstandings, and so secure the public peace.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

I am glad, that the letter of my Lord Melfort is fallen into your hands. Certainly, it will open people's eyes, in England; and those, that seem to doubt, that they have such thoughts here, have reasons for it. The only hopes they have now left, at St Germain's, are, that they are to be restored by a French power, in a short time; and the intrigues, carried on in Scotland, are too apparent to be doubted on.

The expression, in the letter, which you mention, must mean what was found in the packet of Mr Jolly, which he grounded on the reports, at Paris; and this went so far, that they said, there was a design to poison the King of Spain. This shews how little the French Court trusts any of them, else they would have been better informed. There can have been nothing in Monsieur Schonenberg's letter, but an answer to the instructions he had; whereby we might have seen in what disposition they were, in relation to us, &c. As for Spain's depending on France, I have often shewn to Monsieur de Torcy, what jealousy that might and does give to Europe. But he always assured me, that it was not the King's intention, though, at present, he could not but assist them, they not being in a condition to help themselves; that so that matter can have no ill effect, &c.

I believe, this Court will be very angry with Lord Melfort; for it is plain, by several accounts, and particularly by Monsieur de Tallard's printing M. d'Avaux's memorial, they are not willing to break with us; though I still admire at their proceedings in Flanders.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr Secretary Vernon.

Paris, March 9, 1701.

I had not your letter of February 10, till I came from Versailles, where I found, that a Courier of Monsieur de Tallard was arrived the day before with the resolutions of the Parliament, and a copy of Lord Melfort's letter. The conference I had with Monsieur de Torcy was much the same with what you had with the Count de Tallard, his discourse turning in the same manner, that the exposing this letter was only 1700-1.

V. That, after the limitation shall take effect, no person born out of the Kingdom of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging, although he be naturalized, or made a denizen (except such as are born of English parents) shall be capable to be of the Privy Council, or a Member of either House of Parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of trust, either civil or military, or to have any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments from the Crown to himself, or to any others in trust for him.

VI. That no person, who has an office or place of profit under the King, or receives a pension from the Crown, shall be capable of serving as a Member of the House of Commons.

VII. That, after the limitation shall take effect, Judges Commissions be made, quandiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established. But, upon the address of both Houses of Parliament, it may be lawful to remove them.

VIII. That no pardon under the Great-Seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament.

The King was alarmed at these proceedings, for almost every article implied a reflection on him and his administration, chiefly that of not employing strangers, and not going out of the Kingdom. As these, as well as most of the other articles, were unacceptable to the King; so many, who had an ill opinion of the design of those, who were now at the helm, began to conclude, that the delays were affected, and that these limitations were designed to raise disputes between the two Houses, by which the bill might be lost. When some time had been spent in these preliminaries, it came to the nomination of the person to the Succession, after the King and the Princess of Denmark, and their heirs; Sir John Bowles, who was then disordered in his senses, and soon after quite lost them, was set on by the party, to be the first, who should name the Electress Dowager of Brunswick; which seemed to be done to make it less serious, when moved by such a person. He was, by the forms of the House, put into the chair of the Committee, to whom the bill was committed. The thing was still put off for many weeks. At every time, that it was called for, the motion was entertained with coldness, which served to heighten the jealousy. The Committee once or twice sat upon it, but all the Members ran out of the House with so much indecency, that the contrivers seemed ashamed of this management. There were seldom fifty or sixty at the Committee; yet in conclusion the bill passed, and was sent up to the Lords, where it was expected that great opposition would be made to it. Some imagined, that the act was only an artifice, designed to gain credit to those, who at this time were so ill thought of over the

to create and excite animosities in the nation: That it shewed a desire of breaking with France. That he had sent for Lord Melfort, who was with him this morning; and did own, that he had wrote a letter of that date, and that it was lost, which he believed gave occasion for the framing of this: That he had mentioned something in it of Madam de Maintenon, whom he had seen about his private affairs; but he denies almost all that is in the letter. As for that of the Bishop of Norwich, he could have no grounds to say it, since he hardly knew him, and he was satisfied of the contrary. As for Lord Arran, he was convinced he was not in King James's interest; that he was rather setting up for himself, as having some pretence to the Crown of Scotland. In short, I found his opinion was, that it was contrived only to frame a design to incense the nation, and to break with France, &c. He said, that I was sensible how little credit Lord Melfort had at this Court, or at St. Germain's. He read the letter to me, as also a paper cried about the streets of London of a new plot or conspiracy of France against England. The answer I made him was, that by my last letter I had some account of this letter: That, by as much as I knew of it, I did not in the least doubt but they were Lord Melfort's thoughts, and wrote by him; but at the same time I was satisfied, that the French Court was far from taking such measures. That, as to the communicating it to the Parliament, if he knew our Constitution, he would know, that it was impossible to do otherwise in this conjuncture, when greater preparations by sea and land were never known to be made than are actually making now in France, which was no secret, nor did I believe, that there was any desire, that it should be so. That he must forgive me, if I thought Lord Melfort was not so despicable a person, since I saw him often at Court, which, here especially, is no sign of it, since men of that character were not permitted to approach so near the King. That, not having yet my letters of the last post from England, I could not tell what effect it had caused; but that my opinion was still, that we were far from desiring a war; neither could it be our interest; unless we were obliged to it for our own security, and consequently that of Holland. I also took notice of the expression of the discovery of some treachery, which the King was supposed to be guilty of, and which I did not understand, unless it meant the extravagant reports, that were at Paris, of letters found, which my servant, who was drowned, brought from Madrid; and I did not doubt but he knew the substance of them very well, and was convinced of the contrary of the reports. I told him also, that the proceedings of the Viceroy of Navarre in opening the letters, and sending them to Madrid, could not be any ways justifiable, since he could easily see, that they were directed to a public Minister residing at the Court of France. He did own, he could not tell the meaning of that expression, since the King was far from having any such thoughts. He seemed to know nothing of the letters, but he had heard of this accident; but he condemned very much the opening of them. I said further, that, as for the paper cried about the streets, I did believe it was not done by order; that they printed what they pleased in England, though, if the authors were discovered, they were liable to be punished. Because it is not sent to me, I am of opinion it is such a paper, as we have often at London; but I do assure you, it makes more impression here than the letter. Endeavours are used to make it to be believed, that it was forged only to serve a turn, as they say has been the custom at the beginning of Parliament. This must reflect on the honour of his Majesty; and I did venture to say to Monsieur de Tercy, that, in case it could be supposed such a letter was forged, I did not doubt but I might produce the original, if there was any occasion. I wonder he did not mention to me what had passed between you and Monsieur de Tallard. In short, I am told, they take it for granted, that we shall enter into a war; and, as I happened to come a little later to Versailles yesterday than usual, the whole Court had it, that we had declared war; but, when they saw me, it soon put a stop to that report.

1700-1. the nation, that they wanted some colourable thing to excuse their own proceedings. Many of the Lords absented themselves on design. Some little opposition was made by the Marquis of Normanby; and four Lords, the Earls of Huntington and Plymouth, and the Lords Guilford and Jefferies, protested against it (1). Those, who wished well to the act, were glad to have it passed any way, and so would not examine the limitations that were in it. They thought it of great importance to carry the act, and that, at another time, those limitations might be better considered. Thus the act passed, and the King sent it over by the Earl of Macclesfield to the Electors, with the Garter. It was reckoned a great point carried, that there was now a law in favour of a Protestant Successor; for it was evident, that a strong party was formed against it, in favour of the pretended Prince of Wales. He was now past thirteen, bred up with a hatred both of the Religion and Constitution of England, in an admiration of the French Government; and yet many, who called themselves Protestants, seemed fond of such a Successor; a degree of intimation, that might justly amaze all, who observed it, and saw the fury with which it was promoted.

In the mean time, the settlement of the Succession was a great subject of discourse and alarm abroad. Those Popish Princes, who were descended from the blood-royal of England, and were more nearly related to the Crown than the Princess Sophia, were offended at being struck off from their remote hopes, and presumptive right. But the person more immediately concerned, as being next in blood, after the King and the Princess Anne, was the Duchess of Savoy, daughter to the late Duchess of Orleans, and grand-daughter to King Charles I. 1700-1. who therefore ordered Count Maffey, Ambassador from Savoy, to make a protestation of her right, to this effect: "That Anne of Orleans, Duchess of Savoy, &c. Princess of the blood royal of England, by the Royal Princess of Great-Britain, Henrietta her mother, put so high a value upon that prerogative, that she gladly made use of the opportunity, that then offered, to set it forth before the eyes of the whole English nation, as an evidence, she drew from thence, of having a right to that august Throne. That therefore being informed, that it had been resolved in the Parliament, that, being the only daughter of the late Princess Royal, Henrietta her mother, she was the next in Succession after his Majesty William III. and the Princess Anne of Denmark, according to the laws and customs of England, which always preferred the nearest to the remotest line. That her title, being thus notoriously known and indisputable, stood in need of no farther proof. However, that she thought fit to protest against all resolutions and decisions contrary thereto, in the best and most effectual manner, that might be practised in such a case; wherein she complied rather with custom than necessity, because she had so great an idea of the wisdom and justice of the King and Parliament, that she had no cause to fear they would do any thing prejudicial to her and her children."

This Savoy protestation seemed to be an affront to King James, his Queen, and the pretended Prince of Wales; since the Duchess of Savoy vouchsafed not to take the least notice of them, but substituted herself immediately after the Princess of Denmark, and thereby appeared

Mr. Secretary Vernon to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, March 3, 1701, O. S.

I have your Excellency's letters of the 5th and 9th to acknowledge. The first arrived late on Thursday, and the other this morning. They have been both laid before his Majesty. I cannot but smile at the turn my Lord Melfort gives to his letter, that he should own his having lost the letter he writ about that time, and think to impose upon any body, that gave occasion to the forging of another. Monsieur de Tallard (as I acquainted you) made no doubt but it was his letter, and I imagine Monsieur de Torcy thinks so too. My Lord Seafeld being newly come up from Scotland, I shewed him the original letter, this morning: He is well acquainted with Lord Melfort's hand-writing and seal, and knows both to be genuine.

As to the printed paper, that was sent to Monsieur de Torcy, of the discovery of a new French plot upon England, I know nothing of it, nor have I met with any body that has seen it. I suppose it must be some Grub-Street writer; and those, you know, print any stuff, to get a penny; and their news dies as soon as it comes out: Therefore I wonder Monsieur Torcy should lay stress upon such unknown, unauthorized pieces, which he knows creep out daily on both sides, and are not taken notice of by either. It is not a fair charge upon us, that we seek occasions to stir up animosities, and to pick quarrels with them. For my part I should be glad they would shew us the way, how they are to be avoided with any reasonable security to ourselves and neighbours.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, March 16, 1701.

Lord Melfort is sent to Angiers. The Court of Numb. XIX. Vol. III.

France concerted with that of St. Germain's first. Lord Middleton is not a little pleased.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, March 19, 1701.

Lord Melfort was ordered to Angiers by a Lettre de Cachet, yet some will have it, that he has underhand had assurances, that he shall be restored, when affairs will admit of it.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, March 23, 1701.

What I mentioned first to Monsieur de Torcy, was to know, whether he still doubted of Lord Melfort's letter. He said, not in the least, and that his wife had owned it. The excuse he made was, that the confusion he was in, and its being read to him in French, made him think, that there was something added; but that he since found it otherwise, and that thereupon he was banished. The use I made of this was to shew him those suspicions they had, that it was done to inflame the nation against France, could no longer remain; neither could I learn any thing about such a paper as Count Tallard sent, and was cried about the streets.

(1) Lamberty says, (I. 499.) Six Lords came to the Count de Briançon, and proposed to him, that the Duke of Savoy should deliver up one of his sons to be educated in England in the Protestant Religion; declaring, that, in that case, the act for the Hanover Succession should never pass. But the Duke refused to consent to it.

1700-1. to confirm the just suspicions of the Pretender's birth.

The King being very solicitous to defend the States of Holland from the insults and approaches, that were made upon them by the French in Flanders, and, if possible, to restore and preserve the balance of Europe, sent instructions to Mr. Stanhope, Envoy Extraordinary to the States, to enter into negotiations with the Ministers of France and Spain, pursuant to the addresses of both Houses. Accordingly Mr. Stanhope, after concerting matters with the States, delivered in proposals to the Count d'Avaux, the French Ambassador at the Hague, importing, that the King, his Master, and the States-General, had, on the 25th of March 1700, concluded a treaty of Partition with the French, to prevent a new war, which they had all the reason to apprehend, in case the King of Spain should die without issue; and that among other things, the principal aim of the contractors was to preserve peace, and particularly in those parts; but it was evident, that, though his most Christian Majesty had thought fit to accept the will of the late King of Spain, going in this manner off from the Partition, yet nevertheless his Britannick Majesty must not lose the effect of that treaty; that is to say, the peace and general tranquility; and that particular security must be given him, by some equivalent or otherwise. That for this end Mr. Stanhope had orders to propose the following points and articles.

That his most Christian Majesty shall, in a certain time limited, as short a one as can be agreed on, withdraw all his troops out of the Spanish Netherlands, without leaving any there; and that he shall not be allowed the sending any thither; but that hereafter no troops shall be kept in the Spanish Netherlands (except in the places of security, which will be mentioned in the following article, but Spaniards, Walloons, or those of other subjects of the Monarchy of Spain exclusively, under the oath, and in the pay of Spain, and no troops of his most Christian Majesty, directly or indirectly; yet it shall, nevertheless, be permitted to the King of Great-Britain, and the States-General, to send troops for the defence of the Netherlands, whenever they shall be lawfully required.

That, for the particular security of his Britannick Majesty, the cities of Ostend and Nieuport, with their ports, castles, and citadels, and all the forts and fortifications thereunto belonging, shall be given up to the exclusive care of his Majesty; all in the condition which they are now in, with a power to put in what garrison he pleases, either of his own troops, or of his Allies, that he may desire for that use, and what troops he shall think fit, whilst France or Spain shall not be permitted to put the least garrison, or to build behind, or about these cities, ports, and fortresses, any other forts, lines, or fortified works, or to do any thing, that might cause a prejudice to the guarding of these cities and fortresses, and hinder its effect.

That his Britannick Majesty may augment, diminish, and change the garrisons of these cities and fortresses, as often as he shall think fit, and send thither provisions, ammunition, arms, materials for fortifications, and in general, all that may be fit and necessary for the use of the garrisons and fortifications, without any hindrance by sea or by land, directly or indirectly.

That his Majesty shall have the full power and authority over these cities, ports, castles, and fortifications, where he shall have such his garrisons and commanders, as he shall think fit; having, and without prejudice to the other rights and revenues of Spain over and in these castles.

That, besides, his Britannick Majesty shall have liberty to fortify and repair the fortifications of these cities, ports, and fortresses, as he shall think proper; and in general to do all that he shall find necessary for their defence. That no kingdoms, provinces, cities, lands, or places, belonging to the Crown of Spain, within as well as out of Europe, and particularly no cities, places, or lands of the Spanish Netherlands, shall be allowed to be yielded or transferred, nor be able to devolve or come to the Crown of France, by donation, purchase, exchange, contract of marriage, succession by will, or intestate, nor by any other title that can be; and that they shall not be liable to be subjected to the power or the authority of his most Christian Majesty in any manner.

That the subjects of his Britannick Majesty shall keep and enjoy all the privileges, rights, immunities, and other advantages, in the Dominions and Kingdoms of Spain, as well within as out of Europe, and by consequence also in the Spanish Netherlands, both in regard to their navigation, commerce, and liberty of the ports, and every thing else, which they did enjoy, or ought to have enjoyed, at the death of the late King of Spain; and that thus every thing whatever, except that, about which it shall be otherwise agreed in the treaty to be made, shall be left in the condition in which it was at the death of the late King of Spain.

That all the treaties of peace and commerce, and other conventions, between England and Spain shall be renewed in the manner it shall be agreed on together, as far as it shall be changed by the treaty, that shall be made.

That, besides this, the subjects of his Britannick Majesty shall enjoy, in the kingdoms, dominions, cities, places, bays, and harbours of the Crown of Spain, within and without Europe, the same privileges, rights and franchises, as also all the immunities and advantages, which the subjects of his most Christian Majesty, or of any other Prince or Potentate enjoy, as well as those which shall be granted to any of them, and which they shall hereafter enjoy.

That it shall be promised solemnly, on the part of France, and of Spain, that this shall be exactly performed in all these points in general, and in each in particular.

That the treaty, to be made on this subject, shall be guaranteed by such Kings, Princes, and Potentates, which the one or the other of the contractors shall desire to do it, and that in the strongest manner they shall think fit.

All this to be done, with a reserve, to enlarge on these points in the negotiation, as much as shall be found necessary, to clear up their true sense and intention, as also to prevent all sorts of disputes.

These proposals were the same they seconded by others from the States-General, which agreed with them in every thing material, except that instead of Nieuport and Ostend, which were demanded by King William, as cautionary towns, the States required to have those of Venlo, Ruremond, Stevenswaert, Luxemburg, Namur, Charleroy, 1700-1. leroy, Mons, Dendermonde, Damme, and St. Donas, with all their appurtenances.

They are transmitted to the King of France. Cole.
The French Ambassador, after hearing both these proposals read, seemed greatly surprised, saying, that, as he expected the King of England and States General would demand to have the French troops withdrawn out of the Spanish Netherlands, to he came prepared to give satisfaction in that article, by assuring, that it should be done as soon as the King of Spain should have forces of his own to guard the country: But, as to the other articles, they were such, as could not be higher, if his Majesty had lost four battles; so that it was impossible he could give them any other answer for the present, than that he would transmit them to the King, as he did the same night. He added, that it seemed as if the States resolved to have war, and confirmed the advices he had from the French Minister at Vienna, that they had lately concluded and signed a league with the Emperor. From this charge the Dutch Deputies cleared themselves, by absolutely denying, that there was any such treaty, and alledging that it was notorious to all the world how much the States were inclined to peace, when they might have it with security, which was all they aimed at by these proposals.

The French, seeing these demands of the English and Dutch run so high, and being resolved to offer no other security for the peace of Europe, but the renewal of the treaty of Ryfwick, set all their engines at work in England, to involve us into such contentions at home, as should both disable us, from taking any care of foreign affairs, and make the rest of Europe conclude, that nothing considerable was to be expected from England. In this they were but too well seconded by the Parliament, as will presently appear.

The King acquaints the Parliament with these proceedings. Fr. H. C. III. 131.
On the 18th of March, the King sent a Message to the Commons by Mr. Secretary Hedges, importing, "That his Majesty having directed Mr. Stanhope, his Envoy Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at the Hague, to enter into negotiations in concert with the States-General, and other Potentates, for the mutual security of England and Holland, according to an address of their House to that effect; and that Mr. Stanhope having transmitted to his Majesty copies of the demands made by himself and the Deputies of the States, upon that subject, to the French Ambassador there; his Majesty had thought fit to communicate the same to the Commons; it being his intention to acquaint them from time to time with the state and progress of these negotiations, into which he had entered, pursuant to their address."

Address on the Partition treaty. Ibid.
When this message was considered by the Commons on the 21st of March, and the proposals of Mr. Stanhope and the Dutch Deputies to the French Ambassador were read, they resolved, that the treaty of Partition be read likewise; which being done, they voted, "That "an humble address be presented to his Majesty, to return the thanks of this House for his gracious message, wherein he is pleased to communicate his Royal intentions to acquaint this House from time to time with the state and progress of those negotiations, into which his Majesty has entered pursuant to the address of this House: And also to lay before his Majesty the ill consequences of the treaty of Partition (passed under the Great Seal of England, during the sitting of Parliament, and without the advice of the same) to this Kingdom and the Peace of Europe, whereby such large territories of the King of Spain's dominions were to be delivered up to the French King".

When this address was presented to the King, he somewhat resented the unkindness of it, and thought there was much more reason to complain of the perfidious breach of the treaty, than of the making of it. However, without taking any notice of that part of the address, he returned the following answer: "That he was glad, that they were pleased with his communicating to them the state of the negotiations he had entered into; and that he should continue to inform them of the progress, that should be made in them; and be always willing to receive their advice thereupon, being fully persuaded, that nothing could contribute more effectually to the happiness of the Kingdom, and the peace of Europe, than the concurrence of the Parliament in all his negotiations, and a good understanding between him and his people."

But the Lords had, before this, on the 17th of March, entered upon the consideration of the Partition treaty, the debate being begun by the Sheffield Marquis of Normandy, and the rest of the Tories. This they managed with great dexterity, while the matter was as much neglected by the King, who went that day to Hampton-Court, where he staid some time. By this means no directions were given, and those, who had been concerned in the treaty, were involved in great difficulties, before the Court was aware of it. The King either could not prevail with his new Ministers to excuse the treaty, if they would not justify it; or he neglected them so far, as not to speak to them at all about it. Those, who attacked it, said, they meant nothing in that but to offer the King advices for the future, to prevent such errors, as had been committed in that treaty, both as to matter and form. They blamed the giving such territories to the Crown of France, and the forsaking the Emperor. They also complained of the secrecy, in which the treaty was carried on, it not being communicated to the English Council or Ministry, but privately transacted by the Earls of Portland and Jersey. They blamed likewise the putting the Great Seal, first to blank powers, and then to the treaty itself, which, the King's new Ministers said, was unjust in the contrivance, and ridiculous in the execution (1).

To

(1) The treaty was likewise treated with great severity of language in the books and pamphlets of that time. Devenant, in his Essay upon the Balance of Power, represents, that the authors of the treaty "knew well enough, that it must bring difficulties almost insuperable upon any future Ministry. They could not, says he, but foresee, that the prodigious increase of power and strength, which the Partition treaty, had it taken effect, gave to the French, would to the last degree have alarmed all the thinking men of 1700-1.

To all this it was answered, that, there not being a force ready and sufficient to hinder the French from possessing themselves of the Spanish Monarchy, which they were prepared for, the Emperor had desired the King to enter into a treaty of Partition, and had consented to every article of it, except that which related to the Duchy of Milan. But the King, not thinking that worth the engaging in a new war, had obtained an exchange of it for the Duchy of Lorraine.

“of England. Did not Naples, and the influence they would have had upon Milan, intirely subject Italy to their dominion? If, with the ports they have already on the southern coast of France, they had likewise had Sicily, had they not been masters of the Levant-trade? And was not the Province of Guipuscoa a hook in the very throat of Spain? Had they not by this triple league in one instant more cities, people, and kingdoms, than probably they could have obtained by the sword attended still with victory in the course of a hundred years? But the Emperor did not acquiesce in it. Portugal terrified, but would possibly have declared against it, if any strong alliance had been formed. The Conclave began to tremble. Venice did not think it safe; and all the Princes and States of Italy began to find it high time to enter into alliances for their common preservation. Of all this war must have been the consequence.” Dr. Drake in his History of the last Parliament, endeavours to shew, that the late King of Spain’s will was the product of the Partition treaty; and that, if France had abode by that treaty, the balance of Europe had been as effectually broken, as it was by their acceptance of the King of Spain’s will. Under this second head he remarks, that “the possession of Naples and Sicily, and all the Spanish dependencies on the coast of Tuscany, with the adjacent islands, Santo Stefano, Porto Hercole, Orbitello, Telamone, Porto Longone, Piombino, Final, with the Marquisate belonging to it, Pontarabia, St. Sebastian, with the whole province of Guipuscoa, &c. gave the French such a number of good harbours in the Mediterranean, that the advantages of them, improved with their usual application and judgment, must have made them in a short time absolute Masters of the Mediterranean, and, in consequence of that, of the ocean also. How far this would have gone towards that universal Monarchy, which France so passionately longs for, the meanest capacity may judge. By this means, the Pope, the Tuscan, the Genoise, and the Spaniard, had been directly locked up; not a ship belonging to any of them durst have peeped out of harbour without a French pass. The Spanish flota would constantly and inevitably have been at their mercy; for all their commerce with the West-Indies must necessarily have ceased, and the King of Spain, how much soever he might have stomached it inwardly, must have lain as still as King Log, while the French played at leap-frog over him. The least show of repentment would have furnished him with a pretence to seize on the treasures of the West-Indies, and, like a kind neighbour, to have conveyed the galleons into their own harbours.”

The treaty was also animadverted upon, in a pamphlet, intitled, An account of the debate in town concerning Peace and War, in letters to a Gentleman in the country, the third letter of which is directly against the Partition treaty, the reasons for which are represented as merely plausible, but not solid; that it was a disingenuous one; that great services were done to France by it; that it was carried on without the confederates; that the Parliament was not consulted in it; that the balance of Europe was lost by it; that the Archduke should have been sent into Spain, which would have prevented that treaty; that the treaty produced the will of the King of Spain; and that the Spaniards complained of the treaty.

However, the treaty had some advocates in print, and particularly the author of two letters to a friend concerning the Partition treaty, republished in the third volume of the State Tracts, p. 184. Bishop Burnet had some hand in these letters, in the former of which the occasion of the treaty is thus stated: “We and the Dutch had got through a war at a vast charge, and with infinite danger. We saw the weakness of Spain in the business of Barcelona. There was no reckoning on them as capable of making a stand, if the King of France were freed from a war, since, when that pressed him on all hands, yet with a small army he could at his leisure take that important place. Had Spain any intrinick strength to resist, there was time enough given them to have brought it all together. If, I say, France then with so small a body made such a conquest, what could be expected from Spain, when the French King should send his whole strength against them? A fleet before Cadix, and two small armies marching in through Catalonia and Navarre, might have found it hard to subvert, but not to conquer Spain. The Emperor abandoning all other thoughts, had during the last war pursued his advantages against the Turks, and thereby had both exhausted his own strength, and disgusted his Allies. And, on the conclusion of the peace of Ryswick, he had shewed so great an inclination to run Hereby at any rate, and so little regard to the honour of a Prince to whom he owed so much, that this with some other things (which I love not to remember, because I hope that Court will grow wiser) had given so just a discontent, that few seemed willing to engage in a new war for him and his family. And his councils were so dilatory and uncertain, that, instead of pressing the renewal of a general alliance upon the conclusion of the peace, he seemed not to regard it, when pressed thereto. We here were so weary of taxes, and so jealous of a standing army, that we brought down our land-force, first to twelve thousand, and then to seven. Our fleet kept proportion to our army. The Dutch did not dissent so fast; yet they had no force to spare; and, to be sure, they would unwillingly engage in the quarrel deeper than we did. While the debates concerning the army were on foot, the ill health of the King of Spain was not forgot to be mentioned; and the danger of the progress, that the French might make, if we were reduced to such an incapacity of protecting the Spaniards, was often represented, but was often rejected with indignation, as an artifice of the Court to get an army kept up. Things being in such a state, might not the King think, that what was left for him to do, was to make the best bargain he could?” The Author then proceeds to shew, that, how bad soever the Partition might be, it seemed still more defensible to yield up some parts of the Spanish Monarchy, than to let France conquer it, or rather take it all. Spain itself, the West-Indies and Flanders, were the branches of that Monarchy, in which we were chiefly concerned; and, while these were kept intire in the same hands, our interests were pretty safe. It is known, that, what advantage soever the Spanish *Grande*es may make of the Dominions in and about Italy, Spain itself is not the stronger or richer for them, but much to the contrary. It is true, their interests at Rome are fortified by them; but we are little concerned in those. It was not to be imagined, that France, which had made so much noise with their pretensions to that Succession, and (how slight soever they may be) had involved all Europe in war upon yet slighter, and that saw how sure they were of conquering so feeble an enemy, and so weak a rival, would let all this go for nothing. They did not fear a new alliance against them; they knew well the temper both of the English and Dutch: They therefore pretended to the Italian Dominions. If the King had been in condition to have talked roundly to them, certainly that had been both the “wisest

1700-1. The Emperor did not agree to this, yet he pressed the King not to break off the treaty, but to get the best terms he could for him; and, above all things, he recommended secrecy, that so he might not lose his interest in Spain, by seeming to consent to this Partition. It is certain, that, by our Constitution, all foreign negotiations were trusted intirely to the Crown: That the King was under no obligation by law to communicate such secrets to his Council, or

" wisest and best method. But those, who seem, " now, the most inflamed against the Partition treaty, " know, in their consciences, that they themselves " would never have engaged in a new war, if the " Dominions in Italy, much less if the Duchy of " Milan had been the only point in debate. I leave " it to you to judge what a Parliament would have " said, if they had been called, and had found the " French King in possession of, perhaps, all the Span- " ish Monarchy (as, no doubt, by what we have " seen, he would soon have been upon the death of " the King of Spain) if they had discovered, that " offers had been made to have compounded for that " whole succession, by yielding up the Dominions in " Italy, but that the King and his Ministers had re- " jected the proposition? I doubt not, but then we " should have had impeachments upon impeachments; " and the suspicions of selling and betraying the world " into the hands of the French, would have carried " such characters of probability, that we would, in " reverse of St. Bartholomew Shower's subtle dis- " covery, have concluded who they were, that were " the instruments of France, and supposed them to " have been as well paid for it, as perhaps some have " been for later services." The Author then proceeds " to shew, that the Dominions in Italy, though very " valuable, yet, no naval power belonging to them, were " not, now, so considerable as they had been some years " before; nor was it certain, that, notwithstanding the " Partition treaty, they would have been a sure ac- " cession to the Crown of France, which, perhaps, would " have found as much opposition to it, as the was like to " receive now to her taking possession of the whole. " He next remarks, That King William did not build " much upon the faith and honour of the French King, " but might imagine, that age had qualified that un- " quiet spirit, which had given the world so much dis- " turbance. " He might think, that a bigotted Prince " would, above all other things, desire to have the Pa- " cacy under his protection, that is to say, at his " mercy. He would, perhaps, chuse rather to have " the Dominions, that were yielded to him by the trea- " ty, which he might expect, without the trouble and " charge of a war, of which it is not easy to see the " end: A Lady, that has great credit with him, might " be known to be fond of this Accession of Empire, " both as laying a great obligation on the Succession, " and as securing the quiet and life of one, in whom " she has so particular an interest: A Ministry com- " posed of such young persons, as might hope to out- " live their Monarch, for all his immortality, would " probably conclude, that it would be more merito- " rious, in another reign, to have extended the Em- " pire of France, than to have raised a younger son " of France, so as, perhaps, he might be able, one " day, to dispute matters with his elder brother. " Upon one, or more, of these reasons, or, perhaps, " upon much better, the King might have reckoned, " that the treaty would have been better stood to by " the French, without relying so intirely upon a faith, " that had been so often given, and so seldom kept." " He shews likewise, that his Majesty had other things " to depend on; as, particularly, that it was reasonable " to think, that the Emperor would have come into the " treaty, though it had been only with this design, that, " by his son's being in possession of the best part of the " Spanish Monarchy, he might thereby be the better " enabled to lay claim, and struggle for the rest. " Was " it reasonable to think, that a Prince, who had no " naval force, would have maintained a dispute in " opposition to all the naval power of the world, " united against him? And, could a Prince of such " exhausted revenue hope to succeed, in competition " against a Court, so dextrous in all the methods of " it, and so well furnished with all that was necessary " for making it most effectual? The Emperor's con- " duct, in this matter, had been so unaccountable, in " being so inactive to prevent it, that there was no " reason to suspect his not submitting to the Partition " treaty, when he saw it could not be helped. The " King might likewise trust, somewhat, to the virtues " and to the vices of the Spaniards. They have had " an antipathy to the French, of above two hundred " years standing. The Spaniards have never, before " this time, been guilty of betraying their country. " A fidelity, without example, has long supported a " sinking Monarchy; and so it might have been " still depended on. And their coming so tamely " under a French yoke, is a thing that was so little " looked for, that, till all saw it, none could believe " it. Upon all these accounts it might seem reason- " able enough, for the King to imagine, that the " treaty would have been stuck to, without an abso- " lute confidence in the virtues of the Christian King. " And, after all, as the King of Spain had lived be- " yond all men's expectations, so the King might have " hoped, that he might languish out yet a few years " more; and then the revenue of the Crown of Eng- " land would have been cleared of all anticipations, " and, in the mean while, the French King would " have been obliged to keep such measures, as would " have secured us from all attempts, and have sunk " the hopes of a treacherous party among ourselves, " who had set up their rest upon the greatness of " France, and begin now to revive their dead hopes, " which seemed quite withered by the peace of Rys- " wick, and by the seeming friendship between our " Court and that of Versailles." In the second letter, " the Author considers the objections made to the justice " and to the wisdom of the treaty. It was laid to be un- " just in itself, as being a disposition of the Dominions " of a third person, then alive, made by a confederacy " of two strangers, with one of the Pretenders to the " Succession, without the consent of the other; and, as, " being inconsistent with the separate article of the Grand " Alliance, made in 1689, whereby the States-General " stipulated with the Emperor, to assist him in taking " the succession of the Spanish Monarchy, in case of " the then King of Spain's death without issue. For " the better conceiving the force of the objections and " the answers, it will be proper to state the several pre- " tensions to the Succession. Philip the Third had issue " besides his son Philip the Fourth, three daughters; " Anna, the eldest, married to Lewis XIII., father of " Lewis XIV.; Margaret, the second, married to the " Emperor, Ferdinand III., Father of the reigning Em- " peror; and Catharine, married to the Duke of Savoy. " Philip the Fourth had issue, besides the last King of " Spain, dead without issue, two daughters; the eldest, " Maria Theresa, married to Lewis XIV., who had issue " the Dauphin; the other, Margaret, married to the " then Emperor, by whom she had issue only Maria " Antonietta, first wife to the Elector of Bavaria, and " they had one child, the late Electoral Prince, born in " 1691, and who died the 6th of February 1698. " Upon the several marriages of the two Infanta's with " Lewis XIII. and Lewis XIV., solemn renunciations " were made of all claims to the Succession of the Spanish " Dominions, by them or their descendants. Those " renunciations the House of Austria insisted upon as " valid, and so their claim took place. The French " pretended to object to their validity, and claimed the " Succession, as if nothing had passed to bar them. " This being the case, it appears, that the first treaty " of Partition was not liable to the objection of want of " proper parties; for, as the French King and the Dau- " phin entered into it, so the Elector of Bavaria, in be- " half of his son, in whom at that time the whole

to hear, much less was he obliged to follow their advice. In particular it was said, that the Keeper of the great Seal had no sort of authority, to deny the putting it, either to powers for a treaty, or to any treaty, which the King should agree to. That the law gives no direction in such matters, and he could not refuse to put the Great Seal to any thing, for which he had an order from the King, unless the matter was contrary to law, which had made no provision in this case. They insisted most on the other side upon the concluding a treaty of this importance, without right of the House of Austria was indisputably lodged, was not only consenting, but promoted it. And this first treaty had a very good consequence; for, as soon as the transaction took air, it not only occasioned the King of Spain to make a will, by which he declared the Electoral Prince his universal heir, but it made the Emperor to acquiesce in it, who, till that time, was vigorously soliciting, by his Minister at Madrid, for a will in favour of the Archduke. As to the second treaty, it appears, by the powers, which are in print, that it began in Holland, by a joint negotiation of the Emperor's Plenipotentiary, with those of England, France, and the States-General; but, the Emperor not thinking it fit to appear a party in such a negotiation, for reasons which were obvious enough, the treaty was afterwards concluded without him. "To say it was unjust, for that reason, is, at the same time, to say, the separate article of the Grand Alliance was unjust; for that was disposing of the Dominions of a King then living, by an agreement of two strangers, with one only of the Pretenders. As the Emperor was no party to this last treaty, so France was no party to the first. If it was consistent with justice for the King of England and the States to agree, that one of the Pretenders should have the whole, without any privacy or consent of the other, or of Spain; how could it be unjust (as to the nature of the contract) to enter into an agreement with one, only, of the Pretenders, for distributing the succession among all that claimed? "When controversies arise between sovereign Princes, there is no judicature to determine of the right; and they are at liberty to refuse to submit to a mediation, which is often hard to bring about, because both parties must agree in the Mediators. Controversies of this sort, would never have an end, but in the ruin of one of the parties, and, perhaps, of neighbouring nations, in the consequence, unless other Princes and States may, by a proper interposition, in such a manner as they think most agreeable to the justice and to the good of their own subjects, oblige all the Pretenders to recede from extremities, and, in case of obstinacy, on any side, to assist those, who are willing to yield, for the sake of peace. This has been the approved practice of all ages. A well founded apprehension of an unreasonable increase of power, in a neighbouring Prince, has been always held to be a just ground of making war: It may be better defended to be a just reason to prevent it by treaty. An Accession of the intire Spanish Dominions, either to the Emperor (whose claim was for himself and his lineal descendants,) or to France, must, unquestionably, have formed a power extremely terrible to the rest of Europe. It was, therefore, necessary to think of dividing the Succession, or turning it out of the direct line, for the common security of Christendom. Princes are bound to provide for the safety of their subjects, by all reasonable ways: If the most eligible cannot be arrived at, they must pursue such methods as are practicable. It was visible, the French King was resolved not to acquiesce in the renunciations: His flatterers had absolutely hardened him in the opinion, that all those solemn acts were insignificant; and, to make good these sentiments, he had not only employed his Lawyers, but his Arms, in the dispute, for many years. This the Emperor well knew; nay, it is expressly declared in the separate article of the Grand Alliance: "So that, when the accident happened, the war was inevitable; and the accident was expected every day. No care had been taken to form the necessary alliances, on the conclusion of the treaty of Ryswick; nothing was determined, as to the Spanish Succession; no provision for securing any thing stipulated by the Grand Alliance. On the contrary, some things had passed, at that time, which necessarily made a strangeness between the Emperor and the Protestant Princes. No arguments were omitted to draw him into new measures, in order to make the separate article of the Grand Alliance significant and effectual. And it was highly reasonable to insist upon terms, when it was so fresh in memory, where the burden of the last war lay. But, by reason of the very slow measures of the Court of Vienna, and the particular interests, which the Emperor thought himself under the necessity of managing with the Court at Madrid, nothing had been done, or was likely to be done, on that side; and, at the same time, the subjects of England and Holland seemed neither willing, nor able, to enter into a new war. France did not only continue armed, as during the war, but was at vast expence in buying horses for remounting their cavalry, and lifting the ablest men, as fast as they were disbanded by the Confederates. Without a treaty, a war was inevitable, or rather, France was master of all, without a war. This was the unhappy necessity, under which the King and the States found themselves. And, in such circumstances, where was the injustice, to accept of the contract of the French King and the Dauphin, to content themselves with a part only of the vast succession, and such a part, as would not only be at least inconvenient to the parties contracting, but to the general liberty and security of Europe, rather than leave him in circumstances to seize the whole, or, at least, to take the immediate possession of those parts, which would necessarily and suddenly endanger the trade and safety of the English and the Dutch? Upon the foot of this treaty, the King and the States acquired an explicit and direct right to compel the French King to acquiesce in the share allotted to him, which perhaps was wanting before. For though Spain, in respect of the several renunciations and solemn acts, had an express right to oppose the future pretences of France to any part of that Succession, yet it was not plain, that, by renewing his claim, he violated any league with England and Holland, which would be the case after his entering into that treaty. There is another very considerable thing to justify this treaty, if it be true, as it has been affirmed, that, during the transactions in Holland in the Summer 1699, the Emperor's Ministers, though they declared they could not make themselves parties to an agreement for dismembering of the Spanish Monarchy, which would wholly ruin their affairs at Madrid, yet they did not express any great aversion to be seemingly forced to some reasonable terms. It has not often been known, that a deliberate act of three Sovereign powers, made upon very weighty grounds, has been so frankly called unjust. The Emperor has not found cause to give it that hard name; nay, the French themselves, who have violated this treaty in the most open and shameless manner, and want to the highest degree an excuse for breach of faith, and had a good one, if the treaty was unjust, yet they have never called it by that name, but have contented themselves to take up the wretched pretence, that, by breaking the league, they have pursued the spirit and meaning of it." The Author then proceeds to justify the wisdom of the treaty, and to shew, that it was the only means left to prevent the impending destruction of Europe; and that, in the making of it, the interest of the House of Austria was sincerely

1700-1. out communicating it first to the Privy Council. During this debate, some Lords having spoke very reflectingly on the French King, the Earl of Rocheſter animadverted upon them, alledging, that all men ought to ſpeak reſpectfully of Crowned Heads; and that this duty was more particularly incumbent on the Peers of a Kingdom, who derive all their honour and luſtre from the Crown. This was ſeconded by another Earl, who ſaid, That the King of France was not only to be reſpected, but likewiſe to be feared. To whom another Lord replied, That he hoped no man in England needed to be afraid of the French King; much leſs the Peer, who ſpoke laſt, who was too much a friend to that Monarch, to fear any thing from him. Thus ended the firſt day of the debate (1).

The Earl of Portland apprehending, that this might fall too heavily upon him, got the King's leave to communicate the whole matter ^{The Lords adviſed with in the next treaty ſigned it.} to Burnet.

ſincerely eſpouſed, and a ſollicitous care uſed, that the balance of Europe ſhould not be intirely broken, and at the ſame time England and Holland did not neglect themſelves, but made ſuch a diſtribution, as might be leaſt prejudicial to their intereſt. "The three things," ſays he, which they were principally obliged to take care of, were their ſecurity, their trade, and the common intereſt of the Proteſtant Religion. In order to this, they were firſt to take care of the Barrier in Flanders, for making good whereof ſo much money had been ſpent, and ſo much blood had been ſhed, it being demonſtrably plain, that, if France was poſſeſſed of the Spaniſh Netherlands, it was not poſſible for the Dutch to bear long the expence of ſupporting themſelves; and when they fell a prey to France (notwithſtanding the vain diſcourſes we heard not long before) England was not likely to be free any great while.

"The ſecond thing, which concerned both nations highly, was the preſerving the trade of Spain, and the uſe of her ports.

"The third thing, which concerned England, and the Dutch not a little, was to keep the Weſt-Indies, and the trade thither, in the condition they then ſtood. For it will not be denied, if ever France can appropriate to itſelf the trade of Spain, and the management of the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, ſhe will ſoon be miſtreſs of the world.

"Theſe were the things to be firſt looked after, and for theſe the treaty did fully provide. It is not to be denied but that the Turky trade was of great conſequence to both nations, and the trade of Italy not inconfiderable, eſpecially, to Holland; and it were to be wiſhed, that every thing could have been intirely gained: But, when that was impoſſible, the moſt weight was to be laid on what was of the greateſt conſequence."

"—The treaty of Partition, if it had been ſtood to, had placed Spain, the Weſt-Indies, the Netherlands, and Milan in ſuch hands, as France could expect no ſincere aſſiſtance from. What real addition of power Naples and Sicily would have brought to her, is not ſo plain. France is a compleat united ſtrength. Whether ſhe would have been ſtronger by the poſſeſſion of two remote countries, whoſe natives have the utmoſt hatred to the French, experience only would have ſhewn. Italy would have been alarmed to the laſt degree, to ſind the French taking poſſeſſion of ſo large a part of it, which it could not be poſſible to prevent, conſidering the power and preparations of France. But this would not have been the firſt time, that the French had got to be maſters of Naples and Sicily, and yet were not able to hold them. Certain it is, the Court of Rome would have found itſelf obliged to ſet all its engines on work to prevent the eſtabliſhing of that ſlavery, which was inevitably coming upon them. They would be diſcerning enough to ſee, that from that hour the French King became peaceably ſettled in the poſſeſſion of Naples and Sicily, the Pope muſt ſink in his character, and would be no more than a French Biſhop. The reſt of the Catholic world would hardly conſider him as a common Father, who could be made and unmade at the pleaſure of France. Without pretending to prophecy, one may ſay literally, that heaven and earth would have been moved upon this occaſion. The Church would have drawn out all her forces ſpiritual and temporal; and, beſides the influence ſhe would always have upon the Italian Princes and States, which is avowedly not little, they themſelves are quick-fighted enough to ſee, what different figures the Princes of France make in this age from what they made heretofore, and to learn caution from ſo ſignificant examples. Beſides the Pope's remonſtrances would have had the more authority as well as vigour, from the ſcandalous appearance it would have had to the whole world, that France, in conjunction with two Heretic powers, ſhould diſpoſe of the ſiefs of the Church. The Emperor would undoubtedly have been ſollicited by all ſorts of arguments to aſſiſt the Church, and aſſert the liberty of Italy; and, how far he might have been able to reſiſt, might not be difficult to gueſs. All the Catholic Princes of Germany were at liberty to act as the conjuncture invited them. The Italians would not have apprehended any thing from Spain; they would have underſtood eaſily, which way the Archduke's wiſhes would go. The Duke of Lorain's affection to the Houſe of Auſtria is ſo well known, that it is certain the French could have depended on nothing from Milan in his hands. And though the late Chancellor in his letter ſaid, That, if the treaty ſhould take place, and Milan could not be relieved by ſea, it would be of little ſignification in the hand of any Prince, we ſee he was miſtaken, and that very powerful reliefs might be ſent by land to Milan, and the Emperor and Empire might always have an open way into Italy through that country. The King of France would have been cautious to have left his Frontier naked towards Flanders, when in poſſeſſion of a Prince of the Houſe of Auſtria, or to have left the Rhine unguarded, when the Pope would be ſure to have a prevailing power with the Eccleſiaſtical Electors, and the other Catholic Princes of the Empire. This would have been the higheſt ſecurity to the Proteſtant intereſt, for which certainly we were above all other things concerned. Italy would have been the ſcene of the war, where upon all accounts we ought to wiſh it, and not only as being the moſt remote from us. The apprehenſion of a Catholic league, which is no chimera, and which it is to be too juſtly feared may be the immediate conſequence of a ſettled peace among the Papiſh powers, when the zeal of the Emperor, as well as of the French King, is conſidered, would have been far removed. In ſuch a ſtate of things we could apprehend nothing to our trade, not even in the Mediterranean. All parties would have found it reaſonable to be courting the great naval powers of the world. We might be neuter, if we thought fit, or might have made our own terms. We were not bound to take any other ſhare in the war than we pleaſed; for, though we ſtood obliged to ſee the treaty executed, yet in the utmoſt ſtrictneſs that was all. We were not bound to maintain the reſpective parties in poſſeſſion: We might have enjoyed the advantages of peace, or we might have otherwiſe found our advantages in return for our aſſiſtance, in caſe we choſe to give it to either ſide."

(1) There was ſo great warmth in the debates of the Commons concerning this treaty, that more than one of the Members broke in upon common decency and good manners to a high degree. Seymour, Bolles, and others compared the dividing another man's Kingdom

1700-1. next day to the House, when he told them, Burnet. that he had not concluded the treaty alone, but had, by the King's order, acquainted six of his chief Ministers with it, who were the Earls of Pembroke and Marlborough, the Viscount Lonsdale, the Lord Somers and Hallifax, and Secretary Vernon. Upon which these Lords, being likewise freed by the King from the oath of secrecy, informed the House, that the Earl of Jersey having in the King's name called them together, the treaty was read to them; and that they excepted to several things in it, but they were told, that his Majesty had carried the matter as far as was possible, and that he could obtain no better terms. That therefore when they were thus assured, that no alterations could be made, but that every thing was settled, they gave over insisting on particulars; and only advised, that his Majesty might not engage himself in any thing, that would bring on a new war, since the nation had been so uneasy under the last. This was carried to the King, and that, a few days after, he told some of them, that he was made acquainted with their exceptions; but, how reasonable soever they were, he had driven the matter as far as he could. The Earl of Pembroke said to the House of Lords, he had offered the King those advices, that he thought were most for his service, and for the good of the nation; but that he did not think himself bound to give an account of that to any other persons. He was not the person aimed at; for which reason there was nothing said, either against him, or the Earls of Marlborough or Jersey. Upon this the debate went on. Some said, this was a mockery, to ask advice, when there was no room for it. It was answered, that the King had asked advice of his Privy Council, and they had given it; but that, such was the Royal prerogative, that it was still free to him to follow it or not, as he saw cause.

The Lords
address
about it.
Fr. H. L.
II. 25.

In conclusion, after three days debate, the House of Lords resolved to set out this whole matter in an address to the King, complaining both of the Partition treaty, and of the method, in which it had been carried on. The Lord Wharton moved an addition to the address, that, whereas the French King had broke that treaty, they should advise his Majesty to treat no more with him, or rely on his word, without a real security. This was much opposed by all those, who were against engaging in a new war: They said, all motions of that kind ought to come from the House of Commons, who only could support such an advice, which did in effect engage us in a new war; nor could they lay the blame on the breaking of a treaty, which they were resolved to condemn. They also excepted to the words real security as ambiguous; but the majority of the House agreed to it, for there was such treachery in the French negotiations, that they could not be relied on without a good guarantee, and the pledge of some strong places. It now plainly appeared, that the design was to set on the House of Commons to impeach some Lords, who had been concerned in the Partition treaty; for it was moved to send the address to the Commons for their concurrence, but that was not carried. The address was to this effect: "That their Lordships, having considered the treaty of the 21st of February, or the 15th of March 1700, made with the French King, together with the separate and secret articles, which his Majesty had been pleased to communicate to them, did most humbly represent to him, that, to their great sorrow, they found the matters thereof to have been of very ill consequence to the peace and safety of Europe; for that, besides the occasion it might have given to the late King of Spain, to have made his will in favour of the Duke of Anjou, if that treaty had taken effect; the prejudice to his Majesty and his subjects, and indeed to all Europe, by the addition of Sicily, Naples, several ports of the Mediterranean, the Province of Guipuzcoa, and the Duchy of Lorain, had been not only very great, but contrary to the pretence of the treaty itself, which was to prevent any umbrage that might have been taken, by uniting to many States and Dominions under one head. That, by all the informations they had had of that fatal treaty, they could not find, that the verbal orders and instructions (if any were given to his Majesty's Plenipotentiaries) were ever considered in any of his Majesty's Councils; or that the draught of that treaty had ever been laid before his Majesty, at any meeting of his Council, much less that it was advised or approved of by any Council or Committee of Council. Wherefore they thought themselves bound in duty to his Majesty, and justice to their Country, most humbly to beseech him, that, for the future, he would be pleased to require and admit, in all matters of importance, the advice of his natural born subjects, whose known probity and fortunes might give him and his people a just assurance of their fidelity to his service; and that, in order thereunto, he would be pleased to constitute a Council of such persons, to whom his Majesty might be pleased to impart all affairs both at home and abroad, which might any way concern him and his dominions. For as interest and natural affection to their country would incline them to wish the welfare and prosperity of it much more than others, who had no such ties upon them; and as their experience and knowledge of their country would also render them more capable than strangers, of advising his Majesty in the true interests of it; so they were confident, that, after such large and repeated demonstrations of his subjects duty and affection, his Majesty could not doubt of their zeal in his service, nor want the knowledge of persons fit to be employed in all his most secret and arduous affairs. And that, since it appeared the French King's accepting of the King of Spain's will was a manifest violation of that treaty, they humbly advised his Majesty, in future treaties with " that dom to robbing on the high-way. It was called, by Howe, a felonious treaty, which, as the report then was, the King so highly relented, that he dropped an expression, signifying, that, if the disparity of their condition had not restrained him, he would have demanded the satisfaction of him, which all Gentlemen have a right to demand of one that gives the lye.

(1) The

1700-1. "that Prince, to proceed with such caution, as might carry a real security."

This address being carried by the Lord-Keeper alone to Kensington, who there found two or three of the Lords in waiting, to make a shew of a House, it was presented, on the 24th of March, to his Majesty, who answered, "That it contained matter of very great moment; and that he would always take care, that all treaties, he made, should be for the honour and safety of England". The King seemed to bear this censure of the treaty with his usual coldness: And the new Ministers continued still in his confidence, but he laid the matter much to heart. Now he perceived the error he had fallen into, by the change he had made in the Ministry. It was plain, they resolved to govern him in every thing, and not to be governed by him in any one thing.

On the 31st of March, the King acquainted the Commons, "That having received an account from Mr. Stanbope, his Envoy, at the Hague, that the French Ambassador there had declared, that the King his Master had no other answer to return to the demands of the States-General, than that he was ready to renew the treaty of Ryswick, it being all the security the States were to expect; and that he had no orders to give any answer to his Majesty's Envoy; but, if his Majesty had any thing to demand, it might be done by his Ambassador at Paris, or the French Minister at London; and that he had no command to treat with any but the States. And his Majesty having also received two resolutions of the States, and a memorial from their Envoy in England, relating to the ships they were sending to join his Majesty's fleet, and the succours they desired might be hastened to them, by virtue of the treaty of March 3, 1677; his Majesty had thought fit to communicate the whole to that House, that they might be particularly informed of the present state of affairs abroad, where the negotiations seemed to be at an end, by the positive answer the French Ambassador had given to the States, which his Majesty recommended to the serious consideration of that House, as a matter of the greatest weight and consequence, and desired they would give him such advice upon it, as might be for their own security, and that of the States-General, and the peace of Europe."

The Commons, having taken this message into consideration on the 2d of April, resolved unanimously, "That the humble advice of this House be given to his Majesty, to desire, that his Majesty will be pleased to carry on the negotiations in concert with the States-General, and take such measures therein, as may most conduce to their safety; and that his Majesty would pursue the treaty made with the States-General, the 3d of March, 1677; and to assure him, that they would effectually enable him to support the treaty of 1677." By this treaty made by King Charles with the Dutch, England was bound to assist them with ten thousand men, and twenty ships of war, if they were attacked. Though the King knew what the Commons meant by confining him to the treaty of 1677, and speaking in general terms of his providing for their security, namely, to evade his desire of forming a Confederacy for a new war, without which he foresaw France would never yield up any part of the Spanish Monarchy; he returned, however, to their resolution of advice, this lost answer, "That, according to their advice, he had given orders to his Envoy at the Hague to carry on the negotiations in concert with the States-General, and to take such measures therein, as might most conduce to their security. He thanked them for the assurance they had given, that they would effectually enable him to support the treaty of 1677; and told them, that he would pursue the same, as they advised; and he did not doubt, but the readiness, which they had shewn upon this occasion, would very much contribute to the obtaining such a security, as was desired."

Though the Commons could not, upon this occasion, be carried farther than to advise the King to pursue the treaty of 1677; the House of Lords, however, addressed him to enter into leagues offensive and defensive with the Emperor and other Princes and States, who were interested against the conjunction of the French and Spanish Monarchies. This coldness and uncertainty in the English Councils gave the French great advantages, in their negotiations both in Germany and Portugal. They tried the Courts of Italy, but without success; only the Duke of Mantua consented, that they should make a shew, as if they had surprized him, and so force him to put Mantua into their hands. The Pope and the Venetians would not declare themselves. The former favoured the French, as the latter did the Emperor, who began the war with a pretension on the Duchy of Milan, as a fief of the Empire, that devolved on him; and he was making magazines, both in Tirol and at Trent. The French seemed to despise all he could do, and did not apprehend, that it was possible for him to march an army into Italy. Both the King and the States-General pressed him to make that attempt. The Elector of Bavaria and some of the Circles had agreed to a neutrality this year; so that there was no hope of doing much upon the Rhine; and the French were making the Italians feel, what insolent masters they were like to prove. This produced a general uneasiness among them, which determined the Emperor to send an army into Italy under the command of Prince Eugene. England was all this while very unwilling to engage; yet, for fear we should at last see our interest so clearly, that we must have fallen into it, those, who were practised on to embroil the nation, so that we might not be in a condition to mind foreign affairs, set on foot a design to impeach the former Ministry.

In the mean time, a letter written in Latin came to the King from the King of Spain, giving notice of his Accession to the Crown (1).

The King's message about the French King's answer.
Pr. H. C. III. 132.

The Commons advise upon it.

1700-1. This letter was delivered by Torcy on the 19th of April, N. S. to the Earl of Manchester at Paris, who desired him, as Count Tallard had left England, to transmit it to his Master. It was dated, the day after King Philip entered into Spain; but the date and the letter were visibly written at different times. The King ordered the letter to be read in the Cabinet-Council on the 13th of April; where there was a short debate concerning it, but it was never brought into any further deliberation there. The Earl of Rocheſter ſaw, that the King ſeemed diſtrufteful of him, and referred to him in the matter, and was highly offended at it. He and the reſt of the new Miniſtry preſſed his Maſteſty to own the King of Spain, and to answer the letter; and, ſince the Dutch had done ſo, it ſeemed reaſonable, that the King ſhould likewiſe do it. They prevailed at laſt, but with much difficulty. The thing was kept ſecret, and was not communicated to the Privy Council or to the two Houſes; nor did the King ſpeak of it to any of the foreign Miniſters. The Paris Gazette gave the World the firſt notice of it. This, being carried in ſuch a manner, ſeemed the more ſtrange, becauſe his Miniſtry had ſo lately condemned a former one, for not communicating the Partition treaty to the Council, before it was concluded; and yet had, in a matter of great conſequence, ſo ſoon forgot the cenſures, which they had thrown out ſo liberally upon the ſecrecy with which that matter had been tranſacted (1).

The Earl of Manchester, having received an account from Mr. Secretary Vernon of his Maſteſty's answer to the King of Spain's letter, informed Torcy, the French Miniſter, of it; and took notice of it to the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, who did not know before, that his Maſter had wrote to King William. But the Emperor's Miniſter at Paris, ſoon hearing what had paſſed, expreſſed great ſurprize to the Earl of Manchester, and ſaid, that this ſtep would diſcourage the Emperor's friends. The Earl answered, that it was no more than what the States-General had done, and that he ſaw how the Empire itſelf was divided.

Mr. Stanbope likewiſe complimented the Spaniſh Ambaſſador at the Hague, upon the recognition of the King of Spain by King William, while Monſieur d'Avaux, the French Ambaſſador at the Hague, preſented an amuſing Memorial to the States-General, ſetting forth, "That having transmitted their reſolution of the firſt of April to his Maſter, wherein they deſired the negotiations might be reſumed, in conjunction with the King of England's Envoy, for maintaining the peace of Europe, and providing for their own ſecurity; and that their Lordſhips having at the ſame time declared, they wiſhed nothing ſo much, as that thoſe negotiations might be brought to a ſpeedy and good conclusion with his Maſter; to whom he had given an account of the answer he gave their Lordſhips concerning the admittance of the Engliſh Envoy, and he had intirely approved the ſame, and was pleaſed with the aſſurances given by their Lordſhips of the deſire they had to preſerve the peace. And, as his Maſteſty continued in the reſolution of maintaining the public tranquillity, he would conſent to every expedient, that might conduce towards ſecuring the common good and repoſe of Chriſtendom; and that, in order thereunto, his Maſteſty had no ſooner been acquainted with their Lordſhips deſign of renewing the conferences, but he had commanded his Ambaſſador to reſume the ſame, and continue at the Hague."

Notwithſtanding this ſpecious declaration, The States the deſign of the French politics was ſtill to reſuſe to keep out the Engliſh Envoy, and to engage the States to treat ſeparately. The Dutch Deputies immediately apprehended their meaning by ambiguity

"ther and Couſin; ſince we are, after perfecting of our journey, arrived at this Court, and have there taken poſſeſſion of all the Kingdom and Dominions belonging to the Crown of Spain, we will not delay giving your Maſteſty notice of it, and to aſſure you at the ſame time, that nothing is more deſired by us than the cultivating of a mutual friendſhip with your Maſteſty and your Crown, that ſo we may by real ſigns let your Maſteſty ſee the inclination of our mind, and that we may alſo in this imitate the examples of the moſt ſerene Kings, our predeceſſors, always mindful of the welfare of the Chriſtian world. Thus may the moſt good and great God bleſs your life with his grace."

(1) His Maſteſty's letter to the King of Spain was likewiſe in Latin, and the tranſlation of it is as follows:

"William the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. to the moſt ſerene and potent Prince, the Lord Philip the Fifth, by the ſame Grace, King of Spain, both Sicilies, Jeruſalem, India, &c. Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, Brabant, and Milan, Earl of Hapsburg, Flanders, Tirol, &c. our moſt dear Brother and Couſin, greeting.

"Moſt ſerene and moſt potent Prince, Brother, and Couſin, we have received your Maſteſty's letter of the 24th of March laſt, which was for many reaſons very acceptable to us, as well becauſe it gave us notice of your happy arrival in your Kingdom of Spain, and of your coming to the poſſeſſion of it, and taking upon you the Government of the Dominions thereunto belonging; as becauſe you have aſſured us, that your Maſteſty hath a mind, that the moſt ancient friendſhip and correſpondence betwixt the two Crowns ſhall remain inviolable. We have indeed willingly embraced this opportunity to congratulate your Maſteſty, on your happy Acceſſion to the Crown of Spain, and to certify to you how much we value you; and how great a deſire we have, that your Maſteſty ſhould know, that we will, with great application, do all that we can, that the mutual union ſubſiſting betwixt us by treaties and friendſhip be cloſer united, and that the advantages of both nations may every day be more and more promoted and flouriſh; which we hope will alſo end in the advantage and proſperity of all Europe. For the reſt, we recommend your Maſteſty to the care and protection of Almighty God. Given at our Palace at Kenſington, the 17th of April, in the year of our Lord 1701, and the 13th of our reign."

Your Maſteſty's moſt loving Brother and Couſin,

William R.
James Vernon.

(1) This

1700-1. ambiguity of the memorial, and therefore preferred Count d'Avaux to explain himself, letting him know at the same time, that the States would not enter into any negotiation with France, but in conjunction with England, their interests in this case being inseparable; and that they must insist upon a positive answer to that point, especially now that his Britannic Majesty's owning the King of Spain had removed the principal objection, that was before insisted upon against treating with the Ministers of England. The French Ambassador, to delay his answer, desired time to send for new instructions to Court, which they appeared no way forward to send him; their design being to draw the business into a considerable length; which gave them opportunity to strengthen themselves daily on the frontiers of Holland, and to secure the Milanese.

And press
the King for suc-
court.

Two or three fruitless conferences passed at the Hague, wherein the French Ambassador was still attempting to draw in the States to treat alone, without the concurrence of England, which they would by no means agree to. His Majesty in return did all that lay in his power to assist them; for which end he sent the three Scots regiments, retained in his own pay in Scotland, over into Holland. When the States had procured all possible supplies and reinforcements by their money and interest from Princes abroad, and had exerted their Power to the utmost at home, they wrote a letter to the King, to inform him how matters stood with them, and to desire the troops to be sent over to their assistance without delay, as stipulated by the treaty of 1677 (1). Upon which the King, on the 8th of May, sent this message to the House of Commons.

"William R.

"HIS Majesty having lately received an account from Mr. Stanhope of the present posture of affairs in Holland, and likewise a letter from the States-General, which is of the greatest importance. And his Majesty, who has so perfect a knowledge of their country, being intirely convinced of the hardships of their present condition, and the great pressures they now lie under, which are particularly expressed in their letter, has thought it absolutely necessary to communicate the same to this House; that the Expectations the States have of present assistances from his Majesty, may more fully appear. And his Majesty does not doubt, but this House will be so justly sensible of those immediate dangers, to which they stand exposed, as to take the same into their most serious and effectual consideration; it being most evident, that the safety of England, as well as the very being of Holland, does very much depend upon your resolution in this matter."

This message was considered the next day, The resolution of the Commons. and the Commons resolved, "That they will effectually assist his Majesty to support his Allies, in maintaining the liberty of Europe, and will immediately provide succours for the States-General, according to the treaty of the 3d of March 1677". This resolution being presented to the King by the whole House, May the 10th, he gave them the following answer:

"Gentlemen,

"I Return you my hearty thanks for the ready assurances you give me of providing immediate succours for the States-General, and

The King's answer.

(1) This letter was as follows (Cole, p. 379.)

SIR,

After the protestations, which we have made to your Majesty, in our last letter, of the 23d of April, not to enter into any negotiation with France, but in concert with England, we have thought fit to ask of the Count d'Avaux, Ambassador Extraordinary of his most Christian Majesty, if he was inclined and authorized to re-enter into the negotiation, in the manner it was begun, in conjunction with the Minister of your Majesty; as you may see, by our resolution of the 2d of this month, here annexed. Count d'Avaux, having sent this to his most Christian Majesty, presented us, after the return of his Courier, with the memorial, of which we join likewise a copy to this letter. We have immediately communicated it to Mr. Stanhope, Envoy Extraordinary from your Majesty, and, after having concerted with him about it, we found in the said memorial, certain obscurities, which made us doubt of its true sense: For that reason, we thought it necessary to shew the Count d'Avaux the letter, which we did ourselves the honour to write to your Majesty, on the 23d of April last, and our engagements to take no measures in the negotiation, but in concert with you. The Count d'Avaux answered our Deputies, That he was come hither only to treat about means to preserve the general peace, and to establish our particular security: That, if we concert on this with your Majesty, he had nothing to say against it; and that he was contented, that your Majesty's Envoy should assist at the conferences to be held about this; but that he was not at all authorized to enter into a negotiation with us, about the interests of England, which were to be treated of elsewhere. Upon this, our Deputies represented, That, in the conferences about a general peace, your Majesty was equally concerned with us: That our security could not, by any means, be separated from that of England: That the two nations had, in this, a common interest; and that we could not but look upon your Majesty as a principal party concerned, as much as we, in the present negotiations, without our injuring your Majesty. But, notwithstanding several instances of our Deputies, and all the reasons they could alledge, Count d'Avaux persisted in the forementioned answer, saying, That he had no other orders: That he would send our resolution (of which your Majesty will here see the copy) to the Court of France, without giving the least hopes of an answer conformable to our sentiments. Upon the report, which has been made to us, we have judged, that thus they would separate the interests of England from those of our Republic. We look upon them as inseparable; and, as it is a plain case that they are so, we could draw no other conclusion from this proceeding, but that, on the side of France, there was a design to end the conferences, and to consent to none of the securities demanded, which are so necessary to the preservation of the Kingdoms of your Majesty, and of our Republic. We are obliged to give your Majesty notice of all this. We protest, that, our interests being the same with those of your Majesty, in this negotiation, and inseparable one from the other, we shall not suffer them to be divided in any manner. In the mean while, Sir, we cannot but represent to your Majesty the pressing occasion we have to be assisted, without loss of time, and the apparent danger, in which we are. You know, to the bottom, the State of our affairs; and you can easily judge, if it be possible, in the situation, in which we are, to resist forces so much superior, as those

"and for the zeal you express for the common cause. I know nothing, that can be more effectual for its support both at home and abroad than the unanimous concurrence, which you have shewed upon this occasion. And it will be a particular satisfaction to me, in my time, to revive the glory, which the English nation has formerly had, of maintaining the liberty and balance of Europe."

The King likewise communicated the letter from the States General to the House of Lords, who, on that occasion, presented this address on the 14th of May:

The Lords
address upon the States
letter.

"WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, return your Majesty our most humble thanks, for communicating to us the letter from the States General to your Majesty. It gives us an opportunity (with great satisfaction) to repeat to your Majesty the assurances of our duty, and zeal for your service. And we take this occasion further to assure your Majesty, we are very sensible of the great and imminent danger, to which the States-General are at present exposed. And we do perfectly agree with them in believing, that their "safety and ours are so inseparably united, 1700-1.

"that whatsoever is ruin to the one, must be fatal to the other. And we humbly desire your Majesty will be pleased, not only to make good all the articles of any former treaty to the States-General, but that you will enter into a strict league offensive and defensive with them, for our common preservation; and that you will invite into it all Princes and States, who are concerned in the present visible danger, arising from the union of France and Spain. And we further desire your Majesty, that you will be pleased to enter into such alliances with the Emperor, as your Majesty shall think fit, pursuant to the ends of the treaty of 1689. Towards all which, we assure your Majesty of our hearty and sincere assistance, not doubting, but, whenever your Majesty shall be obliged to engage for the defence of your allies, and the securing the liberty and quiet of Europe, Almighty God will protect your Sacred Person in so righteous a cause; and that the unanimity, wealth, and courage of your subjects will carry your Majesty, with honour and success, through all the difficulties of a just war. And in the last place, with great grief, we take leave humbly to represent to those of France are. It is that which made us desire, with so much earnestness, the execution of the treaty, which received the approbation of the Parliament, in the year 1678, betwixt King Charles II., of glorious memory, and this State. We repeat, now, our most earnest instances to have quickly the stipulated succours, and the intire execution of the said treaty. We flatter ourselves, that your Majesty will make a serious reflection on the condition in which we are, particularly after the positive assurances, which you have given us, that the resolutions of your Parliament were to interest themselves vigorously in our preservation, and to assist us in the necessity, in which we are, by furnishing the succours we are agreed about. We will tell you, Sir, in what condition France puts itself; and your Majesty will judge, by that, if our fear, which re-animates our demands, be ill-founded. France, not contented with having taken possession of all the places in the Netherlands, that remained to Spain, has thrown into them, and causes, actually, every day, formidable forces to march thither. They draw a line from the Scheld, near Antwerp, to the Maese. They are going to begin to draw such a line, according to our advices, from Antwerp to Ostend. They send a numerous artillery into the places, that are nearest to our frontiers. They make, with great diligence, many magazines in Flanders, in Brabant, in Guelderland, and at Namur, which they fill up with all sorts of ammunition for war and subsistence, besides the great stores of forage, which they gather from all parts. They build forts under the cannon of our places. Besides they have worked, and work still, continually, to draw the Princes, that are our friends, from our interest, to make them enter into their alliance, or to engage them to a neutrality, at least. In short, by intrigues and divisions in the Empire, they make our friends useless, and increase those of France. Thus we are almost surrounded, on all sides, except on the side of the sea. See here, Sir, without any disguise, the true situation, to which we find ourselves reduced, without adding any thing to what is said. This makes us hope, that, as your Majesty understands our affairs perfectly well, you will agree with us, that at present our condition is worse, than it was during the late war, and worse than if we were actually at war; whilst they make forts under the cannon of our strong places, and lines along our frontiers, without our being able to hinder it, as we might do, if we were at war.
"your

These reasons oblige us to put ourselves in a state of defence, more than if we were actually attacked, by overflowing our country, and even to cut the dikes, to secure our frontiers. We are forced to employ these means, and all those we could bear in an open war; so that our subjects suffer, already, more than they did, during the last war. Hitherto, the winter has served us as a sort of security. That season is over, and we are at the brink of being invaded and overturned every moment, if we do not get prompt succours. We promise ourselves, Sir, that it will come from your side, especially, since it has pleased your Majesty to assure us, that your Parliament had taken resolutions, that were favourable for us. As our necessity is pressing, we pray you to consider well the extremity in which we are, and the impossibility of avoiding our intire ruin, and the overthrow of our Republic, if we are left in this condition. We believe, Sir, that the interests of England are so strictly united with ours, that we would sooner expose ourselves to all hazards, than suffer, that they should be separated, or take any measures, but in concert with your Majesty. It is quite unnecessary to represent to you, that the preservation of your own Kingdoms ought to induce you to prevent our ruin, whilst we believe their loss to be inseparable from ours. The reasons, Sir, are better known to you, than to us, as well as the fatal consequences, to which we are exposed, by leaving us in this condition. This convinces us, that your Majesty will direct every thing by your consummate wisdom, and the good intentions of your Parliament, in such a manner, as to shew to all Europe, that nothing is more advantageous to it, than the alliances with England, and its friendship. As for us, we expect, without delay, the accomplishment of the above-named treaty: And, we pray God, Sir, to preserve the sacred person of your Majesty, in long health, and your Dominions in a flourishing prosperity.

Hague, May
23, 1701.

Your Majesty's very humble Servants,
The States-General of the United Provinces of the Netherlands.

J. Van Wicher.
By their order, F. Fagel.

To this the King returned the following answer :

My Lords,

*The old Ministry impeached.
Burnet.*

The design of impeaching the former Ministry was now beginning to be executed. The handle for bringing it about was given by the Earl of Portland. When he was excusing his own part in the Partition treaty, he said, That, having withdrawn himself from business, and being at his country-house in Holland, the King sent for him, desiring him to enter upon that negotiation. Upon this, he wrote to Secretary Vernon, to ask his advice, and the advice of his other friends, whether it was fit for him to meddle in that matter, since his being by birth a Foreigner seemed a just excuse for not engaging in an affair of such consequence. To this the Secretary answered, that all his friends thought he was a very proper person to be employed in that treaty, since he had known the progress of all those treaties, and the persons who were employed on that occasion ; and he named the Lord Sommers among those who had advised this. The Earl of Portland had mistaken this circumstance, which did not belong to the last Partition treaty, but to that of the year 1699 in favour of the Electoral Prince of Bavaria. The House of Commons hearing of this, required Secretary Vernon to lay before them that letter, with his answer to it ; for the Earl of Portland said, that he had left all papers relating to that matter in Holland. The Secretary said, he had received no such letter in the year 1699 ; but that led them to inquire farther, and they required him to lay before them all the letters he had, relating to both the treaties of Partition. He answered, that those were the King's secrets, writ in confidence by the persons whom he employed. But as in such a case a House of Commons will not be put off, and a denial rather raises in them more earnestness in following their point ; it was replied, that the King had dispensed with the oath of secrecy, when he ordered all matters to be laid before them ; and they would admit of no excuse. The Secretary upon this went to the King, and told him, since these were his secrets, he was ready to expose himself to the indignation of the House, and to refuse to shew his letters. But the King answered, that his refusing to do it would not only raise a storm against himself, from which he could not protect him, but likewise occasion an addrefs to the King, to order him to lay every thing before the House, which, in the state that things were in then, he could not deny. The Secretary, upon these orders given him at two different times, carried all the letters, and laid them before the House of Commons. It appeared by these, that he had communicated the treaty to the King's Ministers, who were in town, about the end of August 1698 : That, Lord Sommers being then at Tunbridge, he went to him ; and that he had communicated the project both to the Earl of Orford and Lord Halifax. Several objections were made by them to many parts of the treaty, which were mentioned in the Secretary's letters ; but, if better terms could not be had, they thought it was more eligible to conclude the treaty, than to leave the Spanish Monarchy to be over-run by France, or to involve Europe in a new war. Lord Sommers had also put the Great Seal to blank powers for concluding this treaty. When all this was read, those, who were set on to blow up the flame, moved the House to impeach some of the Ministers, who had been concerned in this transaction ; yet in this they proceeded with so visible a partiality, that though the Earl of Jersey had signed the treaty, and had been Ambassador in France, and Secretary of State, while the Partition treaty was negotiating ; yet he, having joined himself to the new Ministry, was not questioned about it. The party said, that he had been too easily drawn into it, but that he was not in the secret, and had no share in the councils that projected it.

On the first of April the House of Commons resolved, That William Earl of Portland, by negotiating and concluding the treaty of Partition, land im-(which was destrutive to the trade of this Kingdom, and dangerous to the peace of Europe) is guilty, and shall be impeached, of high crimes and misdemeanors. And they ordered Sir John Levison Gower to go up to the Lords, and at their bar to impeach the Earl, and to acquaint their Lordships, that they will in due time exhibit particular articles against him. They then appointed a Committee to draw up articles of impeachment (1) ; and desired a conference

1701. with the Lords, at which the Commons delivered this paper to the Lords:

"It appearing by your Lordships journal, that your Lordships have received information of some transactions between the Earl of Portland and Mr. Secretary Vernon relating to the Partition of the Spanish Monarchy; the Commons, having the said matter under their consideration, desire your Lordships will be pleased to communicate to the Commons what informations your Lordships have had of any transactions relating to any negotiations or treaties of Partition of the Spanish Monarchy, by letter or otherwise. And the Commons are fully assured, that your Lordships will readily concur in assisting them in this inquiry, which they conceive absolutely necessary for the safety and honour of this Kingdom, and the preservation of the peace of Europe."

Upon this, the Lords ordered to be delivered to the Commons the two Latin Commissions of powers granted to the Earls of Portland and Jersy, for negotiating the treaties; one dated the 1st of July 1699, and the other on the 2d of January 1700, with the paper of the Earl of Portland's relating to his correspondence with Secretary Vernon about the first treaty.

But, though the Earl of Portland was impeached first, the chief design was against the Earl of Orford, and the Lords Sommers and Halifax. Their enemies tried again what use could be made of Captain Kidd's business, who had been taken, and brought over. He was examined by the House of Commons, but either he could not lay a probable story together, or some remnants of honesty, raised in him by the near prospect of death, restrained him. He accused no person of having advised or encouraged his turning pirate. He had never talked alone with any of the Lords, and never at all with Lord Sommers. He said, he had no orders from them, but to pursue his voyage against the Pirates in Madagascar. All endeavours were used to persuade him to accuse the Lords: He was assured, that, if he did it, he should be preferred; and, if he did it not, he should certainly die for his piracy (1); yet this could not prevail on him to charge them; so that he, with some of his crew, were hanged on the 23d of May 1701, there appearing not so much as a colour to fasten any imputation on those Lords. However, their enemies tried what use could be made of the grant of all that Captain Kidd might recover from the Pirates, which some bold and ignorant Lawyers affirmed to be against law. This matter was therefore, for the fourth time, debated in the House of Commons; and the behaviour of those Peers in it appeared so innocent, so legal, and, in truth, so meritorious, that it was again let fall. The insisting so much on it served to convince all people, that the enemies of these Lords wanted not inclinations, but only matter to charge them, since they made so much use of this. But so partial was a great part of the House, that the dropping this was carried only by a small majority. When one design failed, another was set up.

It was pretended, that by Vernon's letters it was clearly proved, that the Lord Sommers had consented to the Partition treaty; so, a debate coming on in the House of Commons concerning that, Lord Sommers desired he might be admitted to give an account of his share in it.

(1) The author of the Full account of the proceedings, in relation to Captain Kidd, published in 1701, and reprinted in the third volume of the State Trials, during the reign of King William, has the following passage in his second letter: "Kidd was a fellow, whose actions did not only shew, that death must needs be terrible to him, but that he was not like to stick at any thing, upon the account of conscience, to avoid it; and therefore, probably, would set himself to work, as soon as he saw his certain danger. This is not a mere conjecture, but it is proved by Sir Edward Seymour's so greedily laying hold of that information, which he made to the House, on Monday, March 31. viz. That he had a letter from Kidd, wherein he desired to be brought up, having something to say to the House. His manner of opening it, and the warmth with which it was seconded by a well-spoken Gentleman, whose tongue, the Earl of Bellmont says, in one of his letters, is as foul and corrupt as his breath, raised every one's expectations; and, you may be sure, Kidd was sent for immediately. But, being come, and heard, the poor creature had nothing to say, which, in any sort, answered the expectations of those, who gave the information, or were so forward to send for him, and thereupon he was remanded. Sir Edward Seymour had such indignation at his disappointment, that he declared, The fellow was a fool, as well as a rogue; and that he would never credit what he should say hereafter. To speak the truth, it was no fault of that Gentleman's, that Kidd said no more to the purpose. He watched his bringing up, and presently got to him, alone, in the room where he was kept. Their conversation, through God's mercy, was quickly interrupted. Two worthy Merchants, who heard that Sir Edward Seymour

"was alone with Kidd, had so much sense of his behaviour throughout that whole matter, and so just an abhorrence of such a practice, that they rushed immediately into the room, and put an end to the privacy. But, if there be a curiosity of knowing what passed in that little time it lasted, the Mistress of the Tavern at Charing-Cross, where Kidd stayed a little while, and he was carried back to Newgate that morning, and the Keeper, who took care of him, and drank with him, are both alive, and can tell what Kidd naturally related of that short conference, soon after it was over. I think I ought to tell you, how Sir Edward Seymour came to make this mistake in procuring Kidd to be sent for thus fruitlessly, that you may the better see his zeal to make somewhat more than he could find. For though he told the House he had a letter from Kidd, that was but a mending the story, to give the more expectation of what was to come; and therefore you will observe care was taken to omit any mention of a letter in the printed votes." The fact was thus: "When Kidd was brought up the first time, he became indebted to one Kisfale a coffee-man, near the House of Commons, in seven or eight shillings. The coffee-man and his son went to him to Newgate, on the Sunday, to demand the debt; and, drinking together, Kisfale said to Kidd, 'You are a fool to be hanged for any body, and you may certainly save your life, if you can say any thing against the Lord Orford, and the Lord Sommers.' Kidd replied, 'I will hang for no body, and I am resolved to speak all I know.' Kisfale and his son went immediately with this story to Sir Edward Seymour, and upon that he founded the information he gave the House, which he called the receiving a letter; whether the coffee-man acted by order in talking

Some opposition was made to this, but, as it had been always granted, it could not be denied him. He had obtained the King's leave to tell every thing: So that, when he appeared before the House, he told them, the King had writ to him, that the state of the King of Spain's health was desperate; and that he saw no way to prevent a new war, but to accept of the proposition, which the French made for a Partition. That the King sent him the scheme of this, and ordered him to communicate it to some others, and to give him both his own opinion and theirs concerning it, and to send him over powers for a treaty, but in the most secret manner possible. Yet his Majesty added, that, if he and his other Ministers thought that a treaty ought not to be made upon such a project, then the whole matter must be let fall, for he could not bring the French to better terms. Lord Sommers upon this said, that he thought it was the taking too much upon himself, if he should have put a stop to a treaty of such consequence. If the King of Spain had died before it was finished, and the blame had been cast on him for not sending the necessary powers, because he was not ordered to do it by a warrant in full form, he could not have justified that, since the King's letter was really a warrant, and therefore he thought he was bound to send the powers that were called for, which he had done. But at the same time he wrote his own opinion very fully to his Majesty, objecting to many particulars, if there was room for it, and proposing several things, which, as he thought, were for the good and interest of England. That, soon after the powers were sent over by him, the treaty was concluded, to which he put the Great Seal, as he thought he was bound to do; and that in this, as he was a Privy Counsellor, he had offered the King his best advice, and, as he was a Chancellor, he had executed his office according to his duty. That as for putting the Seal to the powers, he had done it upon the King's letter, which was a real warrant, though not a formal one; that he had indeed desired, that a warrant in due form might be sent him for his own security; but he did not think it became him to endanger the public, only for want of a point of form, in so critical a time, wherein great dispatch was requisite. Having finished what he had to say, the Speaker asked him the question, which had been resolved before his admission, "Who had informed him, that there was a debate in the House about him?" To which he answered, "That he was strangely surprized at a question, that he never knew was put to any man, that came to desire the favour of being heard; and that, if that question was asked to bring the least prejudice to any man in England, he would not only be content to lie under the censure of the House, but suffer the worst thing that might befall him upon earth, rather than do such a dishonest thing." He then withdrew, but came back immediately, and desired to leave with the House the King's letter to him, and the copy of his answer; which, he acquainted the House, he had leave to lay before them. His defence of himself was so full and clear, that it was believed, if, upon his withdrawing, the question had been quickly put, the whole matter had been soon at an end, and the prosecution let fall. But his enemies drew out the debate to such a length, that the impression which his speech had made was much worn out; and, the House sitting till it was past midnight, they at last carried this resolution by a majority of seven or eight, "That John Lord Sommers, by advising his Majesty, in the year 1698, to the Pr. H. C. treaty for Partition of the Spanish Monarchy, III. 134. whereby several territories of the King of Spain's Dominions were to be delivered up to France, is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor." And the House ordered Mr. Simon Harcourt to go up to the Lords, and impeach him. Immediately after they resolved, "That Edward Earl of Orford, and Charles Lord Halifax, be, for the same reasons, impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors." Accordingly, the general impeachment was brought

And the Lords Orford and Halifax. Apr. 15.

"so to Kidd, or whether he only guessed where he should be welcome with a bad story, I know not. Sir Edward Seymour little knew himself, when he said he would never credit Kidd again. He was so unwilling to let this matter end without more prejudice and reflection, on those whose ruin he wished, that, ten days after, he and his good-natured friend were engaged in bringing another yet more impertinent story before the House. He informed them that Kidd, since his being in Neugate, had been in some other place besides the House of Commons; this occasioned a new examination of all the Keepers of Neugate. But there also followed a disappointment, it proving to be as ridiculous as well as a false tale, and ended only in the confusion of those whose malice and desire to oppress innocence could never end. The story is as follows: One Symonds, who had been formerly an officer in the marine regiments, and lives now as he can, told Sir Edward Seymour and Mr. John Howe, that one Stockdale told him, that the first time Kidd was brought up to the House, as he was going back to Neugate, he was carried to the Lord Halifax's House in Westminster. Stockdale said, he saw him there, together with that Lord and the Lord Sommers; incredible stupidity and effrontery! My author proceeds, if you would know the quality of this Stock-

"dale, he is a poor fellow that waits at an Alehouse at Charing-Cross, to be sent on errands, but was brother to a maid-servant in my Lord Halifax's family; by pretence of which, he used very often to get victuals there, and so knew the way into the House. Upon the examination of these two fellows, procured by Seymour and Howe, it appeared it was not possible the tale should be true, because all that day hundreds of people followed Kidd wherever he went, so that this interview must have been a very public one. If the Gentlemen, who thought fit to give this notable information to the House of Commons, had not been blinded with malice, they must have seen the folly of it. Was it probable that one of those Lords, who was wholly unconcerned in the business of Kidd, should so unnecessarily desire his company at his house on so remarkable a day? Or was it possible to believe, that the other of these Lords, who certainly thought himself not a little fortunate, that Kidd upon all his examinations had declared he had never seen him, would begin an acquaintance with him at that time? I have told you that this third inquiry vanished into smoke; and I cannot forbear observing to you, that it ended without any censure or indignation expressed against those who continued to act a part so shamelessly malicious."

The Commons were very sensible, that those impeachments must come to nothing, and that they had not a majority in the House of Lords to judge in them as they should direct. They resolved therefore on a shorter way, to fix a severe censure on the Lords, whom they had thus impeached. They voted an address to the King, for removing them from his Council and Presence for ever; which was presented by the House, on the 23d of April, in these terms:

Most gracious Sovereign,

Pr. H. C. III. 137. "WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, do humbly crave leave to represent to your Majesty the great satisfaction we have from our late inquiry concerning the treaty of Partition, made in the year 1698, (on which the treaty of 1699 was founded) to see your Majesty's great care of your people and this nation, in not entering into that negotiation without the advice of your English Counsellors: And finding, that John Lord Sommers, on whose judgment your Majesty did chiefly rely in that so important affair, did, in concert with Edward Earl of Orford, and Charles Lord Halifax, advise your Majesty to enter into that treaty, of so dangerous consequence to the trade and welfare of this nation; and who, to avoid the censure, which might justly be apprehended to fall on those who advised the same, endeavoured to insinuate that your Majesty, without the advice of your Council, entered into that treaty, and under your Sacred Name to seek protection for what themselves had so advised; of which treatment of your Majesty, we cannot but have a just resentment. And, that they may be no longer able to deceive your Majesty, and abuse your People, we do humbly beseech your Majesty, that you will be pleased to remove John Lord Sommers, Edward Earl of Orford, and Charles Lord Halifax, from your Council and Presence for ever; as also William Earl of Portland, who transacted these treaties, so unjust in their own nature, and so fatal in their consequences to this nation and the peace of Europe. And we humbly crave leave, upon this occasion, to repeat our assurances to your Majesty, that we will always stand by and support your Majesty, to the utmost of our power, against all your enemies both at home and abroad."

To this address the King returned this answer:

"I am willing to take all occasions of thanking you very heartily for the assurances you have frequently given me, and now repeat, of standing by and supporting me against all our enemies both at home and abroad; towards which nothing, in my opinion, can contribute so much, as a good correspondence between me and my people. And therefore you may depend upon it, that I will employ none in my service, but such as shall be thought most likely to improve that mutual trust and confidence between us, which is so necessary in this conjuncture, both for our own security, and the defence and the preservation of our Allies."

Such an address had never gone along with an impeachment before. The House of Commons had indeed begun such a practice in King Charles the Second's time. When they disliked a Minister, but had not matter to ground an impeachment on, they had taken this method of making an address against him; but it was a new attempt to come with an address after an impeachment. This was punishing before trial, contrary to an indispensable rule of justice, of not judging before the parties were heard. The House of Lords saw, that this made their judicature ridiculous, when, in the first instance of an accusation, application was made to the King for a censure, and a very severe one, since few misdemeanors could deserve a harder sentence. Upon these grounds the Lords prevented the Commons, and sent some of their body to the King with this counter-address:

"WE your Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, beg leave to represent to your Majesty, that the House of Commons have severally impeached, at the bar of our House, William Earl of Portland, John Lord Sommers, Edward Earl of Orford, and Charles Lord Halifax, of high crimes and misdemeanors. — We do most humbly beseech your Majesty, that your Majesty will be pleased not to pass any censure upon them, until they are tried upon the impeachments, and judgment be given according to the usage of Parliament, and the laws of the land."

The King made no other answer to this address, than by letting the names of the impeached Lords continue still in the Council-books, contrary to the address of the Commons. As this seemed to be a refusing to grant what they had desired, though it was but a piece of common justice, it was complained of, and it was said, that these Lords had still great credit with the King. The Commons had, for form sake, ordered a Committee to prepare articles of impeachment, but they intended to let the matter lie dormant, thinking that what they had done already, had so marked those Lords, that the King could not employ them any more; for that was the chief thing they aimed at.

Accordingly, the impeachments lay long neglected in the House of Commons, and probably would have been dropped, if the Lords concerned had not moved for a trial. On their motion, on the 5th of May, a month and five days after the impeachment of the Earl of Portland, and twenty-one days after that of the other three Lords, the House of Lords, to quicken the proceedings of the Commons, sent them a message to put them in mind, that, as yet no particular articles had been exhibited against the impeached Lords; which, after impeachments had been so long depending, was due in justice to the persons concerned, and agreeable to the methods of Parliament in such cases. Upon this articles were framed against the Earl of Orford, and, on the 9th of May, were sent up to the Lords by Colonel Bierly, who, by order of the Commons, demanded that the Earl should give security to abide the judgment of the House against the Earl of Orford.

In the articles, the Earl was charged for taking great grants from the King; Kidd's business was objected to him; he was also charged for abuses in managing the fleet, and victualling it, when it lay on the coast of Spain, and for some orders he had given, during his Command; and in conclusion, for his advising the Partition treaty. And, in setting this out, the Commons urged, that the King, by the alliance made with the Emperor in the year 1689, was bound to maintain his Succession to the Crown of Spain, which they said was still in force; so the Partition treaty was a breach of faith, contrary to that alliance; and this past current in the House of Commons, without any debate or enquiry into it; for every thing was acceptable there, that loaded that treaty, and these Lords: But they did not consider, that by this they declared, they thought the King was bound to maintain the Emperor's right to that Succession; yet this was not intended by those, who managed the party, who had not hitherto given any countenance to the Emperor's pretensions: So apt are parties to make use of any thing, that may serve a turn, without considering the consequences of it.

The Earl of Orford put in his answer in four days; he said he had no grant of the King, but a reversion at a great distance, and a gift of ten thousand pounds, after he had defeated the French at la Hogue, which he thought he might lawfully accept of, as all others before him had done: He opened Kidd's matter, in which he had acted legally, with good intentions to the public, and to his own loss: His accounts, while he commanded the fleet, had been all examined and were past; but he was ready to wave that, and to justify himself in every particular, and he denied his having given any advice about the Partition treaty; this was immediately sent down to the Commons; but they let it lie before them, without coming to a replication, which is only a piece of form, by which they undertake to make good their charge (1).

(1) If the reader desires a larger account of the articles and answer, it is as follows:

I. That in a long and expensive war the Earl had procured from his Majesty grants of several manors, messuages, &c. as also exorbitant sums of money:

To which the Earl answered, "That, he having for several years rendered to the King his utmost service and duty, as a good and loyal subject, his Majesty was graciously pleased, upon several occasions, to take notice of the same, and out of his wonted bounty was pleased to give him two grants, one a reversionary grant for years of some Houses; the other a grant of the remainder of a gross sum amounting to about 2000 l. a year for five years."

II. That, in breach of the trust reposed in him, whilst he was Commander in chief of the navy in or near the Streights of Gibraltar, he did receive great sums of the public money, which he converted to his own private use, and unlawfully procured a Privy-Seal to discharge him from accounting to the public for the same. To which he answered, by denying the facts, and saying, "That he did make up, and upon oath pass his accounts for the monies imprest to him, and hath his Quietus est in due course of law upon the same."

III. That he received from the King of Spain and others considerable sums of money, and great quantities of wine, oil, and other provisions for the fleet, for which he ought to have accounted; but that he converted the same to his own use; and, for securing himself from rendering any account, he possessed divers great offices, inconsistent, and designed as checks one upon the other. To which the Earl answered, "That whatever he received from the King of Spain, or any others, for the fleet, was duly delivered and distributed amongst the officers and seamen; and he denied, that he enjoyed any offices inconsistent, or which ought to be checks one upon the other."

IV. That he hath clandestinely, contrary to the law of nations, sold several vessels taken under pretence of prize, without condemnation, and converted the money to his own use. To which he answered by denying the fact, and saying, "That he did from time to time give orders, that the prizes taken should be carefully preserved without imbezement, and duly proceeded against, and the product answered as the law directs."

V. That he, presiding in the commission for execution. Numb. XXX. Vol. III.

ing the office of Lord High Admiral of England, had discouraged and rejected the request and proposal of the East-India Company for suppressing piracies in the South-Seas; and had procured a Commission for one William Kidd, who had committed divers piracies and depredations on the high seas, being thereto encouraged through the hopes of being protected by the high station and interest of the said Earl. To which he answered, "That he did never discourage or reject the Company's request, unless it were by telling them, that the Admiralty by law could not grant the same: And as to the matter of Kidd, his Commission was according to law, and his expedition intended for the public good and service; and, if he had committed any piracies, he is answerable for the same, he never being ordered or encouraged by the said Earl so to do."

VI. That, while the Kingdom was under an apprehension of an immediate invasion from France, he, preferring his hopes of gain to himself, to the safety of the public, did order Captain Steward, Commander of the Duchess, to put on board Captain Kidd a great number of able seamen, to the prejudice of the public security, and to the endangering the Duchess, if she had been attacked by the enemy, to which he answered, "That the men taken from on board the Duchess were but some of the very persons, that were just before taken from on board of Captain Kidd, and returned by their own consent again, not being above twenty in number, and that when all fears of an invasion were over."

VII. That, during the war, he did by misrepresentations procure an order for his Majesty's ship the Dolphin, to be employed in a private voyage for the advantage of himself and others concerned with him. To which he answered, "That what was done therein, was done after the peace concluded, and by his Majesty's command, at the instance and request of other persons, contrary to his opinion."

VIII. That, during the time of his commanding the navy, he did, through neglect, and in contempt of orders, unnecessarily hazard and expose the fleet, and lose the opportunities of taking or destroying the French ships, and suffer them to return safe into their own harbours. To which he answered, "That he is not guilty of any neglect or omission of his duty herein, nor did expect in this particular to be charged therewith, considering his faithful services rendered against the French fleet."

On the 19th of May, after another quickening message from the Lords, articles of impeachment were next sent up to the Peers against the Lord Sommers, by Mr Harcourt, and the demand for giving security to abide by their Lordships judgment was repeated.

In these articles the two Partition treaties were copiously set forth, and it was laid down for a foundation, that the King was bound to maintain the Emperor's right of Succession to the Crown of Spain; Lord Sommers was charged, for setting the Seals, first to the powers, and then to the treaties themselves; he was also charged, for accepting some grants, and the manner of taking them was represented as fraudulent, he seeming to buy them of the King, and then getting himself discharged of the price contracted for; Kidd's business was also mentioned, and dilatory and partial proceedings in Chancery were objected to him. He put in his answer in a very few days: In the Partition treaty, he said, he had offered the King very faithful advice, as a Counsellor, and had acted according to the duty of his post, as Chancellor; so he had nothing more to answer for: As for his grants, the King designed him a grant to such a value; the King was not deceived in the value; the manner of passing it, was according to the usual methods of the Treasury, in order to make a grant sure, and out of the danger of being avoided. Kidd's business was opened, as was formerly set forth; and as to the Court of Chancery, he had applied himself wholly to the dispatch of business in it, with little regard to his own health or quiet, and had acted according to the best of his judgment, without fear or favour (1).

A copy of the Lord Sommers's answer was, with great dispatch, sent down to the Commons, and upon that they were at a full stand. At the motion of the Earl of Orford, the Lords, four days before, had also acquainted them, that the House had been desired by the Earl, that a day might be appointed for his speedy trial; but, finding no issue joined by replication of the House of Commons, they thought fit to give them notice of it. The same day they likewise put the Commons in mind of the articles against the Earl of Portland and Lord Halifax, and that the delay was not only a hardship to the persons concerned, but very unusual. Notwithstanding these messages, the replication to the Earl of Orford's answer, though framed and ingrossed, was never sent up to the Lords; and no articles were drawn against the Earl of Portland, which was represented as an expression of their respect to him. Nor was it till the 14th of June, that the articles against Lord Halifax were sent up to the Lords by Mr Bruges, which shall be mentioned here, to

IX. That he did, in concert with other false and evil Counsellors, advise the King in the year 1698, to enter into one treaty for dividing the Monarchy and Dominions of Spain; in pursuance whereof, in 1699, another treaty was entered into for the like purpose: Both which treaties were prejudicial to the interest of the Protestant Religion all over Europe, ruinous to the trade of England, and dishonourable to the King and the Nation. To which he answered, "That he does deny, that he did advise his Majesty to enter into the treaty of Partition; and, so far as he was any ways acquainted therewith, he objected to and gave his opinion against the same." Pr. H. C. III. 147.

(1) The following extract gives a larger account of this affair:

I. That John Lord Sommers, well knowing the most apparent ill consequences, as well as the injustice of the Partition of the Spanish Monarchy, did advise his Majesty to enter into a treaty for it, and did so far encourage and promote the same, that the said treaty was concluded and ratified in 1698, under the Great Seal of England, then in custody of the said Lord Sommers. To which his Lordship answered, by a full and plain account of all the steps of that treaty, referring himself to the letters on that subject between the King and him, "wherein, as he conceived, he had fully and faithfully discharged his trust, and the duty incumbent on him."

II. That, for the more effectual carrying on the said treaty, Commissions were prepared, amended, enlarged, or altered, by the Lord Sommers, without any lawful warrant for his so doing; whereunto, without communicating the same to the rest of the then Lords Justices of England, or advising with the Privy Council, he did presume to affix the Great Seal of England, with a blank for Commissioners names, to be afterwards inserted.

III. That, having affixed the Great Seal without lawful warrant, in hopes of concealing that evil and most dangerous practice, after he had settled the said Commissions, he used his endeavour to procure a warrant to be transmitted to him for affixing the Great

Seal, that it might not be known, but that he had it in due time. To which second and third articles he answered, "That having received his Majesty's express commands to send his Majesty full powers under the Great Seal, for negotiating the said treaty, with blanks for his Majesty's Commissioners names, he thought it sufficient warrant for him so to do. And that he did afterwards desire his Majesty, that a particular warrant for signing the said Commission might be signed and returned; not that he doubted his Majesty's said letter to be a sufficient warrant, but for that such warrant would be more proper to be produced, if occasion should require."

IV. That, contrary to his duty, he affixed the Great Seal of England to the ratification of the said treaty in 1698, not having communicated the same to the rest of the three Lords Justices, or advised with the Privy Council, leaving one intire blank sheet, and many other blanks in the said ratification, with an intent to be afterwards filled up by other persons beyond the seas. To which he answered, "That, Mr Secretary Vernon having prepared, by his Majesty's commands, the instruments for ratification, with blanks therein, he did affix the Great Seal, which he conceives and is advised he might lawfully do, not communicating the same, because he had his Majesty's command, that the said treaty should be kept secret."

V. That, in the year 1699, another treaty of Partition was concluded and ratified under the Great Seal, then in the custody of the said Lord Sommers, evidently destructive to the trade of this realm, dishonourable to his Majesty, highly injurious to the interest of the Protestant Religion, and manifestly tending to disturb the general peace of Europe, by altering the balance of power therein, and strengthening France against the good Friends and Allies of our Sovereign Lord the King. To which he answered, "That he had not any knowledge of the said treaty, or any transaction in order thereunto, save only that a draught of the said treaty was read over in the presence of divers Lords of the Privy Council (whereof he was one) to which draught he, as well as others then present, did make several objections; but they were afterwards informed by his Majesty's Plenipo-

1701. end this matter at once. The Commons charged him for a grant that he had in Ireland, and that he had not paid in the produce of it, as the act concerning those grants had enacted: They charged him for another grant, out of the forest of Dean, to the waste of the timber, and prejudice of the navy of England: They charged him, for holding places that were incompatible, being at the same time both a Commissioner of the Treasury, and Auditor of the Exchequer; and, in conclusion, he was charged for advising the two Partition treaties. He was as quick with his answer as the other Lords had been: He said, his grant in Ireland was of some debts and sums of money, and so was not thought to be within the act, concerning confiscated estates; all he had ever received of it was four hundred pounds; if he was bound to repay it, he was liable to an action for it; but every man was not to be impeached, who did not pay his debts, at the day of payment. His grant in the forest of Dean was only of the weedings; so it could be no waste of timber, nor a prejudice to the navy; the Auditor's place was held by another, till he obtained the King's leave to withdraw from the Treasury; as for the first Partition treaty, he never once saw it, nor was he ever advised with in it; as for the second, he gave his advice very freely about it, at the single time, in which he had ever heard

"tentatives for transacting the said treaty, who were then also present, that the said treaty was so far perfected, that nothing could then be altered therein; and, his Majesty afterwards, by his warrant, requiring the ratifying of the said treaty under the Great Seal, he did affix the Great Seal to such ratification, being, as he conceives, obliged so to do."

VI. That whereas, by the laws and usages of this realm, all Commissions under the Great Seal, for the making any treaty or alliance, ought to be enrolled and entered on record in the Court of Chancery, he, the said Lord Sommers, not minding the duty of his office, did not in any manner enroll or enter on record any of the said Commissions or Ratifications. To which he answered, "That he conceives it was not incumbent upon him as Lord Chancellor, to see the Commissions or Ratifications enrolled, the same being prepared and brought to the Great Seal, by the Secretaries of State, ready ingrossed, and, when sealed, taken away by them, and the original treaties remaining in their custody: But the care of enrolling the same, if necessary, doth (as he conceives) belong to the Prothonotary of the Court of Chancery."

VII. That the said Lord Sommers, contrary to his oath as Lord Chancellor of England, did pass many great, unreasonable, and exorbitant grants, under the Great Seal, of divers manors, lordships, and lands, &c. belonging to the Crown of England; and did advise, promote, and procure divers like grants of the late forfeited estates in Ireland, in contempt of the advice of the Commons of England. To which he answered, "That he doth acknowledge he did pass several grants to divers persons of several lands, tenements, and hereditaments belonging to his Majesty in right of his Crown of England; but that, before any of them came to the Great Seal, the same were regularly passed through the proper offices, and brought with sufficient warrants for the Great Seal; and he believes, more considerable grants have passed in the like number of years in most of his predecessors times; and conceives, and is advised, that, being required by his Majesty, by warrant, to pass the same, he ought so to do; and denies, that he did ever advise, promote, or procure any grant to be made to any person whatsoever, of any forfeited estate in Ireland, or did procure any act or bill prepared for confirming any such grant in the Parliament of Ireland, to be approved in the Privy Council in England; and faith, that what bills of this nature were remitted under the Great Seal of England, to be passed into laws in Ireland, the same were first approved and passed in the Privy Council in England, according to the usual form in such cases; and, being so approved, were, by order of Council, sent to the said Lord Sommers, who was by the said order required to affix the Great Seal thereto."

VIII. That he did not only receive and enjoy the fees, profits, and perquisites belonging to the Great Seal, but had received an annual pension from the Crown of 4000*l.* and had further begged and procured for his own benefit many great, unreasonable, and exorbitant grants of revenues belonging to the Crown of England. To which he answered, "That the annual pension or allowance of 4000*l.* had been allowed to several of his predecessors; but he denied, that he did ever beg or use any means to procure any grant whatsoever for his own benefit; but that what his Majesty was pleased to give him, proceeded from his Majesty's own motion, and of his mere bounty, and as his Majesty was pleased to declare upon that occasion, as an evidence of the gracious acceptance of the said Lord Sommers's zealous endeavours for his service."

IX. That, in order to procure a grant of fee-farm rents, he did enter into several treaties, and had many communications with the Auditor of the rates, and with the Clerk of the Trustees for sale of the said rents, and contracted and agreed with them, as a reward for their discovery, one full fourth part of all such rents so discovered.

X. That, notwithstanding the said pretended contracts, there was not any sum of money really paid, but the contracts and payments were colourably and fraudulently contrived in deceit of his Majesty, and elusion of the acts of Parliament. To which ninth and tenth articles he answered, "That after his Majesty had given directions to the Lords of the Treasury for granting fee-farm rents to the benefit of him and his heirs; his Majesty's intended bounty would have been lost, without information could be gained of such particular rents; and therefore application was made to the said Auditor and Clerk, as the most likely to give information therein; but they refused to give any account of such rents, unless they might have near a fourth part for so doing; which the said Lords Sommers did, as he conceives he lawfully might, comply with. And there was not any sum of money paid, as the consideration of the grants of the said rents, but the contracts were made, and the payment discharged, without any deceit of his Majesty, or elusion of the acts of Parliament."

XI. That many rents standing in charge for payment of pensions, stipends, salaries, annuities, alms, and allowances for schools, churches, bridges, &c. and many quit-rents of manors omitted and annexed to the castle of Windsor for support of the same, and maintenance of the officers, servants, and attendants in the said castle, were conveyed by the said Lord Sommers, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said acts of Parliament, to the great vexation and oppression of many of his Majesty's good subjects, and creating many new and unreasonable charges on the other revenues of the Crown. To which he answered, "That some things might be inferred by mistaken informations, and not out of any designs; but he denied, that as to his knowledge, or belief, any of the said rents were ever united or annexed to the castle of Windsor, for any purpose whatsoever; or that any oppression or vexation hath happened; and little or no new charge to the Crown."

XII. That by the direction of the said Lord Sommers the persons, in whose names the purchases were made,

did

1701. heard any thing concerning it; this was sent down to the Commons, but was never so much as once read by them (1).

Pr. H. C. As it would be too tedious to relate the meffages from the Lords to the Commons, preffing the trials of the impeached Lords, and the answers of the Commons evading it on account of formalities, the substance of the whole, from Bishop Burnet and others, is inserted as follows.

Message between the two Houses.

The Lords had resolved to begin with the trial of the Earl of Orford; because the articles against him were the first that were brought up; and, since the Commons made no replication, the Lords, according to clear precedents, named a day for his trial, and gave notice of it to the House of Commons: Upon this, the Commons moved the Lords, to agree to name a Committee of both Houses for settling the preliminaries of the trial, and they named two preliminaries; one was, that the Lord, who was to be tried, should not sit as a Peer; the other was, that those Lords, who were impeached for the same matter, might not vote in the trial of one another: They also acquainted the Lords, that the course of their evidence led them to begin with the Lord Sommers. The Lords judged their last demand reasonable, and agreed to it; but disagreed to the other. They considered themselves as a Court of Justice, and, how great soever the regard due to the House of Commons might be, in all other respects, yet in matters of justice, where they were the Accusers, they could only be considered as Parties. The King, when he had a suit with a subject, submitted to the equality of justice; so the Commons ought to pretend to no advantage over a single person, in a trial; a Court of Justice ought to hear the demands of both parties pleaded fairly, and then to judge impartially; a Committee named by one of the parties, to sit in an equality with the Judges, and to settle matters relating to the trial, was a thing practised in no Court or Nation, and seemed contrary to the principles of law, or rules of justice: By these means, they could at least delay trials, as long as they pleased, and all delays of justice are real and great injustices. This had never been demanded but once, in the case of the Popish Plot; then it was often refused; it is true, it was at last yielded to by the Lords, though with great opposition; that was a case of treason, in which the King's life and the safety of the nation was concerned; there was then a great jealousy of the Court, and of the Lords that belonged to it; and the nation was in so great a ferment, that the Lords might at that time yield to such a motion, though it derogated from their Judicature: That ought not to be set up for a precedent for a quiet time, and in a case pretended to be no more than a misdemeanor; so the Lords resolved not did surrender several of the said rents to them granted, amounting to the yearly value of 347*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.* on suggestion of wrong conveyance, and procured other rents of the yearly value of 391*l.* 0*s.* 3½ to be allowed by way of reprice, as if the said rents so surrendered had been really and bona fide purchased. To which he answered, "That the Trustees for sale of the farm-rents, by warrant of the Commissioners of the Treasury, did grant divers other rents, amounting to 391*l.* 0*s.* 3½ in lieu and reprice of the 347*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.* having appeared to be granted before, or not grantable by the said Trustees, or not leviable on surrenders of such rents, which he conceives might be, and was lawfully done."

XIII. That in the year 1695 the said Lord Sommers, being then Lord Keeper, procured a Commission to be granted to one William Kidd, a person of evil fame and reputation, and since that time convicted of piracy; and in a grant from his Majesty of ships, vessels, and goods, to be taken by the said William Kidd, unto Richard Earl of Bellamont, Edmund Harrison, Merchant, Samuel Newton, Gent. and others, the name of the said Samuel Newton was used in trust, and for the only benefit and advantage of the said Lord Sommers. To which he answered, "That the said William Kidd, had from his Majesty a Commission for preventing the piracy of others, and to apprehend certain pirates, and bring them to a legal trial; the granting of which Commission was then apprehended to be necessary for the preservation of trade and navigation. He does admit, that there was a grant to the Earl of Bellamont, Edmund Harrison, Samuel Newton, and others, and that Samuel Newton was named by, and in trust for, the said Lord Sommers, of ships and goods taken by the said William Kidd, with account to be duly made to the use of his Majesty of a clear tenth part, whereby the public might have received benefit, had the said Kidd faithfully discharged the trust; which he failing to do, the owners of the said ship have lost all their expences, and had not received any benefit of his Majesty's said grant."

XIV. That the said Lord Sommers, to the great oppression of the subject, and contrary to Magna Charta, and divers good statutes of this Realm, and in manifest breach and violation of his oath, as Lord

High Chancellor of England, hath, in several causes depending before him, by many extraordinary methods and unwarrantable practices for several years, delayed proceedings in the said causes; and by colour of his office hath made divers arbitrary and illegal orders, in subversion of the laws and statutes of this realm, and hath, of his own authority, reversed judgments given in the Court of Exchequer, and without calling before him the Barons of the Exchequer, to hear their informations, and the causes of their judgments, as the statute in those cases expressly directs; assuming thereby to himself an arbitrary and illegal power; and hath declared and affirmed in public places of Judicature, that particular subjects might have rights and interests, without any remedy for recovery of the same, unless by petition to the person of the King only, or to that effect: Which position was highly dangerous to the legal Constitution of this Kingdom, and absolutely destructive to the property of the subject. To which he answered, "That he did not delay any proceedings in any cause or causes depending before him, as Chancellor of England, longer or otherwise than as the circumstances and justice of each cause required, but did, to the very manifest impairing of his health, constantly apply himself to the dispatch of the causes depending before him; and he denied, that he ever did make, by colour of his office, any arbitrary or illegal order, to the subversion of any law or statute of this realm, or did ever assume to himself any judgment given in the Court of Exchequer, otherwise than as is warranted and allowed by the law, and in the presence of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, who were always present in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, when their judgments were examined, as the statute in such case directs; nor did ever deliver in any Court of Judicature, or other place whatsoever, any position whatsoever dangerous to the legal Constitution of the Kingdom, or destructive to the property of the subject."

Pr. H. C. III. 150.

(1) The articles against the Lord Halifax, and his answers more at large, were as follow:

I. That whereas it was the continued sense of the Commons of England, that it was highly reasonable, that the forfeited estates of rebels and traitors in Ire-

1701. to admit of this, but to hear whatsoever should be proposed by the Commons, and to give them all just and reasonable satisfaction in it. The chief point in question, in the year 1679, was, how far the Bishops might sit and vote in trials of treason; but, without all dispute, they were to vote in trials for misdemeanours; it was also settled in the case of the Lord Mordaunt, that a Lord tried for a misdemeanor was to sit within the bar; in all other Courts, men tried for such offences came within the bar; this was stronger in the case of a Peer, who by his patent had a seat in that House, from which nothing but a judgment of the House, for some offence, could remove him: They indeed found that, in King James the First's time, the Earl of Middlesex, being accused of misdemeanours, was brought to the bar; but, as that prosecution was violent, so there had been no later precedent of that kind, to govern proceedings by it: There had been many since that time, and it had been settled, as a rule for future times, that Peers tried for such offences were to sit within the bar. The other preliminary was, that Peers, accused for the same offence, might not vote in the trials of the others: The Lords found that a right of voting was so inherent in every Peer in all causes, except where himself was a Party, that could not be taken from him, but by a sentence of the House; a vote of the House could not deprive him of it; otherwise, a majority might upon any pretence deny some Peers their right of voting, and the Commons, by impeaching many Peers at once, for the same offence, might exclude as many Lords as they pleased from judging: It was also observed, that a man might be a Judge in any cause, in which he might be a Witness; and it was a common practice to bring persons, charged with the same offence, if they were not in the same indictment, to witness the facts, with which they themselves were charged, in another indictment: And a parity of reason appeared in the case of Lords, who were charged in different impeachments, for the same facts, that they might be Judges in one another's trials. In conclusion therefore the Lords, on the 12th of June, came to the following resolutions, which were sent down to the Commons.

1. That no Lord of Parliament impeached for high crimes and misdemeanours, and coming to his trial, shall, upon his tryal, be without the bar. Resolutions of the Lords.

2. That no Lord of Parliament, impeached of high crimes and misdemeanours, can be precluded from voting on any occasion, except in his own trial.

Upon these points many messages passed between the two Houses with so much precipitation, that it was not easy to distinguish between the answers and replies. The Commons still kept off the trials by affected delays; and it was visible, that, when the trials should come on, they had nothing to charge these Lords with: So the leaders of the party shewed their skill in finding out excuses to keep up a clamour, and to hinder the matter from being brought to an issue. The main point that was still insisted upon, was, a committee of both Houses to settle preliminaries; so, according to the forms of the House, it was brought to a free conference.

The

land should be applied in case of his Majesty's faithful subjects of the Kingdom of England, the said Lord Hallifax presumed to advise, pass, or direct the passing a grant to Thomas Kaiton, Esq; in trust for himself, of several debts, interests, &c. amounting to 13,000*l.* or thereabouts, accruing to his Majesty, from attainders, outlawries, or other forfeitures, in Ireland. To which he answered, "That he did accept the said grant, as it was lawful for him to do, without breach of his duty, and the trust reposed in him; which grant hath since been taken away by act of Parliament; and he hath not made clear thereof, as yet, above 400*l.*"

II. That he has not repaid into the receipt of his Majesty's Exchequer, in Ireland, the sum of 1000*l.* which he had actually received to his own use, out of the profits of the forementioned grant, which he ought to have so repaid, by virtue of the Act for granting an aid to his Majesty, by sale of the forfeited estates in Ireland. To which he answered, "That he gave direction, after the said act passed, to his Agents in Ireland, to do, in relation to the money received, as should be advised by Counsel there; by whom his Agents were advised, that the said monies, being received out of the mean profits which were remitted by that act, were not within the first mentioned clause in the said act."

III. That, in the time of a tedious and expensive war, he did advise, procure, and assent, not only to the passing of divers grants to others, but did obtain and accept of several beneficial ones for himself; which practices were a most notorious abuse of his Majesty's goodness, &c. To which he answered, "That he served his Majesty faithfully in his stations, and his Majesty graciously accepted of his service; and, as a mark of his Royal favour, did make, for his benefit, such grants, as are mentioned in the precedent and subsequent articles, and none other.

Numb. 30. VOL. III.

"And, as to other persons, he only, in conjunction with the other Commissioners, did sign several warrants and dockets for such grants, as his Majesty was pleased to direct."

IV. Whereas, by Common Law, and other Statutes, the King's forests should be preserved, the said Lord Hallifax, nor regarding the laws and ordinances of this Realm, nor his duty to his Majesty and the public, had procured a grant to Henry Segar, Gent. in trust for himself, of the sum of 14,000*l.* of scrubbed beech, birch, holly, &c. under colour whereof, felling oaks, and many tons of well-grown timber, had been cut and fallen, and sold and disposed of for his benefit. To which he answered; "That his Majesty, out of his grace and favour, did grant, in trust for him, the sum of 2000*l.* per ann. to be raised by the fall of scrub-beech, birch, &c. for the space of seven years; which grant was not pre-judicial to any timber growing in the said forest: And, if any abuse were, in cutting the woods, he conceives he is not answerable for the same, it being done by the direction of his Majesty's Surveyor-General, and other his Majesty's Officers."

V. That he, the said Lord Hallifax, did grant, or procure to be granted, to his brother Christopher Mountague, Esq; the place and office of Auditor of the Receipts, and Writer of the Tallies, in trust for himself; so that he the said Lord was, in effect, at the same time, one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Auditor of the Receipts, and Writer of the Tallies, and enjoyed the profits of the said several offices, which were manifestly inconsistent, and ought to have been a check to each other. To which he answered; "That the grant of the said office was done at his desire and request, because he intended, in a short time after, to leave his own employment and places in the Treasury, and to obtain a surrender from his said Brother of the said office, office,

1701. The day before the free conference, the King, coming to the House of Peers to pass the bill of Succession, took occasion to make the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's speech at passing the act of succession.

"I Return you my hearty thanks for the care you have taken to establish the Succession to the Crown in the Protestant line. And I must not lose this occasion of acquainting you, that I am likewise extremely sensible of your repeated assurances of supporting me in such Alliances, as shall be most proper for the preservation of the liberty of Europe, and for the security of England and Holland. Your ready compliance with my desires, as to the succours for the States-General, is also a great satisfaction to me, as well as a great advantage to the common cause. And as I have nothing so much at heart as the preservation of the liberty of Europe, and the honour and interest of England, so I make no doubt of attaining those great ends by the blessing of God, and the continuance of your chearful concurrence.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The season of the year makes it necessary to have a speedy recess; and the posture of affairs abroad does absolutely require my presence, for the encouragement of our Allies, and for the perfecting of such Alliances, as "may be most effectual for the common interest. 1701.

"And therefore I must recommend a dispatch of the public business, especially of those matters, which are of the greatest importance."

The Commons, interpreting this speech as an approbation of their proceedings in respect to their contents with the Lords, presented an address of thanks for his Majesty's being pleased to approve of their proceedings, and assured him, they would support such Alliances as he should think fit to make, in conjunction with the Emperor and the States-General, for the peace of Europe, and for the reducing the exorbitant power of France. So, without any farther interruption, they returned to their disputes with the Lords.

The free Conference began the 13th of June. Lord Ha-
In it the Lord Haverham, speaking to the verdam point, of Lords being partial in their own cases, reflects on and therefore not proper judges, said, that the the im-House of Commons had plainly shewed their peachment partiality, in impeaching some Lords for facts, in which others were equally concerned with them, who yet were not impeached by them, though they were still in credit, and about the King, which shewed, that they thought that neither the one nor the other were guilty (1). The Commons thought they had now found an occasion of quarrelling with the Lords, which they were looking for; so the Lord Haverham's expressions were instantly objected to by Sir Christopher Musgrave, and the Managers for the Commons immediately withdrew from the Confe-

"office and procure a grant thereof to himself; which has been since done, and, he conceives, was lawful for him to do."

VI. That the said Lord Hallifax, well knowing the most apparent evil consequences, as well as the injustice of the Partition of the Spanish Monarchy, did yet advise his Majesty to enter into a treaty for it, and did encourage and promote the same. To which he answered, "That he never saw the said treaty, nor heard the same read, or does as yet know the articles or agreement it contains; and denies, that he ever advised his Majesty to enter into or make the said treaty, or was ever consulted upon any clause or article thereof, or ever encouraged or promoted the same. That, as he remembers, Mr Secretary Vernon did at one time send for him, and discourse with him and others, upon an intimation, that was given by a letter from the Earl of Portland, as he remembers, that the French King was disposed to commence a negotiation upon some general terms, that were then mentioned, to prevent a war, in case of the King of Spain's death, who was then reported to be very ill; and afterwards the said matter was discoursed between the Secretary, the then Lord Chancellor, and the said Lord Hallifax, at Tunbridge-wells, when and where the said Lord Hallifax made several objections to the same; and denies, that he gave any opinion to encourage or promote the said treaty, or ever afterwards was informed of any one particular relating to it, or was ever consulted or advised upon any clause or article of it, or was ever after told or informed, that the said negotiation or treaty did go on or proceed; and faith, that not being advised with, or any ways knowing of the said treaty or negotiation (except as aforesaid) he could not dissuade or obstruct it's taking effect; and faith, as he cannot tell what the effects of the treaty might have been, if the said treaty had been observed, so he conceives and insists, that he is not nor ought to be answerable for the same." Pr. H. C. III. 167.

Burnet observes here, when, by these articles and the answers to them, it appeared, that after all the noise and clamour that had been raised against the former Ministry (more particularly against the Lord Hallifax) for the great waste of treasure, during their administration, that now, upon the strictest search, all ended in such poor accusations; it turned the minds of many, that had been formerly prejudiced against them. It appeared, that it was the animosity of a party at best, if it was not a French practice, to ruin men, who had served the King faithfully, and to discourage others, from engaging themselves so far in his interests, as these Lords had done. They saw the effect that must follow on this: And that the King could not enter upon a new war, if they could discourage from his service all the men of lively and active tempers, that would raise a spirit in the nation, for supporting such an important and dangerous war, as this now in prospect was like to prove.

(1) The Lord Haverham's speech was reported by Mr Harcourt, who said, that his Lordship used these or the like expressions: "One thing there is, though I cannot speak it, because I am bound up by the orders of the House; yet I must have some answer. This is as to the Lords voting in their own case. It requires an answer, though I cannot go into the debate of it. The Commons themselves have made this precedent; for, in these impeachments, they have allowed men guilty of the same crimes, to vote in their own House. And therefore, I do not make any distinction in our House, that some should vote, and some not. The Lords have to high an opinion of the justice of the House of Commons, that they hope justice shall never be made use of as a mask for any design. And therefore give me leave to say (though I am not to argue it) it is a plain demonstration, that the Commons think these Lords are guilty of the same crimes, as those who were impeached; for there are several Lords in the same crimes, in the same facts; there is no distinction. And the Commons leave some 1701. Conference (1), though they were told by the Duke of Devonshire, as they were going, that the Lord Haversham had no authority from the House of Lords, to use any such expressions towards the Commons.

Votes against Lord Haversham. Pr. H. C. III. 166. This affair being reported to the Commons by Mr Harcourt, the House immediately resolved, "That John Lord Haversham hath, at the free conference this day, uttered most scandalous reproaches and false expressions, highly reflecting upon the honour and justice of the House of Commons, and tending to the making a breach in the good correspondence between the Lords and Commons, and to the interrupting the public justice of the nation, by delaying the proceedings on impeachments: And that the said Lord Haversham be charged before the Lords for the said words; and that the Lords be desired to proceed in justice against him, and to inflict such punishment upon him, as so high an offence against the House of Commons does deserve." And Sir Christopher Musgrave was ordered to carry this charge and resolution to the Lords.

In the mean time the Lords sent a message to the Commons, to acquaint them, "That they had been informed by their Managers, that some interruption had happened at the free conference, which their Lordships were concerned at, because they wished, that nothing should interrupt the public business; and therefore desired the Commons to come again presently to the free conference; which they did not doubt would prove the best expedient to prevent the inconvenience of a misunderstanding upon what has passed."

But the Commons, instead of coming to the Conference, sent up Sir Christopher Musgrave, who acquainted the Lords, as he said, with what had happened at the Conferences and read the words supposed to be spoken by the Lord Haversham, concluding, "These were the words spoken by John Lord Haversham (2)." He then read the resolutions of the Commons, with relation to that Lord.

The Commons had now got a pretence to justify their not going further in the trials, and they resolved to insist upon it. When therefore they were again pressed by the Lords to renew the free Conference, they returned for answer, "That it was not consistent with their honour to renew the Conference, until they had reparation, by their Lordships doing justice upon Lord Haversham, for the indignity offered to the House of Commons." At the same time it was, that the articles against Lord Hallifax were sent up as has been related.

Upon this, Lord Haversham offered himself to a trial, and submitted to any censure, that the Lords should think he had deserved; but insisted that the words must first be proved, and he must be allowed to put his own sense on them; the Lords sent this to the Commons, but they seemed to think that the Lords ought to have proceeded to censure him in a summary way, which the Lords thought, being a Court of Judicature, they could not do, till the words were proved, and the importance of them discussed. Upon the Commons refusal to renew the Conference, the Lords likewise came to a resolution, to insist not to have a Committee of both Houses concerning the trial of the impeached Lords. They then proceeded to set the day for the trial of Lord Sommers, and a message was sent to acquaint the Commons, that the trial would be on Tuesday the 17th of June, at ten of the clock in Westminster-Hall. To remove the obstacle of the Lord Haversham's affair, they also told the Commons, that all things were preparing to bring that matter to a speedy judgment; and they likewise put them in mind of articles against the Earl of Portland.

Instead of returning answers to these messages, The Lords the Commons refused to appear, and said, they tried and were the only Judges, when they were ready with their evidence, and that it was a mockery to go to a trial, when they were not ready to appear at it (3). There were great and long debates upon this in the House of Lords: The new Ministry, and all the Jacobites, joined to support

"of these men at the head of affairs near the King's person, to do any mischief, if their persons were inclined to it; and impeach others, when they are both alike guilty, and concerned in the same facts. This is a thing I was in hopes I should never have heard asserted, when the beginning of it was from the House of Commons." Pr. H. C. III. 165.

(1) This was not usual, and in a case not long before, where a Member of the House of Commons having said what was much more liable to exception, than it could be pretended what Lord Haversham said, was, some of the Commons saying, that he had no direction from the House for what was said, the Lords staid out the conference, and complained of the words afterwards.

(2) Sir Christopher Musgrave had no warrant to say as he did, These were the words, &c. for Mr Harcourt in his report only says, He used these or the like expressions. See note above.

(3) The Commons, instead of appearing at the trial, sent up to the Lords, on the 17th of June, the following reasons of their non-appearance.

"The Commons, in this whole proceeding against the impeached Lords, have acted with all imaginable zeal to bring them to a speedy trial; and they doubt not but it will appear by comparing their proceedings with all other upon the like occasions, that the House of Commons have nothing to blame themselves, but that they have not expressed the repentment their ancestors have justly shewed upon much less attempts, which have been made upon their power of impeachments.

"The Commons, on the 31st of May, acquainted your Lordships, that they thought it proper, from the nature of the evidence, to proceed in the first place upon the trial of the Lord Sommers. Upon the first intimation from your Lordships, some days afterwards, that you would proceed to the trial of the impeached Lords, whom the Commons should be first ready to begin with, notwithstanding your Lordships had before thought fit to appoint, which impeachment should be first tried, and affixed a day for such a trial, without consulting the Commons, who are the Prosecutors; the Commons, determining to expedite the trials to the utmost of their power, in hopes of attaining that end, and for the more speedy and easy adjusting and preventing any differences, which had happened, or might arise previous to, or upon, these trials, proposed to your Lordships at a conference the most parliamentary and effectual method for that purpose, and that, which in no manner intrenched upon your Lordships Judicature, that a Committee of both Houses should be nominated, to consider of the most proper ways and methods of proceeding upon impeachments, according to the usage of Parliament.

"In

1701. support the pretensions of the Commons: Every step was to be made by a vote, against which many Lords protested; and the reasons given, in some of their protestations, were thought to be so injurious to the House, that they were by a vote ordered to be expunged, a thing that seldom happens.

When the day appointed for the trial came, 1701. the Lords entered upon a debate, and the question was put, "Whether the House should go this day into the Court in Westminster-Hall, in order to proceed upon the trial of the Lord Sommers, according to the order of the day?" Which was resolved in the affirmative,

"In the next message to the Commons, upon Monday the 9th of June, your Lordships thought fit, without taking the least notice of this proposition, to appoint Friday then following for the trial of the said Lord Sommers; whereunto, as well as to many other messages and proceedings of your Lordships upon this occasion, the House of Commons might have justly taken very great exceptions; yet, as an evidence of their moderation, and to shew their readiness to bring the impeached Lords to speedy justice, the Commons insisted only on their proposition for a Committee of both Houses to settle and adjust the necessary preliminaries to the trial; particularly, Whether the impeached Lords should appear on their trial at your Lordships bar as criminals? Whether, being under accusations of the same crimes, they should sit as Judges on each other's trial for those crimes, or should vote in their own cases, as it is notorious they have been permitted by your Lordships to do in many instances, which might be given, to which particulars your Lordships have not yet given a direct answer, though put in mind thereof by the Commons. Your Lordships at a conference, having offered some reasons, why you could not agree to a Committee of both Houses, to adjust the necessary preliminaries, the Commons thereupon desired a free conference, and your Lordships agreed therunto; at which, it is well known to many of your Lordships, who were then present, what most scandalous reproaches and false expressions, highly reflecting upon the honour and justice of the House of Commons, were uttered by John Lord Haverham, whereby the Commons were under necessity of withdrawing from the said free Conference; for which offence the Commons have, with all due regard to your Lordships, prayed your Lordships justice against the Lord Haverham, but have as yet received no manner of satisfaction.

"The Commons refrain themselves from enumerating your Lordships very many irregular and unparliamentary proceedings upon this occasion; but think it is what they owe to public justice and all the Commons of England, whom they represent, to declare some few of those reasons, why they peremptorily refuse to proceed to the trial of the Lord Sommers on the 17th of June.

"First, because your Lordships have not yet agreed, that a Committee of both Houses should be appointed for settling the necessary preliminaries, a method never until this time denied by the House of Lords, whenever the Commons have thought it necessary to desire the same.

"Secondly, should the Commons (which they never will do) be contented to give up those rights, which have been transmitted to them from their ancestors, and are of absolute necessity to their proceedings on impeachments; yet, whilst they have any regard to public justice, they never can appear as Prosecutors before your Lordships, till your Lordships have first given them satisfaction, that Lords impeached of the same crime shall not sit as Judges on each other's trials for those crimes.

"Thirdly, because the Commons have as yet had no reparation for the great indignity offered to them at the free conference by the Lord Haverham. The Commons are far from any inclination, and cannot be supposed to be under any necessity of delaying the trial of the Lord Sommers. There is not any article exhibited by them in maintenance of their impeachment against the Lord Sommers, for the proof whereof they have not full and undeniable evidence, which they will be ready to produce, as soon as your Lordships shall have done justice upon the Lord Haverham; and the necessary preliminaries in order to the said trial shall be settled by a Committee of both Houses.

"The Commons think it unnecessary to observe to your Lordships, that most of the articles, whereof the Lord Sommers stands impeached, will appear to your Lordships to be undoubtedly true from matters of record, as well as by the confession of the said Lord Sommers in his answer to the said articles; to which the Commons doubt not but your Lordships will have a due regard, when his trial shall regularly proceed."

The Lords sent their answer to this message, June the 20th, in these words:

"The Lords, in answer to the message of the Commons of the 17th instant, say, the only true way of determining, which of the two Houses has acted with the greatest sincerity, in order to bring the impeached Lords to their trials, is to look back upon the respective proceedings.

"The Lords do not well understand what the Commons mean by that resentment, which they speak of in their message. Their Lordships own the House of Commons have a right of impeaching; and the Lords have undoubted power of doing justice upon those impeachments, by bringing them to trial, and condemning or acquitting the parties in a reasonable time. This power is derived to them from their ancestors, which they will not suffer to be wrested from them by any pretences whatsoever.

"Their Lordships cannot but wonder, that the Commons should not have proposed a Committee of both Houses much sooner, if they thought it so necessary for the bringing on the trials; no mention being made of such a Committee from the 1st of April to the 6th of June, although, during that interval, their delays were frequently complained of by the House of Lords.

"The manner, in which the Commons demand this Committee, the Lords look upon as a direct invading of their Judicature; and therefore, as there never was a Committee of both Houses yielded to by the Lords, in case of any impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors; so their Lordships do insist, that they will make no new precedent upon this occasion. Many impeachments for misdemeanors have in all times been determined without such a Committee. And if now the Commons think fit, by any unprecedented demand, to form an excuse for not prosecuting their impeachments, it is demonstrable where the obstruction lies.

"As to the preliminaries, which the Commons mentioned in particular, as proper to be settled at such a Committee, they have received the resolutions of the House of Lords therein, by their message of the 12th instant; from which (being matters intirely relating to their Judicature) their Lordships cannot depart.

"As to the last pretence the Commons would make to shelter the delaying the trials, from some expressions, which fell from the Lord Haverham at the free Conference, at which offence was taken, their Lordships will only observe,

"First, That they have omitted nothing, which might give the Commons all reasonable satisfaction of their purpose to do them justice in that matter, so far as is consistent with doing justice to that Lord; and also to preserve all good correspondence with them;

1701. tive, though several Lords protested against it (1). A message was then sent to the Commons, to acquaint them, that their Lordships were going. The other impeached Lords having asked leave to withdraw, and not sit and vote in the trial, a question was proposed, "Whether the Earl of Orford and the Lord Hallifax may withdraw at the trial of the "Lord Sommers?" This was much opposed by some Lords, because the giving such leave suppoled, that they had a right to vote; but it was resolved in the affirmative. And, after some other things of form, the Lords adjourned into Westminster-Hall, where the articles of impeachment against the Lord Sommers, and his answers were read, and the Commons not appearing to prosecute, their Lordships adjourned to their House, and entered into a long debate concerning the question, that was to be put. The Judges told them, that, according to the forms of law, it ought to be guilty or not guilty. But those of the Tory party said, as it was certain, that none could vote Lord Sommers guilty; so, since the Commons had not come to make good the charge, they could not vote him not guilty; and therefore, to give them some content, the question agreed on to be put was, "That John Lord Sommers be acquitted of "the articles of impeachment against him, exhibited by the House of Commons, and all "things therein contained; and that the impeachment be dismissed?" That being settled, the Lords returned to Westminster-Hall, and, the question being put, fifty six voted in the affirmative, and thirty-one in the negative; and the Lord-Keeper declared, that the majority was for acquitting him. Then the Lords adjourned to their House, and made an order for his being acquitted, and the impeachment to be dismissed.

Upon this the Commons passed some high votes against the Lords, and, to justify their refusal to appear at the trial, resolved, "That "the Lords have refused justice to the Commons upon the impeachment against the Lord Sommers, by denying them a Committee of "both Houses, which was desired by the Commons as the proper and only method of settling the necessary preliminaries, in order to the proceeding to the trial of the Lord Sommers with effect; and afterwards, by proceeding to a pretended trial of the said Lord,

"which could tend only to protect him from 1701
"justice, by colour of an illegal acquittal. Against which proceedings of the Lords, the Commons do solemnly protest, as being repugnant to the rules of justice, and therefore null and void. That the House of Lords, by the pretended trial of John Lord Sommers, have endeavoured to overturn the right of impeachments lodged in the House of Commons, by the antient Constitution of this Kingdom, for the safety and protection of the Commons against the power of great men, and have made an invasion upon the liberties of the subject, by laying a foundation of impunity for the greatest offenders. That all the ill consequences, which may at this time attend the delay of the supplies given by the Commons for the preserving the public peace, and maintaining the balance of Europe, by supporting our Allies against the power of France, are to be imputed to those who, to procure an indemnity for their own crimes, have used their utmost endeavours to make a breach between the two Houses."

The Lords went as high in their votes against The Lords answer.

the Commons, and the same day sent this answer to their message: "The Lords do acquaint the Commons, that they might have known, by the records of the House of Lords, that the Lords had proceeded to the trial of the Lord Sommers on Tuesday last, being the day appointed; and, the Commons not appearing to maintain their articles against the said Lord, the Lords had by judgment of their House, acquitted him of the articles of impeachment against him, exhibited by the Commons, and all things therein contained, and had dismissed the said impeachment.

"And the Lords had appointed Monday next for the trial of the Earl of Orford, on which day they would proceed on the trial.

"The Commons still pressing for a Committee of both Houses, which their Lordships could never consent to for the reasons already given, their Lordships could infer nothing from their persisting in this demand, than that they never designed to bring any of their impeachments to a trial.

"As to the Lord Haverham, his answer was now before the House of Commons, and the Lords resolved to do justice in that matter."

The

"them; as appears by the several steps they have have taken.

"Secondly, That this business has no relation to the trial of the impeached Lords; and therefore their Lordships cannot imagine, why the Commons should make satisfaction and reparation against the Lord Haverham a necessary condition for the going on with the trials, and at the same time find no difficulties in proceeding on other business." Pr. H. C. III. 169—175.

(1) This protest was thought so injurious to the House, that it was ordered to be expunged; but it was as follows:

"We do conceive it very improper to proceed to this trial, before the preliminaries are adjusted, especially since some of those preliminaries are such, as in our opinion are essentially necessary to the administration of justice.

"And after such a protestation of the Commons, as they have sent to us against the proceedings to a trial, and which we conceive is founded upon No. 30. VOL. III.

"justice, and the reasonable method of Parliament, we apprehended our proceeding now to this trial may tend to the disappointment of all future trials on impeachments."

II. 31.

The Commons on the same day, the 20th of June, having ordered, that none of their Members should appear on the Monday following, at the pretended trial of the Earl of Orford, upon pain of incurring the utmost displeasure of the House, they adjourned to Tuesday morning. But the Lords continued sitting, and, having sent a copy of the Lord Haversham's answer (1) to the Commons, they resolved, on the 21st of June, "That, unless the Commons charge against that Lord shall be prosecuted by them against him with effect, before the end of the Session, the Lords would declare and adjudge him wholly innocent of the charge." And on Monday, June the 23d, it was resolved by their Lordships, That the resolutions of the House of Commons, in their votes of the 20th instant, contained most unjust reflections on the honour and justice of the House of Peers, and were contrived to cover their affected and unreasonable delays in prosecuting the impeached Lords; and manifestly tended to the destruction of the Judicature of the Lords, to the rendering trials on impeachments impracticable for the future, and to the subverting the Constitution of the English Government; and that therefore, whatever ill consequences might arise from the so long deferring the supplies for this year's service, were to be attributed to the fatal counsel of the putting off the meeting of a Parliament so long, and to the unnecessary delays of the House of Commons.

Then the Lords adjourned to Westminster-Hall, and, after two proclamations made for silence and prosecution, the articles of impeachment against Edward Earl of Orford were read, 1701. and also his answer to those articles; and, after taking the same methods as in the trial of the Lord Sommers, his Lordship, by unanimous votes (the Lords on the other side withdrawing) was acquitted of the articles, and the impeachment was dismissed.

The next day, being the last of the Session the impeachment of the Parliament, this order was made by the Lords:

"The House of Commons not having prosecuted their charge, which they brought up against John Lord Haversham, for words spoken by him at a free conference the 13th instant, the charge shall be and is hereby dismissed."

"The Earl of Portland being impeached by the House of Commons of high crimes and misdemeanors the first of April last, the impeachment is hereby dismissed, there being no articles exhibited against him."

"The House of Commons having impeached Charles Lord Halifax of high crimes and misdemeanors on the 15th of April last, and on the 14th day of this instant June exhibited articles against him, to which he having answered, and no further prosecution thereupon, the impeachment and articles are hereby dismissed."

"The House of Commons having impeached Thomas Duke of Leeds of high crimes and misdemeanors on the 27th of April 1695, and on the 29th exhibited articles against him, to which he answered, but the Commons not prosecuting, the impeachment and articles are hereby dismissed."

Each

(1) This answer was very long, and may be seen in the Proceedings of the House of Commons (III. 174.) That part of it, which relates to his reflecting on the partiality of the Commons, in his speech at the free conference, was as follows:

That the nature of that conference was, that it should be free: The occasion of it, because either House apprehended the other to be in an error; and the end of it, that each side may urge such facts, as are true, and such reasons as are forcible to convince. That one article of impeachment against John Lord Sommers was, that the treaty of Partition of 1699 was ratified under the Great Seal, which then was in the custody of the same Lord, then Lord Chancellor of England. That the Commons on the 1st of April 1701 resolved, that the Earl of Portland, by negotiating and concluding the treaty of Partition, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor; and, pursuant thereto, lodged an impeachment against him in the House of Peers. Which vote and impeachment could not have reference to any treaty, other than the treaty of Partition of 1699, the treaty of 1698 not being before the House of Commons till after the time of that vote and impeachment. And yet the Earl of Jersey, who then was Secretary of State and Privy Counsellor, and actually signed the said treaty of 1699, as a Plenipotentiary with the Lord Portland, stands unimpeached, and continues at the head of affairs, being Lord Chamberlain near his Majesty's Person, and in his Presence and Councils, without complaint. That the Earl of Orford and the Lords Sommers and Halifax are severally impeached for advising the treaty of Partition of 1698; and yet Mr Secretary Vernon, who then was Secretary of State and a Privy Counsellor, and acted in the promoting of the treaty of Partition of 1698, stands unimpeached, and still continues one of the Principal Secretaries of State. And Sir Joseph Williamson, who then was a Privy Counsellor, and transacted and signed the treaty of Partition of 1698, as a Plenipotentiary, stands unimpeached. That the Lord Halifax is impeached, for that he, being a Commissioner of the Treasury, assented to the passing of several Grants from the Crown to several persons of lands in Ireland: And yet Sir Edward Seymour, Sir Stephen Fox, and Mr Pelham, who, being severally Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, did severally assent to the passing of divers like Grants from his Majesty of lands in Ireland, stands unimpeached. That, in the impeachments against the Earl of Orford and Lord Sommers, one of the articles against them is, for procuring a Commission to Captain William Kidd, and likewise a Grant under the Great Seal of the ship and goods of certain persons therein named, to certain persons in trust for them; and yet other Lords, equally concerned in procuring the said Commission and Grant stand unimpeached. That the said Mr Secretary Vernon, Sir Edward Seymour, Sir Stephen Fox, and Mr Pelham, notwithstanding their being parties in the same facts charged in the same respective impeachments, have been permitted to sit and vote in the House of Commons touching the said impeachments, and the matters thereof. That, these facts being true, and publicly known, the consequences resulting therefrom (as the Lord Haversham apprehended) are undeniable, viz. That the doing of the same thing by two persons in equal circumstances cannot be a crime in one, and not in the other. That the Commons had no reason to insist, that the Lords should not permit that in their Members, which the Commons had first permitted, and continued to permit, and so begun the first precedent in their own Members. That it must be thought that the impeached Lords (notwithstanding the facts alleged in the impeachments) are innocent of danger to the King, when the Lord Jersey and Mr Secretary Vernon, who are respectively concerned in the Partition treaties,

Remarks on these proceedings.
Burnet.

Each House ordered a narrative of the proceedings to be published (1); and they had gone so far in their votes against one another, that it was believed, they would never meet again. The proceedings of the Lords had the general approbation of the nation on their side. Most of the Bishops adhered to the impeached Lords, and their behaviour, on this occasion, was much commended. The violence, as well as folly of the party, lost them much ground with all indifferent men, but with none more than with the King himself, who found his error in changing his Ministry at so critical a time; and he now saw, that the Tories were at heart irreconcilable to him; in particular, he was extremely uneasy with the Earl of Rochester, of whose imperious and intractable temper he complained much, and seemed resolved to disengage himself quickly from him, and never to return to him any more. He thought the party was neither solid nor sincere, and that they were actuated by passion and revenge, without any views with relation to the quiet of the nation, and affairs abroad.

The violent proceedings of the Commons, ^{The Kettish petition.} and their slowness with relation to foreign affairs, had not only displeased the King, but given a general disgust to the nation, and particularly to the city of London, where foreign affairs, and the interest of trade were generally better understood; the Old East-India Company, though they hated the Ministry that set up the New,

are permitted, without complaint, to be at the head of affairs, and in the King's Presence, and of his Councils, as not dangerous. That the word innocent, used in the words spoken by the said Lord Haversham, can extend no further than to such matters, as were done by the impeached Lords of the same nature with what was done by those unimpeached. All which facts being true, and the consequences obvious, the said Lord being ready to prove the same, he insists, that the words, spoken by him at the said free conference, were not scandalous or reproachful, nor false or reflecting on the honour or justice of the House of Commons, but were spoken upon a just occasion given, in answer to several expressions, that fell from the Managers for the Commons, remote (as he conceives) from the matter in question, and reflecting on the honour and justice of the House of Peers, and in maintenance and defence of the Lords Resolutions and Judicature, and conformable to the duty he owes to the said House. And the said Lord humbly demands the judgment of their honourable House therein. And the said Lord Haversham denies, that he spoke the words specified in the said charge, in such manner and form, as the same are therein set down. And having thus given a true account of this matter, and it being true and indisputable, that some Lords in this House, equally concerned in facts, for which other Lords are impeached by the House of Commons, are still near the King's Person, in the greatest places of trust and honour, unimpeached; and also that several Members of the House of Commons, equally concerned in the same facts, for which some Lords are impeached, do however remain unimpeached; the said Lord thinks, such a truth could never have been more properly spoken, in the maintenance and defence of your Lordships Judicature and Resolutions; and inisisteth, that what he had said at the free conference was not any scandalous reproach, or false expression, or any way tended to make a breach in the good correspondence between the Lords and Commons, or to the interrupting the public justice of the nation, by delaying the proceedings on the impeachments, as in the said charge alledged, but agreeable to truth, in discharge of his duty, and in the defence of the undoubted Right and Judicature of this House.

Haversham.

(1) It may not be improper to subjoin here some remarks concerning those proceedings, extracted from a MS. written by a very considerable person of that time.

"The Partition treaty, says he, was no sooner published, but it appeared, that the French Ambassador, Monsieur Tallard, had formed a strong party here against it, and had engaged Dr Davenant to write against it. It was not enough for the French Court to resolve on breaking it, but, to complete the perfidy, it must die with infamy. At the first opening of the Session, addresses were made to the King from the Houses for all the treaties, that had been made since that at Ryswick.

"This was done on the 12th or 13th of February, two or three days after the opening of the Session. The translating and copying these went on so slowly, that they were not brought to the House of Lords before the 26th of February. This delay was so uneasy to those, who were longing for an occasion to discharge their engagements to those, who had merited well at their hands, as well as to gratify their resentments, by falling on that treaty, and on all concerned in it, that, I am told, on two or three occasions they complained of it, yet by some secret but powerful charm all men were so restrained, that, from the 26th of February to the 20th of March, no notice at all was taken of it; but on the 20th the train was fired, and all was soon in a flame. I cannot certainly tell you what was the occasion of this great patience and long silence, after some had shewn an eagerness, that seemed not very governable. I will only tell you what happened at that time at the Hague. After the French had possessed themselves of the Spanish Netherlands, and found the States were not very easy in their neighbourhood, they desired to treat with them, and know what would satisfy them. The States insisted upon the engagements given by the Partition treaty, and complained of the violation of it, and asked such securities, as they thought necessary. The King ordered his Minister to join with them in the like complaints and demands. These were given in on the 8th of March; and, as soon as the French Ambassador had an account of it, immediately the matter of that treaty was fallen on in the House of Lords, while very few among them knew any thing of the negotiation at the Hague, which was not communicated to them by the King till four days after. But some perhaps had better intelligence. The treaty then set on foot at the Hague was to have this disgrace put upon it, that the Partition treaty, on which it was to be founded, was to be condemned. Some, that had been concerned in it, had advertisements sent them from the Court of France of their danger; by all which the French party hoped, that the King himself, and such as had been concerned in the matter, would be prevailed on to let that treaty be forgotten, and become more favourable to the French interest, if it were but to save themselves from the storm, that was otherwise ready to break out on them. I can affirm nothing in this matter, but, if you will lay all this together, you will acknowledge there is ground enough for jealousy. So long a silence, and then the falling on the treaty in that critical minute, could not happen by chance without some secret and unperceived direction. But, by what accident or order soever it might be, this matter was taken up by the Lords, and severely arraigned first by those, who value themselves upon their finding fault with every thing, that is done, because they have not the doing of it; and though some of these had once a very friendly application of a Spanish proverb made to them, that he,

1701. New, and studied to support this House of Commons, from whom they expected much favour; yet they, as well as the rest of the City, saw visibly, that first the ruin of trade, and consequently the ruin of the nation, must certainly ensue, if France and Spain were once firmly united. So they began openly to condemn the proceedings of the Commons, and to own a jealousy, that the Lewis d'ors, sent hither of late, had not come over to England for nothing. This disposition, to blame the slowness in which the Commons proceeded with respect to affairs abroad, spread itself through all England, and more especially in Kent. Those of that County, in a dislike of the conduct of the Commons, 1701. sent up the following petition to that House: May 8.

“WE the Gentlemen, Justices of the Peace, Grand Jury, and other Freeholders, at the general Quarter Sessions of Peace at Maidstone in Kent, deeply concerned at the dangerous estate of this Kingdom, and of all Europe; and considering, that the fate of us and our posterity depends upon the wisdom of our Representatives in Parliament, think ourselves bound in duty humbly to lay before this Honourable House the consequences, in this conjuncture, of your speedy resolution, “ and

“ he, who house is of glass, should throw no stones; yet good nature and zeal for the public are too strong to be long restrained, though it happens now and then, that they are put in mind of some things, that, though they are pardoned, will not easily be forgotten. But that, which seemed very strange, and was a very extraordinary piece of courtship, was that those, who are most in the King's confidence, and feel the best effects of it, fell upon the treaty in a most particular manner. Words not very decent, if applied to the actions of the meanest subject, were employed to lay out the ridiculousness, the injustice, the treachery and barbarity of the treaty, as things fit to give horror. Now since, what share forever the late Ministry might be supposed to have had in it, yet it was well known, that it was chiefly of the King's own designing, therefore though it is certain, that a Parliament of England may with a due firmness, as well as with just respect, represent to the King such errors, as he may fall into; yet a decency of style was but suitable, especially in men bred in Courts, and accustomed enough to a more submissive dialect in former reigns. This might have been expected from those, who know, that the King thought it no lessening of himself to own, that he believed he had made the best bargain possible, all circumstances considered. This was not all; those, who attacked the treaty, five or six in a string, did all of them say, they meant not to find fault; that they had no other design but to amend what had been amiss, and to prevent the like errors for the future. They did not intend to fall upon any one person, not so much as to a reprimand: All they meant was to have errors corrected, and to have things put in a better method. While the debate went on upon this point, and that all those, who were known to have a share in the confidence, went into censuring the treaty, those, who could not help the having other thoughts of it, could not of the sudden know what was fit to be done. Many thought it was concerted at Court to let the treaty be censured; and that all the ill humour raised upon it was to evaporate in some angry votes, without carrying the matter further. No intimations had been given, that the King desired the thing might be better understood, before it should be condemned. The King was that day at Hampton-Court; so no application could be made to him; for, let men talk what they will of freedom in debate, there ever was, and ever will be, and ought to be, great regard had to our Princes with relation to matters of State. Not that the King's mind ought to have any influence on men's arguing or voting; but it is certain, that in many cases men may resolve to be passive in some of the King's concerns, when they think he intends to be so himself. They may reasonably conclude, that he is willing to let some things go, at some times, that he may thereby put his people in better humour, in order to the gaining other things, that are of more consequence. This is so frequently practised, that he must be a great stranger to the methods of managing a Session of Parliament, who has not observed it almost in every Session. And this was the case in the House of Lords upon this occasion. No body was sooner in their reflections on that decried treaty than those, who were most in the confidence. Every man declared, that no further use was to be made of the votes, that were proposed for condemning it, but to offer good advice to the King for better conduct in future negotiations. Some, who intended to have excused, if not justified, the treaty, were prevailed on to say nothing; not so much out of caution, not to go against the stream, but because they had no mind to seem more concerned in maintaining the honour of the King's treaties, than he was himself. They thought their opposition would signify little, and pass for Officeiousness and Court-flattery. So they gave way, and the votes passed without contradiction. This point was no sooner gained, than some of those very persons, who had made the fullest protestations of their having no intention to carry the matter further, immediately laid off the mask; for you know, in Parliamentary proceedings all men are not equally exact in performing what they promised, when they have once carried the point they aimed at. These arts are so familiar to some, that, instead of being out of countenance, they value themselves upon their dexterity at them. So it happened here. This is the true account of that matter, without any disguise. The Lords, since accused for it, did indeed offer such an account of the share they had in the treaty in the year 1699, that it was impossible to lay any blame on them for it; and the Lord Somers, whose health was out of order the first two days, in which this was before the Lords, when he came to the House, gave so clear an account of the share, that himself had in it, that there were not two in the whole House, who did not seem entirely satisfied with his behaviour in that matter. This was signified by shouts and acclamations, that were raised higher, and continued longer, than some, who had sat long there, had ever observed before. If those Lords had known, that the King desired, that right should be done him in defending both his honour, justice, and wisdom, as they were concerned in that treaty, they, who have often hazarded themselves much further in his service, would not have been wanting in that piece of duty and respect. But it was generally believed at that time, that the King was less concerned in that matter, than it has been apprehended he was afterwards, when the stroke was struck, and could not be retrieved. Indeed a new scene opened soon after that, when it was suggested by the Lord Wharton, that, what sense forever the House might have of the Partition treaty, yet since, to the observation of all Europe, the French King had broke it, it was fit to make that a paragraph of the address, that the King, in all future treaties with that Crown, should not trust to verbal assurances, but demand a real security. This was so conformable to the foot, upon which the King and the States did give in the memorials at the Hague, and was so contrary to the designs of the French, who intended to offer no other security but the renewing “ the

"And in regard, that from the experience of all ages it is manifest, no nation can be great or happy without union; we hope, that no pretence whatsoever shall be able to create a misunderstanding among ourselves, or the least distrust of his most sacred Majesty, whose great actions for this nation are writ in the hearts of his subjects, and can never, without the blackest ingratitude, be forgot."

"We most humbly implore this Honourable House to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and safety may be effectually provided for; that your loyal addresses may be turned into bills of supply;

"and that his most sacred Majesty (whose pious and unblemished reign over us we pray God long to continue) may be enabled powerfully to assist his Allies, before it is too late."

This petition was signed by the Deputy-Lieutenants there present, above twenty Justices of the Peace, all the Grand-Jury, and other Freeholders, and was boldly delivered to the House of Commons on the 8th of May; and William Colepepper, Thomas Colepepper, David Polhill, Justinian Champney, and William Hamilton, Esquires, being called in, owned the petition at the bar, and their hands to the same. They then withdrew, and, the petition being read,

"the treaty of Ryswick, that it was no wonder, if men gained by the French gold should have opposed it. But it seemed very strange to see so great an opposition made to it by men, that must be presumed incapable of corruption, and who are esteemed steady to their country; yet as there are odd accidents, that happen sometimes, but that lie so far out of the way, that no account can be given of them; so this drew on, I cannot tell how, a debate of many hours, and of much heat. If Verfaillies had dictated the arguments, they could not have chosen them better, or wished them to have been more dextrously managed; though I am sure you are not capable of letting this pass upon you, as if those great men were subject to the common frailty of loving for ready money. Therefore I will take no more pains to secure you from it. The vote was carried, and it was followed by a protest, on which I will make no reflections, for the persons are above. I must only observe one thing more, that votes are generally conceived in plain and simple terms; but, when addresses are to be made pursuant to them, they are enlarged in fuller expressions; and that was not wanting in this address; much rhetoric was employed: The Partition treaty was called that fatal treaty, and was heavily loaded; but the last paragraph, concerning a real security to be demanded from France, was set down in the bare words of the vote, without the least enlargement, how much sower some, who penned it, love the beauties of eloquence. Yet that was too tender a point to be touched with a rough hand; an addition of any weighty words might have been made a pretence to a discount by those, who will have pennypworths for their money."

The reader will undoubtedly be pleased to find here another paper from the same hand, never yet printed, concerning the conduct of the Ministry and of the leading men in the House of Commons during this Session, with respect to foreign affairs. "It is well known, says he, that a few days before the King came over, which was in the beginning of November, he had ordered Mr Blathwayte to write two post-days, one after another, to the Lords Justices, to prepare a proclamation giving notice, that the Parliament was to meet to do business on the 18th of November. The King came over himself before this was to be published, and he soon after had the news of the King of Spain's will, and of his death, which was quickly followed with a declaration, that the French King did accept of the King of Spain's will: And therefore did not think fit to stand to the Partition treaty. The King had a Parliament current, and ready to meet in a few days, as he had intended it should before this great turn of affairs. But the Parliament was put off to a further day, and upon the hopes, and, as is said, upon the undertakings of some, all was put off till the new Sheriffs were pricked; and, as soon as they were fixed in their service, the writs went out for a new Parliament, summoned to the 6th but prorogued Numb. 30. Vol. III.

"gued to the 10th of February. Here was one Parliament dissolved, and another called, and by this means three months were lost, which upon such a great turn is a matter of no small consequence. England seemed uncertain or asleep. This gave the French no small encouragement, and was a great disheartening to the Emperor and the States. In all this time it is positively said, that the new Ministry pressed the King vehemently to own the King of Spain. This is certain, that both they and their friends said, in all companies, and on all occasions, that it was no matter, who was King of Spain; the King of Spain must know his own interest; he must be governed by Spanish Councils; and they must be true to their ancient allies, the English and the Dutch, for that was to be true to themselves. They said England was not for a war, and indeed not capable to go into one, while they were under so great a debt. They spared not to say, that the King was not for a war; and that he knew it was impracticable. They spoke of the Emperor as a Prince not capable of doing any thing, and for whom we were to have no regard. All this while the King was on a great reserve, and was told, as has been very confidently reported since, that, if he shewed any inclination to a war, that would raise jealousies, which would very much obstruct all business; and therefore it was necessary for his affairs, that he should not discover his own thoughts of things. This well-meant reservedness of the King's was at the same time given out to flow from his own aversion to engage in the Emperor's quarrels; but that he was still in secret treaties and engagements with France."

"While they and their Agents were infusing these things into all, that came up, but, chiefly into the Parliament-men, the Citizens of London saw clearly, that the least ill effect of the union of France and Spain must be the ruin of the trade of England, and spoke openly of the necessity of a war; and it was surmised, that the old Ministry were likewise for a war; and many began to speak it openly, that, as it seemed inevitable, that we must engage in a war, so this could not be managed but by a Ministry, that was both zealous and resolute, and that was possessed of the esteem and confidence of the nation, chiefly of the city, who would never make the advances of money, that must be necessary in a war, unless they trusted the Ministry. Whispers were set about, that the King retained a just sense of those, who had helped him through his former war, and might think they would be useful to him in this. This, with the French practices, raised the storm against them by those, who resolved to conduct matters after their own way, and to keep them from a possibility of returning again into favour."

"As soon as the Session was opened, it was resolved to carry a vote in the House of Commons for an address to the King to own the new King of Spain, though they knew, that he had not yet owned 1701. read, the House resolved, "That the petition " was scandalous, insolent, and seditious, tend" ing to destroy the Constitution of Parlia" ments, and to subvert the Established Go" vernment of these Realms." And then or" dered, "That all those Gentlemen should be " taken into custody, as guilty of promoting " the petition." And on the 14th of May, the House being informed, that Mr Thomas Colepepper had made his escape, and that the rest of the persons committed were like to be rescued, ordered them to be delivered prisoners to the Gate-House, and agreed to address his Majesty, to issue his proclamation for apprehending Mr Colepepper, and for putting out of the Commissions of Peace and Lieutenantcy such others, as

" owned the King, or given him notice of his ac" cession to that Crown: But the honest zeal of " Mr Monten, and others, had a happy effect. This " was stopped, to the no small grief of those, who " had taken much pains in it, and, no doubt, expect" ed to be well rewarded for it. The stream run
" another way, and then it appeared, that, how much
" soever the prejudices of some had been wrought
" upon, yet the bulk of the House were still true Eng" lishmen; yet, they retained so good an opinion of " some men, that had got too much credit among " them, that things were suffered to cool, and the " House was diverted to other matters, that can never " be managed with temper. The House, indeed, de" clared for an alliance with the Dutch, and for a " fleet; but, it was so long, before they could be " brought to declare for an alliance with the Emperor,
" that, if the French had not despised all he could do,
" more, perhaps, than they do now, and, if they had " not depended on the strength of their interest here,
" they would have, perhaps, made such offers to the " Emperor, as might have prevailed on him, when " he had so little reason to hope for any concurrence
" from us. The King received frequent messages " from the States, representing the extremities, to " which they were driven, of which, some were writ" ten in such moving strains, that few read them
" without feeling impressions of great tenderness.
" But there was a Stoical apathy somewhere, that " could not be wrought on: And when, by the inter" cepting the Earl of Melfort's letter to his brother,
" we all saw how confident those of St Germain's
" were of their affairs, yet Sir Edward Seymour, Sir
" T. M. and others, looked on that but as a Court-" artifice, and had not so much regard to it, as to " order the printing of it, though the Lords consider" ed better of it. It was long before the House could " see through the artifices of those, who misled them.
" The ten thousand men, agreed to by old treaties to " be sent to the Dutch, could not be easily obtained;
" The matter was long delayed; and, that the French
" interest might be served one way, when another
" failed, five thousand of these were to be drawn out
" of Ireland; but particular care was taken, that no
" new bodies should be raised in their stead, that so
" Ireland might be left so naked, that there might be,
" perhaps, a new diversion given us on that side, un" less that is provided by the prudent management
" and great temper of the Lord Lieutenant.

" In this slow method were things carried on, to " the discouragement of all Europe, who reckoned we " were a sold nation; or, that we could be no more " depended on.

" I could here run out into a long digression, to " shew you the various methods their party have taken " in this, as well as in former Sessions, to blast the pub" lic credit; the effect of which was well foreseen by " those who laboured it. They knew, the breaking " of credit must, for the future, hinder all advances
" of money; and this must have been fatal, especially " if we had engaged in a war. But I may, perhaps,
" entertain you with this on another occasion. One " particular only I will mention here. The credit of " Exchequer notes was a noble contrivance, to fur" nish us with near three millions of paper-money, till " they sunk gradually, as was projected in the first " design. Pains was taken, in particular, to blast
" this; yet 50,000, as all the Bankers said, was suf" ficient to keep up their credit. But those, who " had a mind to make the supply as little effectual as

" was possible, moved, that one shilling in the pound
" should go towards the quicker sinking of them;
" and, since it must have been looked on as indecent
" to lay on more than three shillings in the pound,
" while we were not actually engaged in a war, by " applying one of these to this effect, there were only " two left, to answer the public occasions, while yet
" the nation was to be possessed with this appearance
" of their zeal, by their giving three shillings in the " pound. It is true, they voted a full proportion of " seamen for a good fleet; but even this was spoiled in " the management. It is certain, that, in every ap" pearance of war, we ought to be well guarded with " a good fleet: But a fleet, that was to ply up and " down in the Channel, was only a defence to our" selves, who were in no danger of being attacked.
" Three or four thousand marines would have look" ed as if we intended to act offensively with our " fleet, and must have struck terror all over both the " French and the Spanish, and have put them to no " small charge to have secured themselves. But, for " this very reason, every motion, that way, was re" jected; so, though it had been too bare-faced not " to have set out a good fleet, yet care was taken,
" that neither the Spaniards, nor the French, should " suffer from it, not so much as to be disturbed with " any apprehensions about any part of it, except that,
" which was necessary to be sent to secure our Plan" tations. The rest was to be an useless piece of " pomp, only to consume so much of our stock, but " was not to be furnished so as to be able to do our " neighbours much hurt. All this was so ordered,
" that every thing went on very slowly, that so the " French might have time to practise upon all the " Courts of Europe, in which their chief topic was,
" that it was in vain to rely on England: They had " many good friends there, who would retard all their " resolutions, and so work on the animosities, that " were among the different parties, that instead of " thinking to secure themselves, they were now only
" set on ruining those who had hitherto, with much " zeal and great success, supported the present Go" vernment. The proceedings here made, that this " was easily believed; and that, with some of those " secret arguments, that were employed here, has " proved so effectual, that a great many of the Circles
" and Princes of the Empire incline to a neutrality,
" and has had no small effect on the King of Portu" gal; so well have our delays served to carry on the " designs of France. The Emperor's Minister was " so ill used, that he was often upon the point of " giving all for gone, and of going home; and, tho'
" the King used all possible methods to persuade him
" to stay, yet he was so much discouraged, that he " was often saying, He feared, his giving his Master
" any hopes from hence would be fatal to him. In " conclusion, the sense of the City, and of the whole " Nation, discovered itself so evidently, that it broke " all these men's measures. The greatest part of the " House, who had unhappily relied too much upon " them, began to suspect their conduct; and a fear
" of receiving the most public affronts, that the na" tion ever put upon a House of Commons, forced " them, in conclusion, though not without great " and visible reluctance, to come to resolutions be" coming a Parliament of England, was more owing " to other accidents, than to the honesty of the " Managers. In one respect, some of them were " honest, for they opposed them to the last, even to " the forfeiting their own credit with most of their " part."

" party. One advantage our friends had to let the King see they were not disposed to quarrel with any thing he did, though it was visibly the effect of their Counsels, who designed their ruin. The King had assured both Houses, That he would acquaint them with the whole progress of the negotiation; yet an incident happened of great consequence, in which they carried their designs, without advising, either with Council, or Parliament. The King of Spain, after long deliberation about it, at last, wrote to the King. By the date, and other circumstances, it appeared, that Mr Harley knew, why he moved the House to leave the matter of owning the King of Spain to the King. This was a thing of such consequence, that one would have thought it deserved to be well considered, at home, and to be communicated to our Allies, abroad, before it was done. But so imperious are some men in their advices, that a return was made to the letter, and the secret was trusted to the Court of France, who published it in a very indecent manner, to the surprize of all Europe. Now, I leave it to you to judge, what complaints the other side would have made, if they had discovered such a proceeding in the old Ministry; and, you will soon see, with what advantage they could have fallen on this strange step, so oddly made; yet, so tender they were of the King, and so unwilling to find fault, when his honour was already engaged, that they chose rather to let this go, than to perplex the King's mind, as well as his affairs, with new complaints."

(1) The committing of these Gentlemen is justified by Dr Drake, in his History of the last Parliament, who asserts, "That the Commons had been wanting in their duty to the people, whose Representatives they are, if they had tamely put up such an insult upon their authority, without shewing their resentment, and thereby deterring others from following an example of so dangerous consequence." And he cites a passage from Colonel Algernon Sidney's Discourse of Government, C. 3. § 44. p. 451, 454, upon the point of Petitioning; whence he observes, "It is plain, that the Kentish Petitioners were guilty not only of misbehaviour and ill manners to the House, but of a notorious violation of the rights of the people, in assuming to themselves a power, which belonged to the whole; and therefore the House could not, without breach of trust, pass over uncorrected such usurpations upon the whole Commons, and such affronts upon their Representatives, with whom their authority was lodged."

On the other side, the Kentish Gentlemen were vindicated in a piece, printed in 1701, and reprinted in the third volume of the State Tracts during the reign of King William, and intitled, Jura Populi Anglicani: Or, the subjects right of Petitioning set forth; occasioned by the case of the Kentish Petitioners. With some thoughts on the reasons, which induced those Gentlemen to petition; and of the Commons right of imprisonment. The Author of this piece observes in his preface, "That it was a melancholy reflection to consider how universal a dissatisfaction the management of the House of Commons had this [last] Session caused in the people of England; and that among those, who arraigned their proceedings, there were none, who did not make the treatment of the five Gentlemen, who presented the Kentish petition one article of impeachment against them; and that the most intelligent part of the people had been free in saying, that the punishment of them plainly demonstrated very extraordinary designs, and must be allowed, even by men of candour and sense to give just grounds for all the jealousies and suspicions, that had been entertained." He then observes, "That it was not " to be wondered at, that the imprisonment of the Kentish Petitioners should have the voices of the major part of the House of Commons, when (besides the great inclination discovered by the Speaker) Sir Edward Seymour, Sir Bartholomew Shower, Mr John Howe, Mr Hammond, Mr Harcourt, and others, pressed violently for it. What so many leaders in the party contended earnestly for, could not but have the approbation of those, who voted as constantly with them, as if they thought it both their duty and interest so to do. But, though that was the act of the greater part, it was not of the whole House of Commons. All those worthy and honourable Members, who have always firmly adhered to his Majesty's interest, who have associated for him, who have given perpetual demonstrations of their enmity to France and the abdicated family, and heartily desired to have all those things done, which the Kentish Gentlemen petitioned for, were averse to this, as they were to other fatal proceedings, which yet they had not power to prevent." He then endeavours to shew, that the House of Commons are not Representatives of the whole people of England, and that the House of Lords are no less Representatives of the People of England than they. He observes, that the Tory party had governed the House of Commons the last Session. "If we consider the men, says he, and compare what they have done with the pretended principles of their party, it will hardly seem odder to see Sir Edward Seymour bring in a bill to prevent bribery; or Mr John Howe exclaim against exorbitant grants; or Sir Christopher Musgrave violent either against grants or a standing army; or to find them, who discovered a plain inclination to quiet France in the possession of all the Spanish dominions, quarrel at the treaty of Partition for giving France too much; than to see them assume the name of Tories. Is not Robin Harley a Ringleader in this Tory party? Is not his brother Edward a leading Member? Does not he attend all ordinances, and as constantly every weekday frequent the service of the Church (for his is a Church-party) in St Stephen's Chapel, as he does the Conventicle every Lord's day? Are not the Feys, Winningtons, St Johns, H—y of Weymouth, B—son, Ha—n, R—y, and others of that leaven, Members of this fraternity? It is methinks hard to say how a faction blended with such a number of names noted for their inveteracy to the true Tory principles, can be called a Tory party? Nothing sure, but mere necessity and want of men to serve some great design, could make them, who pretend to be genuine Tories, and consequently must hate a comprehension, and love to keep their party pure and unmixed, herd with a set of men so odious to them. But upon second thoughts the wonder will not seem so great: Whatever difference might formerly have been between them, it will upon a fair examination now appear, that there is a great agreement in their principles, and that those, who keep up their faction by retaining the name of Tories, and running down Whigs, have nothing but the bare name of their party, and are that very thing, which they ran down. This will be very evident to any one, who will but take a short view of what they have done, and compare the loyalty of their behaviour with their loyal principles."

"Formerly the Tory doctrine was, that the King was the breath of our nostrils; that we failed in our allegiance to him, and deserved not the name of loyal subjects, unless we valued his life more than our own, and would do all that lay in our power to preserve Him and his Government, by shewing an inclination to destroy his enemies. Is this the temper and spirit of our present times? Are not Sir Ed-mons, and gave occasion to a piece, supposed to be drawn by Daniel de Foe, intitled, A memorial from the Gentlemen, Freeholders, and Inhabitants of the Counties of—in behalf of themselves and many thousands of the good people of England, and signed Legion. This was sent to the Speaker with a letter, charging and commanding him, in the name of two hundred thousand Englishmen, ward Symour, Sir Christopher Musgrave, and forty more, at this very time Members of the House of Commons, and of this Tory party, who, when the conspiracy against the King was discovered, and an army lay ready to invade us, refused the voluntary Association, which was reckoned the best expedient to preserve the King's life, and prevent the ruin of this Kingdom? Formerly Tories reckoned it an act of duty and loyalty to repose an intire confidence in the King, and to desire, that he might be gratified, as with every thing else, so particularly with such an army as he desired. And in the late Reign, when the army consisted of nineteen thousand men, and the King had no other occasion for them but to terrify and afflict his own subjects, Sir Christopher Musgrave was pleased to say in the House of Commons, It was a deplorable thing, that good old Loyalists, and the men of that party principally, who reduced his present Majesty to the allowance of seven thousand men, and were the cause of all the calamities, that have been occasioned by it? In the reign of King Charles II. when that Gentleman had Grants from the King, it would have seemed no less a prodigy in these Kingdoms, to see a Tory House of Commons offer to intermeddle with the King's Grants, as they have done, and make it an article of impeachment against a great Minister, to take a Grant from the Crown, than to see a Church party, who have told us, that the King is Christ's Vicegerent, and Head of the Church here upon earth, and that he has an uncontrollable right to dispose, as he pleases, of those fees, with which the Crown has endowed the Church, offer to destroy the King's rights, by bringing in a bill to prevent the translation of Bishops from one See to another. This bill designed no great favour to the King or the Hierarchy; yet Sir John Puckington, who brought it into the House, must be thought a Loyalist and true Son of the Church, because he tells Churchmen that he is so. Though it was a bill for the better securing the Protestant Religion, yet there are but few Protestants, I believe, concerned, that it is adjourned (as the necessary methods for securing our Religion are) to another Session of Parliament. If it be the next Session tacked to a money-bill (as the Jacobites say it will be) then we shall see the Protestant Religion as well secured, as some people would have it, who now turn the methods of securing it into jest and ridicule. I could heartily wish there were no other instances but those I have here mentioned, of the ill treatment, which both the Monarchy and Hierarchy have had from this loyal Church-party (as they would fain be reputed) whose practices of late have been the plain reverse of what they formerly professed. Have not they arraigned the King's power in making treaties, which was never disputed in any former reign, no not by those Demagogues in the reign of King Charles I. whose memories and practices they pretend to hate? Have not they pulled down one principal pillar and support of the Monarchy, by creating a distrust between the King and his People, by representing men unfit for the service of the public, and excluding them from having any thing to do in the election of their Representatives, who are in places of trust under the King? Have they not destroyed our very Constitution, and made our Government plainly popular, under their sole management and direction? Is it not a popular Government, and a very intolerable one, where they have usurped the power of the King and the Lords, and broken in upon the rights of the People, by taking the execution and legislation upon themselves, and punishing contrary to law? Have not they assumed the power of the King, both executive and legislative, when they are grown to that exorbitancy of power, that they expect he will do whatever they require of him, though it be to punish some, who have long toiled in the support of his Government, and turn out others from places of public trust, who have appeared with a warm and extraordinary zeal in his aid their country's service; when they take upon them to censure and condemn what he does, though it be profitable to us and our friends, and his undoubted right and prerogative to do it; when, to prevent the mischief and confusion, in which his enemies would involve his Kingdoms, he has been forced to give the Royal assent, where he knew it would not only hurt many of his friends, but a very great number of his good and loyal subjects, and be of very ill consequence to his affairs abroad? Have they not invaded and usurped the power of the Lords, by endeavouring to destroy their jurisdiction, by tying them to new rules and methods in their Jurisdiction, and forcing their assent to laws, by tacking of clauses, and leaving with them, together with the bill, all the ill consequences, that should attend the rejecting it; which is plainly threatening them with the wrath and resentment of the nation, imposed on and incensed by them? Have they not been highly injurious to the People, and invaded their rights, by taking the execution of the laws upon them, which belongs not to their province, and imprisoning such numbers of their Fellow-Commons, as they have done this Session? It must be very extraordinary assurance, that can make a party, which has not only thus arraigned the actions of his Majesty, and been a constant clog upon the wheels of this Government, but has likewise usurped his power, and brought in an arbitrary popular Government, assume the name of Loyalists, and call others turbulent seditious Republicans. If we would judge right between the two contending parties, we must consider their actions, and not the names and characters they themselves assume or give one to another. If it be evident, that the Tories have been highly prejudiced against his Majesty's Government; if they have usurped upon the Crown, and deprived it of many of its just rights; and the Whigs have borne a constant affliction to the King, and endeavoured to continue him in possession of all his rights and prerogatives: If, in settling the Succession in the Protestant line, Tories have not only discovered a perfect aversion to the act, and used artifices to elude it, but likewise framed that new bill of rights which was not contrived to recommend the Crown, and make it aimable to the Successors; and the Whigs, on the other hand shewed themselves both eager to have the Crown settled, and unwilling to have such a breach made in the prerogative; then it will be evident, that the Whig loyalty is greater than the Tories; or that the object, they have placed it upon, makes it more agreeable to us, and apter to promote our happiness and tranquillity. If Tories be of those loyal principles they boast of, and the object be the abdicated family; if it be this loyalty of their principles, and the regard they have to the interest of that family, that has made them uneasy to the King, and downright Republicans under his Government, true Englishmen will find but little reason, as things now stand, to admire their principles, or run into their party. The case in short is thus: To this loyal Tory party (as they would be called) men who have been imbibed in the late reigns make them firmly ad-

The memorial began with a preamble upon this maxim, That whatever power is above law, is burdensome and tyrannical, and may be reduced by extrajudicial methods. Then it charged the House with illegal and unwarrantable practices in fifteen particulars, of which the three first were as follow: "I. To raise funds for money, and declare, by borrowing clauses, that whosoever advances money on those funds, shall be reimbursed out of the next aids, if the funds shall fall short; and then give subsequent funds, without transferring the deficiency of the former, is a horrible cheat on the subjects, who lent the money, a breach of public faith, and destructive to the honour and credit of Parliaments. II. To imprison men, who are not of your own Members, by no proceedings but a vote of your own House, and to continue them in

"custody fine die, is illegal, a notorious breach of the liberty of the people, setting up a dispensing power in the House of Commons, which your fathers never pretended to, bidding defiance to the Habeas Corpus act, which is the bulwark of personal liberty; destructive of the laws; and betraying the trust reposed in you; the King being at the same time obliged to ask you leave to continue in custody the horrid Assassins of his Person. III. Committing to custody those Gentlemen, who, at the command of the People (whose Servants you are) came in a peaceable way to put you in mind of your duty, is illegal and injurious: destructive of the subjects liberty of petitioning for redress of grievances, which has by all Parliaments before you been acknowledged to be their undoubted right." After enumerating twelve other particulars (2), the memorial proceeds to a claim of right under seven

"here to the interest of King James. Here we find all those in a manner, who were against the abdication, and recognition, who would not allow his present Majesty to be rightful King, and refused to enter into the Association to preserve Him and his Government. In this party are all those likewise, whom either the love of money, or of the St. Germain family, or popery, has reconciled to the French interest. It is most certain, that there is not a man in the House engaged in any of these interests, who is not one of this party; and as certain it is, that all the Papists, friends of King James and the French King, without doors, applaud their proceedings, and own, that they are fairly represented by them. From this account then it will appear, that the parties are truly and properly to be distinguished into those, who are for the Jacobite or French interest (for it is impossible to separate them) and those who are for our present settlement, or the true interest of England."

The Author having made these remarks in his preface, begins his discourse with observing, that England has most reason of all other Countries, to be apprehensive of the growing power of France, when we consider our situation, the affairs of commerce and religion, and the interest not only of the abdicated family, but of their great Protector likewise, among us: That these apprehensions were the ground of the discontents and resentments expressed by the People against their Representatives in the House of Commons, from a suspicion of a much greater inclination in that House to continue than to destroy the union of power by the settlement of France and Spain in one family, and that they gave occasion to the Kentish Petition; the Prefaters of which being imprisoned by the House of Commons, he inquires into these three points: I. What power that House has to imprison: II. The Subjects right of Petitioning: III. What reason the Gentlemen, Justices of the Peace, and Grand Jury of the county of Kent had to offer that Petition, when they did. With regard to the first point, he observes, that the Representatives of the people have no power above law; that the liberty of the people is taken care of by both common and statute law; the former abhorring imprisonment, and never allowing it, unless when men have been guilty of force, and rendered themselves enemies to the community; and the latter having frequently enjoined, that it shall not be inflicted, unless by indictment, or such due process as the law requires. He affirms, that the power assumed by the House of Commons was an invasion of the legal rights of the people; and that the power of that House to imprison extends only to their own Members. As to the second point, he shews, that the subjects right of Petitioning is agreeable to nature, and confirmed by the statute law of the land, and justified by the votes of the House of Commons in 1680. With regard to the last point, he observes, that the reasons, which the Kentish Gentlemen had to petition, were the increasing greatness of France, and the breaches which had been made in the Protestant Religion, since the beginning of the last age, with just suspicions, that French gold had an influence on the management of public affairs.

(1) The letter was as follows:

Mr. Speaker,

"The inclosed memorial you are charged with, in behalf of many thousands of the good people of England. There is neither Popish, Jacobite, Seditious, Court or Party-Interest concerned in it; but honesty and truth. You are commanded by two hundred thousand Englishmen, to deliver it to the House of Commons, and to inform them that it is no banter, but serious truth; and a serious regard to it is expected; nothing but justice and their duty is required, and it is required by them, who have both a right to require, and power to compel, viz. the people of England.

We could have come to the House strong enough to oblige them to hear us, but we have avoided any tumult, not desiring to embroil, but to save our native country. If you refuse to communicate it to them, you will find cause in a short time to repent it."

(2) These were:

"VI. Prosecuting the crime of bribery in some to serve a party, and then proceed no further, though proof lay before you, is partial and unjust, and a scandal upon the honour of Parliaments.

"VII. Voting the treaty of Partition fatal to Europe, because it gave so much of the Spanish Dominions to the French, and not concern yourselves to prevent their taking possession of it all. Deserting the Dutch, when the French are at their doors, till it be almost too late to help them, is unjust to our Treaties, and unkind to our Confederates, dishonourable to the English nation, and shews you very negligent of the safety of England, and of our Protestant neighbours.

"VIII. Ordering immediate hearings to trifling petitions, to please parties in elections; and postpone the petition of a widow, for the blood of her murdered daughter, without giving it a reading, is an illegal delay of justice, dishonourable to the public justice of the nation.

seven heads, of which the three former run thus :

" We do hereby claim and declare, I. That it is the undoubted right of the people of England, in case their Representatives in Parliament do not proceed according to their duty and the people's interest, to inform them of their dislike, disown their actions, and to direct them to such things, as they think fit, either by petition, address, proposal, memorial, or any other peaceable way. II. That the House of Commons separately, and otherwise than by bill legally passed into an act, have no legal power to suspend or dispense with the laws of the land, any more than the King has by his prerogative. III. That the House of Commons have no legal power to imprison any person, or commit him to custody of Serjeants, or otherwise (their own Members excepted) but ought to address the King to cause any person, on good ground, to be apprehended ; which person, so apprehended, ought to have the benefit of the Habeas Corpus Act, and be fairly brought to a trial by due course of law." After other claims (1) it concludes, " Thus, Gentlemen, you have your duty laid before you, which it is hoped you will think of. But if you continue to neglect it, you may expect to be treated according to the resentments of an injured nation ; for Englishmen are no more to be slaves to Parliaments than to Kings. Our name is Legion, and we are many."

The Commons were extremely incensed at this memorial, but could not descend to a particular censure of it. It was thought sufficient, that a complaint was made to the House, of endeavours to raise tumults and seditions, in order to disturb the public affairs ; and a Committee was appointed to draw up an address to be presented to his Majesty, humbly to lay before him the endeavours of several ill disposed persons, to raise tumults and seditions in the Kingdom, and humbly beseech him, that he would provide for the public peace and security.

But the Kentish Gentlemen, who lay in prison till the prorogation of the Parliament, were much visited and treated as Confessors ; for a design had been laid to get addresses of the same nature with theirs from all parts of England, and especially from the city of London. The Ministers represented to the King, what an indignity this would be to the House of Commons ; and that, if he did not discourage it, he might look for unacceptable things from them ; and that it might rather discourage than give heart to his Allies, if they should see such a disappointing, and both City and Country in an opposition to the House of Commons. Some went in his Majesty's name to the eminent men of the City, to divert it ; yet with all this it came so near, for such an address in a Common Council, that the Lord Mayor's vote turned it for the negative.

As, by these proceedings, a disposition to a war,

" IX. Addressing the King to displace his friends upon bare surmises, before the legal trial or article proved, is illegal, and inverting the law, and making execution go before judgment, contrary to the true sense of the law, which esteems every man a good man, till something appears to the contrary.

" X. Delaying proceedings upon capital impeachments, to blast the reputation of the persons, without proving the fact, is illegal and oppressive, destructive to the liberty of Englishmen, a delay of justice, and a reproach of Parliaments.

" XI. Suffering saucy and indecent reproaches upon his Majesty's person to be publicly made in your house, particularly that impudent scandal of Parliaments, J—n H—w, without shewing such resentments as you ought to do, the said J—n H—w saying openly, That his Majesty had made a seditious treaty to rob his neighbours ; insinuating, That the Partition-treaty (which was every way as just as blowing up one man's house to save another's) was a combination of the King to rob the Crown of Spain of its due. This is making a Billinggate of the House, and setting up to bully your Sovereign, contrary to the intent and meaning of the freedom of speech, which you claim as a right, is scandalous to Parliaments, undutiful and unmannerly, and a reproach to the whole Nation.

" XII. Your S—r exacting the exorbitant rate of 10*l. per diem* for the V—s, and giving the Printer encouragement to raise it on the People, by selling them at 4*d. per sheet*, is an illegal and arbitrary exaction, dishonourable to the House, and burthensome to the People.

" XIII. Neglecting to pay the Nation's debts, compounding for interest, and postponing petitions, is illegal, dishonourable, and destructive of the public faith.

" XIV. Publick neglecting the great work of Reformation of Manners, though often pressed to it by the King, to the great dishonour of God, and encouragement of vice, is a neglect of your duty, and an abuse of the trust reposed in you by God, his Majesty, and the People.

" XV. Being scandalously vicious yourselves, both in your minds and religion, lewd in life, and erroneous in doctrine, having public Blasphemers, and impudent Deniers of our Saviour's Divinity among you, and suffering them unproved and unpunished, to the infinite regret of all good Christians, and the just abhorrence of the whole Nation."

(1) A fourth claim was : " That if the House of Commons, in breach of the laws and liberties of the People, do betray the trust reposed in them, and act negligently, or arbitrarily, and illegally, it is the undoubted right of the People of England to call them to an account for the same, and by convention, assembly, or force, may proceed against them, as Traytors and Betrayers of their Country." Then they demanded in the name of themselves and all the People of England :

" 1. That all the public just debts of the Nation be forthwith paid and discharged.

" 2. That all persons illegally imprisoned, as aforesaid, be either immediately discharged, or admitted to bail, as by law they ought to be ; and the liberty of the subject recognized and restored.

" 3. That J—n H—w aforesaid be obliged to ask his Majesty pardon for his vile reflections, or be immediately expelled the House.

" 4. That the growing power of France be taken into consideration, the succession of the Emperor to the Crown of Spain supported, our Protestant neighbours protected, as the true interest of England and the Protestant religion require.

" 5. That the French King be obliged to quit Flanders, or that his Majesty be addressed to declare war against him.

" 6. That suitable supplies be granted to his Majesty for the putting all those necessary things in execution, and that care be taken that such taxes as are raised be more equally assessed and collected, and scandalous deficiencies prevented.

" 7. That the thanks of the House may be given to those Gentlemen, who so gallantly appeared in the behalf of their country with the Kentish petition, and have been so scandalously used for it."

(1) The

1701. war, and to a more hearty concurrence with the King, appeared to be the general sense of the Nation, it had a great effect on the House of Commons, and drew from them the address before-mentioned *. Whereby they desired the King to enter into such alliances with the Emperor and other States, as were necessary for the support of us and our Allies, and to bring down the exorbitant power of France. It is true, this was opposed with great zeal by those, who were looked upon as the chief conductors of the Jacobite party; but many, who had in other things gone along with them, thought this was the only means left to recover their credit with the People; for the current ran so strong for a war, that those who struggled against it, were considered as little better than public enemies. The Commons also were from hence induced to settle good funds for a million and half. Indeed, one of these funds was very unacceptable to the King; it was observed, that the allotment for the civil list did far exceed the sum that was designed, which was only 600,000*l.* and that, as King James's Queen would not take her jointure, so, by the Duke of Gloucester's death, the charge on it was now less than when it was granted; so they took 3700*l.* a week out of the excise, and, upon an assignation made of that for some years, a great sum was raised: This was very ungrateful to the Court, and the new Ministers found it no easy thing to maintain, at the same time, their interest with the King and their Party.

An act explaining privilege.

There was also a very good act passed this Session concerning the Privilege of Parliament. Peers had, by law, a custom and privilege for themselves and their servants, during the Session, and at least twenty days before and after. Of late they had reckoned forty days before and after, in which neither they nor their servants could be sued in any Court, unless for treason, felony, or breach of the peace. The House of Commons had also possessed themselves of the same privilege, but with this difference, that the Lords pretended theirs was a right, not subject to the order of the House of Lords; whereas the Commons held, that their privilege was subject to the authority of their House. Of late years Sessions were long, and continued by intermediate prorogations, so that the whole year round was a time of privilege. This made a great obstruction in the course of justice, and none who were so protected could be sued for debt. The abuse was carried farther by the protections which some Lords gave, or rather sold to persons who were no way concerned in their affairs; but, when they needed this shelter, they had a pretended office given them, that was a bar to all arrests. After many fruitless attempts to regulate these abuses, a bill was brought into the House of Commons, that took away all Privilege against legal prosecutions in intermediate prorogations, and did so regulate it during the sitting of Parliament, that an effectual remedy was provided for a grievance, that had been long and much complained of. These were the only popular things that were done by this Parliament, the rest of their proceedings shewed both the madness and fury of parties.

The misunderstanding between the two Houses was so great, that there was hardly any public bill passed without amendments and conferences. The last contest was about a bill sent up by the Commons, for appointing Commissioners to examine and state the public accounts. To this bill the Lords having made some amendments, the Commons refused to consent to them, insinuating in their reasons, that there had been immense sums of the public money imbezelled by those that had the management of it. "Many millions (say they) have been given to his Majesty by the Commons, for the service of the public, which remain yet unaccounted for (1)." To interrupt these disputes, the King, without taking any notice of them, thought proper to put an end to the Session of Parliament

The Parliament is prorogued.

(1) The proceedings of the House of Commons in this bill are vindicated by Dr. Drake, in his History of the last Parliament began at Westminster the 10th day of February 1701. But on the other side were published, Some Remarks on that Bill, and on the Proceedings thereon in both Houses, printed in 1701, and inserted in the third Volume of the State Tracts during the Reign of King William. The Writer of these Remarks first considers the six several Acts for constituting such Commissioners since the Revolution, and what had been done by them; and then shews, how it was managed to lay the loss of the last bill upon the House of Lords, and the reasons why the Lords might not be willing to agree to that bill; and signifies the several amendments which they made in it. He observes likewise, that the Lords might determine upon the characters of the Commissioners named by the Commons, as well as upon their business. "Suppose then," says he, that one was known to have no estate to subsist on, and therefore could not afford to serve for nothing: Another to be too fond of his practice, to sacrifice it all to the public without a prospect of advantage: Another to have too much value for his wit, to venture the dulling the edge of it upon hard and crabbed accounts. Suppose that some Lords knew the story of a certain Gentleman's getting, by great solicitation, a pretended security of 10,000*l.* from his friend, when there was not six pence due to him, nor he worth 100*l.* in the world, in order by that deceit to procure himself a wife.

"Suppose that other Lords might think it ominous to see a new bill of accounts with a certain Gentleman's name in it, and presently apprehend another assassinating year; and remember, who refused to act in the former Commission, after Charnock's conspiracy was discovered, and subscribing the association made necessary to qualify him for acting. Suppose it to be known, that none of these Commissioners were eminent for skill in accounts; might not these, or other better reasons, move the Lords to dislike the bill for the sake of the Commissioners?" The Author remarks likewise, that the Commissioners appointed in 1700 had stated the whole expence of the late war to amount to forty one millions; in which, says he, they sufficiently exposed one of the Commissioners named in that part of the bill, which was disagreed to by the Lords; Dr. Davenant, who had before in print pretended, that, upon a nice calculation, the expence amounted to upwards of sixty millions. A mistake of nineteen millions is no small one, if men are so charitable to call it a mistake. But, whether this was his ignorance, or his ill meaning, either of them was a good ground for the Lords not to agree to such a man's being intrusted as a Commissioner to take this account again. He afterwards takes notice, that all that part of the bill which related to the Commissioners for stating the debts of the army, navy, and transport-ships, which was indeed the whole act that passed the preceding year, was passed by the Lords without alteration; and therefore, if any public or private inconvenience should arise by the not continuing 1701. Parliament on the 24th of June, when he made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

*The King's speech.
P. H. C.
III. 183.*

“THE Session being now come to a conclusion, I must return you my hearty thanks for the great zeal you have expressed for the public service, and your ready compliance with those things, which I recommended to you at the opening of this Parliament. And I must thank you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, in particular, both for your dispatch of those necessary supplies, which you have granted for the public occasions, and for the encouragements you have given me to enter into Alliances for the preservation of the liberty of Europe, and the support of the Confederacy; in which, as it shall be my care, not to put the nation to any unnecessary expence; so I make no doubt, that whatsoever shall be done during your recess, for the advantage of the common cause in this matter, will have your approbation at our meeting again in the winter.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

“I shall conclude with recommending to you all the discharge of your duties in your respective counties, that the peace of the Kingdom may be secured by your vigilance and care in your several stations.”

Then the Lord-Keeper, by his Majesty's command, prorogued the Parliament to Thursday the 7th of August.

Thus ended the Session of Parliament, which had the worst aspect of any that had fate during this reign. The new Ministers pressed the King to turn out some of the Whigs who were in employments, the Lord Haversham in particular, who was in the Admiralty: But the King could not be prevailed with to do any thing; yet he kept himself so much on the reserve, that, when he went out of England, it was not certainly known, whether he intended to dissolve the Parliament or not. The state of the King's health very ill conspired with his uneasiness at the opposition to his measures at home, and his concern for the success of his negotiations abroad. He was thought to conceal his ill opinion of his own decaying constitution, even from his most favoured confidants, to prevent its taking air, which would have been fatal in the forming the intended Confederacy, the Princes entirely depending on his wisdom, courage, and zeal for the common cause. To provide against accidents, he gave the command of the troops that were ordered to Holland (making in all ten thousand men) to the Earl of Marlborough, and appointed him to be Plenipotentiary to the States-General, as knowing him to be equally qualified for council and action. On the 28th of June, the King nominated, to be Justices in his absence, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Nathan Wright Lord-Keeper, the Earl of Pembroke, first Commissioner of the Admiralty, the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Jersey, and the Lord Godolphin. Three days after, the Gentlemen who were imprisoned for delivering the Kentish Petition, being discharged of course at the end of the Session, were splendidly entertained at Mercers-Hall, at the charge of the Citizens, being accompanied by several of the Nobility and Gentlemen of the first rank. They were likewise very honourably received, upon their return into their own country.

This year died suddenly Henry Howard Duke of Norfolk, who had been educated a Papist, but leaving the Church of Rome about the time of the Popish Plot, continued to his death firm to the Church of England, and had been a zealous promoter of the Revolution. His place of Earl-Marshal was conferred on the Earl of Carlisle, during the minority of his nephew, the Lord Thomas Howard's eldest son (who succeeded the Duke in his honour and estate) if at the age of eighteen he should conform to the Church of England.

On Tuesday the first of July, the King embarked at Margate, and on the Thursday following arrived in the Meuse, and went that night to the Hague. The next day he received the compliments of the Ambassadors and other foreign Ministers, and of the Courts of Justice, and Council of Brabant; and in the afternoon went to the Assembly of the States-General, to whom he addressed himself in this manner:

High and Mighty Lords,

“I Always come into this country with joy, but more especially in this dangerous conjuncture.”

“nuing of that law, the blame will in no sort fall upon the Lords, who passed it as it came to them, and returned the bill to the Commons with all possible expedition. It was sent up to the Lords on the 18th, and ordered to be returned to the House of Commons on the 23d of June.” He then represents the unparliamentary proceedings of the Commons upon the Lords amendments. “If, says he, the House of Commons remained unsatisfied with any of the Lords amendments, the known and only Parliamentary method to set such a matter right was by desiring a conference, at which they might offer their reasons to the Lords for disagreeing to their amendments, in order to convince them of the reasonableness of quitting them. To leave this method is to decline all Parliamentary correspondence; for the two Houses, after any difference in opinion, can never be brought to be of a mind (though both should be desirous to agree) unless by conferences. It cannot be denied, but the Commons had time enough to have delivered their reasons to the Lords,

“to incline them to wave their amendments, if they had been pleased to take that natural course. But, instead of desiring a conference, and offering their reasons there, a vote, without a precedent, was made, to print their reasons; which was offering them to the People, instead of offering them to the Lords. Well-meaning men may be puzzled to think what construction ought to be put on this proceeding. The reasons, when printed, might have an effect on people without doors, but could not possibly have any effect towards passing the bill; suppose them to be strong enough to satisfy every individual Lord, that he ought to wave the amendments; yet, for want of their being proposed at a conference, the Lords could not, by the methods of Parliament, desist from the amendments. If it should be said, that some men had less regard to the passing the bill, than to get a point of popularity at that time, it would not be easy to give a solid answer to such a reflection.”

1701. " juncture of affairs, because I foresee my presence will be necessary for the service of the State. I was in hopes, and desired to have passed the rest of my days in repose and peace; and, after the end of my days, to have left this state in a quiet and flourishing condition. To which end I have always laboured, particularly after the conclusion of the last peace. But since there have happened such great alterations in the affairs of Europe, that we know not what will be the disposal of Divine Providence concerning them. Nevertheless I can assure your High Mightinesses, that, whether affairs may be accommodated without coming to further embroilments, or whether we must be obliged to take arms again, I persist in the same affection and the same zeal, which I ever had for the service and prosperity of these provinces; and will contribute, as far as lies in my power, whatever may tend to advance the welfare of this State, the maintenance of their Liberties and Religion, and their particular security, as well as that of Europe. I am overjoyed to find all things still in a quiet condition; which, next to the Blessing of the Almighty, must be ascribed to the speedy and unanimous resolution of your High Mightinesses, to put yourselves in a posture of defence. I am persuaded, that the respective Confederates will contribute strenuously towards it; which I look upon as the only means to prevent a war; or, in case of a rupture, to defend the State from the danger that threatens it. It is a great Satisfaction to me, that I can assure your High Mightinesses, not only of my affection, but of the whole English nation; and that they are ready to assist this State, and strongly to contribute towards their defence, and to whatever may tend to the common security: And this is what your High Mightinesses may be fully convinced of. I hope the great God will bless the means, which you have made use of, either by way of negotiation, or by force of arms, in case of a rupture, to attain the end proposed; that is to say, reasonable security for the common cause, and particularly the preservation of this State in their Liberties and Religion. There is nothing which I wish with more fervency; and I will contribute towards it whatever lies in my power. This is what I thought necessary to say at present; only that I desire the continuance of your High Mightinesses affection and amity."

Answer of the States. Lamb. To this the States-General returned an answer to this effect: " That they thanked his Majesty with all their hearts for the honour he had done them to come again into their Assembly; and at the same time testified their inexpressible joy to see his happy arrival. That they were sensible how much his Majesty's presence was necessary among them, in such a difficult conjuncture, to settle affairs in a good condition, and so to preserve them, with the assistance of God, out of the great confidence which they all had, from the highest to the lowest, in his Majesty's prudence and extraordinary abilities. That they were extremely obliged to his Majesty, and most heartily thanked him for his persevering in his kind inclinations for their repose and tranquility. That they were fully convinced,

No. 31. Vol. III.

" that, since the last treaty of peace, his Majesty's care and application had tended to the preservation of the said peace and the publick tranquillity. That they were overjoyed, that their conduct, since the strange mutations in general affairs, had met with his Majesty's approbation. And in regard the State was in so much danger, that their Religion and Liberties lay at stake, they were resolved to use all possible means for the preservation of those inestimable pledges. That they could not omit to thank his Majesty for his assurances, not only in his own, but in the name of the English Nation, in favour of themselves and the common cause, well knowing, how much they might rely upon a People, whose courage and valour had gained so much reputation in the world. That they were always of opinion, that their interests were inseparable from those of England. In the mean time, they most ardently besought the Almighty to bless his Majesty and his Counsels, and to grant him long life, health, and strength, that he might be able to continue his cares for the publick good and the welfare of his own Kingdoms and their State; assuring him of their perseverance in that amity and high esteem, which they have always had, and ever shall be bound to have of his Majesty, so long as their State endures."

After this, the King went to view the frontier garisons, and, returning to the Hague, found, that Count D'Avaux had delivered a letter from the French King to the States, accompanied with a Memorial of his own, to notify his being recalled home. The letter was as follows:

" Most Dear Great Friends, Allies, and Confederates,

" We have thought fit to recall the Count D'Avaux, our Ambassador Extraordinary to you, seeing the little fruit those Conferences have produced, which you desired of us; and which you have since often interrupted. We are not the less inclined to the establishing of the peace, as he will further declare his intentions to you before his departure. Nothing remains for us but to assure you, that it still depends on you to receive marks of our antient friendship for your Republic, and of our desire to give you proofs thereof upon all occasions. So we pray God, that he may have you, most dear Great Friends, Allies, and Confederates in his holy keeping. Given at Versailles, the 18th of July 1701."

 “ they might persist in demanding for themselves; so that all things seemed to be in a “ fair way towards settling of peace, when the “ proposals made by your High Mightinesses
 “ and the King of England’s Envoy gave occasion to judge, that war rather than peace “ would be the fruit of that strict union, which “ the conformity of proposals denoted between “ that Prince and your High Mightinesses.
 “ They protested, that their excessive demands “ were the effects of a just fear, grounded on “ the King’s power. But if that fear, so lively “ expressed in their letter to the King of “ Great Britain, during the sitting of the Parliament, were real, and that they had no “ other end in representing them than to prevent them, the means of doing it were in “ their own hands; there was no need of making
 “ all those preparations for the greatest war.
 “ That their Lordships had desired the Conferences, and it depended upon them to render “ them useful. But their Lordships had again “ delayed the conclusion of them, by demanding the admission of the King of England’s “ Envoy into the Conferences. Which, if he “ opposed for some time, it was out of his sincere desire to remove all obstacles, which the “ enemies to peace are continually laying in the way. Nor did his Majesty believe their “ Lordships would so easily have insisted upon the pretended satisfaction to be given to the “ Emperor, confounding the interests of other “ Princes with their own, and set themselves up “ for Arbitrators between the Houses of France
 “ and Austria; that so wise a Republic should,
 “ in favour of the House of Austria against “ France, resolve to break these treaties, which “ they had looked upon as the confirmation and “ seal of their Sovereignty; that they should “ engage themselves, at the expence of their “ Provinces, their Countries, and their Wealth, “ to support foreign interests, when, a little before, they had acted quite the contrary, by “ acknowledging the King of Spain.
 “ That his Excellency should abuse his “ Master, should he write to him, that any success was to be expected from the Conferences.
 “ That his Master had too discerning a judgment, after the King of Great Britain’s Envoy had declared, that his Master would never depart from the interest of the Emperor;
 “ that he would not enter into any proposals of accommodation, unless satisfaction were given “ to that Prince; that the ties between their “ Lordships and the King of Great Britain were “ too strict, and had too well made known “ their blind submission to the sentiments of “ that Monarch; and no doubt that they had “ already taken a resolution to make the same “ declaration to the most Christian King’s Ambassador. Indeed they had done it already “ beforehand, by declaring, That the Commissioners should not continue the Conference, without the intervention of the English “ Envoy; so that, if he should exclude himself,
 “ the Conferences were suspended; and therefore it would be to no purpose for the most “ Christian King’s Ambassador, sent only for “ the sake of those Conferences, to continue “ any longer at the Hague; where, if he has “ not the satisfaction to fulfil his Majesty’s intentions in establishing a durable peace between Him and the United-Provinces, yet it “ will be some consolation to him, that he had “ made known his Majesty’s desire to contribute whatever depends on him, to prevent a “ rupture of the publick peace. That he has “ taken arms in the defence of his Grandson “ only; and that, if it had been his design to “ make new conquests, he might have done it,

 “ when his forces, upon the frontiers of their “ Republic, afforded him the means to have “ made his advantage of their weakness. He “ concluded with wishing, that their Lordships, “ convinced by his Majesty’s conduct of the “ sincerity of his intentions, would, while it “ was yet time, take such resolutions, as might “ be conformable to their true interests.”

To this memorial the States-General returned an answer, which was to this effect:

Answer of the States.
 Aug. 1.
 Lamb.

“ That they were obliged to the most Christian King, for sending hither the Count “ d’Avaux as his Ambassador Extraordinary.
 “ They wished, that sufficient means might “ have been found in the Conference, to have “ obtained a general peace, and reasonable security for themselves, and that he had tarried “ till that had been done. They were troubled, that he should be recalled before those “ things were effected; and so much the more,
 “ that the cause of it should be imputed to “ their conduct. That, upon his most Christian Majesty’s signifying to them, that he accepted the will of the late King of Spain instead of the treaty of Partition, they gave “ him their reasons, why they could not come to a speedier resolution in that affair; and, as soon as their constitution would allow it, they “ offered to enter into a Conference with any
 “ that his Majesty should think fit to appoint.
 “ That they appointed Deputies accordingly to treat with the Count d’Avaux, and, in compliance with his Majesty, owned the new “ King of Spain, that they might remove all “ occasions of delays, and give a convincing “ proof of their desire to preserve the grand “ peace. They cannot apprehend, how they “ should obstruct the same by the intervention “ of the King of Great Britain, who was one “ of those concerned in the treaty of Partition;
 “ or by the intervention of any other Potentate, who has an interest in preserving the general peace. That they had not thereby “ owned the justice or injustice of the pretensions of a third party, nor separated their interests from any, who are concerned in the general peace. That, since his Majesty’s Ministers had represented to them, that the end “ of the treaty of Partition might be as well “ attained by the acceptance of the will, they desired the Count d’Avaux might make proposals for the general peace, and their particular security; and, he excusing himself, and “ desiring proposals from them, they had, in concert with his Majesty of Great Britain, delivered him proposals. They cannot comprehend, why the effect of that union betwixt them and the said King should be “ rather

1701. " rather war than peace, since his Majesty of " Great Britain has, on all occasions, given suf" ficient proofs of his inclinations to peace.
 " That they were strictly united with him by " Alliances, many years ago, for their mutual " security. That he was one of the chiefest " parties in the treaty of Partition; and that " they declared, before their proposals were " communicated, that they thought his consent " necessary, as well for those reasons, as for " his private relation to their Republic; and " no objection was then raised against it. They " were sorry to see the King of France had re" turned no answer to their proposals; which,
 " though they had heard to be called excessive,
 " no body had undertaken to prove them such.
 " That the general peace could not be preserved
 " without satisfaction to the Emperor, whose " pretensions were so far owned by the King
 " of France himself in the treaty of Partition,
 " that it was agreed how the same should be sa" tisfied. That therefore there was nothing in " this article of their proposal, that could be " called excessive; and what they had demanded
 " for their own security, was not equal to what " they had before the death of the late King of " Spain, or to what they had acquired by the " treaty of Partition. That their forces were " not grounded alone on their own private sen" timents, but on the opinion of their Allies,
 " who had not scrupled to send them the assis" tance they were obliged to by their Alliances.
 " That, had it been in their power to extricate " themselves out of their difficulties, without " arming, seeking new Alliances, and drown" ing their country, they would certainly have " done it. That the difficulties raised about " admitting the English Envoy was not from " them, but from the Count d'Avaux, and not " chargeable upon them for the reasons before-" mentioned. That the King of France had " reason to think they would insist on satisfac" tion to the Emperor, seeing that was the first
 " of their proposals, which the King of France
 " himself thought just and necessary. That " they had given no cause to think, that they
 " presumed to set up as Umpires betwixt France
 " and Austria, or to determine, which of the " two last Kings of Spain had a right to alter
 " the laws of the Succession to that Crown;
 " but desired his Majesty to remember, that he " himself, as well as the King of Great Brit" tain and the States, thought a war would be " unavoidable, if, upon the death of the late
 " King of Spain, either He or the Emperor
 " should insist upon the pretensions of their fa" milies to the Succession; and therefore they " entered into the treaty of Partition. That " their owning the King of Spain could not be " judged to be a step contrary to this, since it " did not hinder giving reasonable satisfaction
 " to the Emperor: And the King of France
 " ought to be convinced, that they would do " nothing to the detriment of their Provinces,
 " Commerce, or Riches, but what was abso" lutely necessary to their preservation. They " had done nothing, that could be construed a " breach of the treaties, which confirmed and " sealed their Sovereignty, and did not well ap" prehend the meaning of that assertion: Their " Provinces were always free and sovereign:

 " Their Ancestors spent their lives and fortunes
 " to assert their freedom; and they resolved to " do the like. They were sorry to hear, that " the Count d'Avaux expected no success from
 " the Conferences, because of the English En-
 " voy's declaring, that satisfaction must be " given to the Emperor. They owned, that " the King of Great Britain and themselves
 " thought it reasonable to treat of satisfaction
 " to that Prince; and that the Emperor should,
 " in order thereunto, be invited into the nego" tiation. That the States did not blindly fol" low the King of Great Britain's sentiments,
 " but had a great deference for his advice, be" cause they were persuaded, that he was wholly " inclined to preserve peace, and convinced,
 " that he fought nothing but the welfare of " their Republic. That, if the Conferences " were suspended upon that account, they should " look upon it as a great misfortune: But, if " the King of France had thought fit to let " them continue, and to allow satisfaction to " the Emperor, they had hopes of a good " conclusion. That they had been obliged in" deed to arm, but did not begin to do it, till " they saw their barriers in the Spanish Neiber-
 " lands, that cost them so much blood and trea" sure, possessed by French troops, their own " forces detained, and great preparations of " war made there. That their jealousy was be" sides considerably increased by the strict union, " that appeared every day between France and " Spain, though the treaty of Partition was " made for this, among other reasons, to pre" vent jealousies from the union of too many " States. That they had endeavoured, by all " possible means, to preserve friendship; but,
 " if they must contrary to their own inclina" tion, enter into a war, they have no cause to " blame themselves for it, and therefore hoped,
 " that God would protect them."

Thus all the pretensions of the French, to give the States a reasonable security, went off with the Count d'Avaux; who yet was willing to retire without any open breach, and therefore took his leave of the States in very obliging terms, accepted from them the present of a gold chain and medal, and left his Secretary behind, under colour of renewing the negotiations, when he had made a report of them to his Master. But the States understood the artful recels of the Ambassador, and therefore daily augmented their army with the troops arrived from Ireland, and with other auxiliary forces, and, were indefatigably at work on the fortifications of their frontiers.

An Alliance was now formed between the Kings of Great Britain, and Denmark, and the States-General (1). Great pains were likewise taken to mediate a peace between Sweden and Poland.

(1) It was signed at Copenhagen, the 15th of June 1701, and the chief articles were:

7. The King of Great Britain and the States-General promise to pay to the King of Denmark three hundred thousand crowns a year, during the war.

8. The King of Great Britain promises to pay the arrears, due on the Convention in 1689, to the seven thousand Danes.

10. The King of Denmark shall send three thousand horse, one thousand dragoons, and eight thousand foot to Poland. The Court of France, as well as that of Vienna, tried it; both sides hoping, that Sweden, if not Poland, might enter into their interests. The French reckoned, that Denmark and Sweden could never be on the same side; and therefore, when they found they could not gain Denmark, they tried a mediation, hoping to get Sweden into an Alliance with them; but all attempts for a mediation proved unsuccessful. The Diet of Poland was suspended, and their King, being delivered from them, resolved to carry on the war. The Spaniards, and the subjects of their other Dominions, began to feel the insolence of the French very sensibly; but nothing was more uneasy to them than the new regulations which they were endeavouring to bring in, to lessen the expence of the Court of Spain. The Grandeess were little considered, and they saw great designs, for the better conduct of the revenues of the Crown, likely to take place every where, which were very unacceptable to them, who minded nothing so much as to keep up a vast magnificence, at the King's cost. They saw themselves much despised by their new Masters, as there was indeed great cause for it; so that they seemed well disposed to entertain a new Pretender (1).

the assistance of the King of Great Britain and the States-General, immediately after the treaty is signed; and they shall take oath to the King and the States, as the seven thousand did, to the King. The King and the States shall pay levy money, for an horseman eighty crowns, a dragoon sixty, and a foot-man thirty; one half as soon as the troops are marching, and the other, when they are arrived on the frontiers. Their pay shall be the same as that of the States, and be distributed by the Danish Commissaries, to commence from the day of their march.

11. If a regiment or company happen to be ruined, the King and the States are to recruit them, and to restore them to the same condition they were in before; and the recruit money is to be paid to the Danish officers at the end of the campaign.

12. If the King of Denmark should be in any wife attacked, the King of England and the States-General shall send his forces back with speed, giving them one month's pay; and the like sum, when they shall be sent home after the peace; and they shall send the King of Denmark the succours agreed on by the secret article of the treaty in 1690.

13. Succours may be demanded by any of the parties, if he is attacked by force of arms, without his having first used force against the assailant.

14. This Alliance shall continue ten years from the signing thereof, and the Alliances of 1690 and 1696 are renewed by this.

Abstract of some of the secret articles of the treaty.

1. If the succour, which Denmark is to send to the King of England and the States, should not be sufficient, that King promises to send four thousand men more, three months after demand.

2. If Denmark should be attacked, and the succour, mentioned in the secret articles of the treaty of 1690, should not be sufficient, the King of Great Britain and the States promise to assist him with all their forces, as Denmark will in the like case assist them.

5. The King of Great Britain and the States will endeavour, that the Duke of Holstein may conform himself to the treaty of Travendale, and maintain a good friendship with Denmark, while he sends so many troops out of his own dominions.

7. The King of Great Britain and the States are content, that the Emperor shall have two thousand out of the twelve thousand men, which Denmark will make good to them, in six months after the signing of this treaty.

10. In case of a war, his Danish Majesty shall not be obliged to enter into it, but be reputed to have made good his Alliance by sending the succours of sixteen thousand men, and so putting this treaty in execution.

The Earl of Manchester, in a letter from Paris, July 2d 1701, to Secretary Vernon, writes thus concerning this treaty.

"The Danish Envoy here owns the treaty, that we and the States have made with Denmark; tho' I find at the same time, that the disputes between the King of Denmark and the Duke of Holstein are as great as ever. I can assure you, that if this "Court had come up to 150,000 livres more, Denmark would have signed a treaty with them; and it is to be feared, that this Court will still find some means to make that with us ineffectual, either by dealing underhand with Denmark, or else by engaging the King of Sweden not to make peace with Poland, which perhaps is not difficult; and I am told, that overtures of that nature have been already made. I can tell you, that a treaty was lately near agreed on by the Ministers with Poland; but it broke off upon the point of advancing a considerable sum of money, which here they deferred doing, in hopes that the treaty would not be necessary; and now it is believed, that the King of Poland will engage with the Emperor."

(1) Monsieur Schenberg, in a letter to the Earl of Manchester from Madrid, July 14th 1701, writes as follows:

"It is not to be conceived how great a horror the Spaniards entertain of a foreign Government, which threatens them very nearly, and holds them already, as one may say, by the neck. The murmurs and discontents are universal: every body grows impatient; the Court as well as the City, the Clergy, the Nobility, and the third Estate. In a word, all the States and Kingdoms of this Monarchy sigh after liberty. Yet no body dares to stir, fearing to be sooner overwhelmed than succoured. Among all the Spaniards, the Cardinal Portocarrero and his cabal are perhaps the only persons, that attach themselves desperately to the French party; and it looks as if those Gentlemen had made a vow to sacrifice Spain to it, and to engage all Europe in their fall."

The same Gentleman, in another letter to the Earl from Madrid on the 28th of July 1701, has this passage: "There is so general a want of money here, that they find it very difficult even to find any for the most common necessities. This makes them fear, that they shall not find enough for the expence of the King's journey towards Aragon and Catalonia. They have asked the Clergy for a free gift, and advance from the farmers and comptrollers of the Royal rents; but the one and the other cry out mercy. In a word, scarcity and misery reign universally; and the will of the late King Charles the Second of happy memory will cost France dear; for, unless they open their coffers to repair the horrible emptiness of the Spanish finances, this Court cannot support itself, and the least war will overwhelm it. The murmurs, which are caused by so universal a decay, go so far, that they have thought it necessary to inspire the Spaniards with fear, by putting some strangers in prison, who are said to have talked too freely. The Duke of Arco, one of the first Grandeess of Castile, has himself put into the King's hands a representation, by which he makes excuses, that he cannot equal himself to the Dukes and Peers of France. The young Courtiers dress themselves in the French fashion to please the King, who has shewn, that he desires it."

1701. and, when the reinforcements and artillery came up to him, he made a feint of passing the Po near Ferrara; and, having thus amused the French, he passed the Adige near Carpi (1), where a body of five thousand French lay, whom he routed, and obliged the French to retire to the Mincio. He followed them, and passed that river in their fight, without any opposition (2). The French army was commanded by the Duke of Savoy, with whom were Marshal Catinat and the Prince of Vaudemont, Governor of Milan. These differed in opinion; the Duke of Savoy was for fighting; Catinat and Prince Vaudemont against it. But Marshal Villeroy was sent thither with orders to fight (3). Catinat, who was the best General the French had left, looking on this as a disgrace, retired and languished for some time; yet he recovered. There were many small engagements of parties sent out on both sides, in which the Germans had always the advantage. Yet this did not discourage Villeroy from venturing to attack them in their camp at Chiari; but they were so well intrenched, and defended themselves with so much resolution, that the French were forced to draw off with great loss; about five thousand of them being killed, whereas the loss of the Germans was inconsiderable. Sickness likewise broke in upon the French, so that their army was much diminished; and after this they were not in a condition to undertake any thing. Prince Eugene lay for some time in his camp at Chiari, sending out parties as far as the Adda, who, meeting often with parties of the French, had always the advantage, killing some, and taking many prisoners. For many months that Prince had no place of defence to retire to; his camp was all; so that a blow given him there must have ruined his whole army. Towards the end of the campaign he possessed himself of all the Mantuan territories, except Mantua and Gaisi. He blocked them both up; and, when the season obliged the French to go into quarters, he took all the places on the Oglio, and continued in motion the whole winter following. The French had no other enemy to contend with, and therefore poured in their whole force upon him. He was then but a young man, and had little assistance from those about him, and none at all, during the summer, from the Princes and States of Italy. For the Pope and Venetians pretended to maintain a neutrality, though, upon many occasions, the Pope shewed a great partiality to the French. The people indeed favoured the Prince, so that he had good and seasonable intelligence brought him of all the motions of the French; and in his whole conduct, he shewed both a depth of contrivance, and "those of all the livery-men, are come out of France; and that livery is the same with that of the House of Bourbon; so that the livery of the ancient Kings of Bourbon is banished."

(1) The Earl of Manchester in a letter to Mr. Blatwuyt from Paris, July 18, 1701, writes thus:

"We have an account here by an officer, who arrived out of Italy on the 16th, that there had passed a considerable action between the Imperialists and the French at Carpi, where Monsieur de St. Fremont was posted with four regiments of dragoons, a regiment of horse, a battalion or two of foot, and some pieces of cannon. Prince Eugene having amused the French by passing some troops over the Po, they little expected to have heard of him in this place; but he has acted, as they all agree, very much like a General. The canal Blanco was between them. He made a shew, as if he would pass; several of his men went into the canal, to try if it was fordable: There they continued firing at the French. Whilst this was doing, he made two bridges at a good distance from his troops above and below. When this was done, he withdrew his troops, as if all was over; but soon after he marched a considerable body of troops over both places with cannon, &c. and then fell on Monsieur de Fremont, and intirely defeated his troops, making himself master of the post of Carpi, the baggage, the cannon, &c. The Chevalier d'Albret, son of the Duke de Chevreuse, and Colonel of dragoons, as also Monsieur de Charbon, a person of distinction, are killed: Monsieur d'Elrades is dangerously wounded, twenty-five other officers are killed, and the rest fled for it. Prince Eugene was there in person, and received a slight wound. They say here, that he was posted at Carpi upon the Adige, when the express came away, with fifteen thousand men; and there is no doubt but his whole army has joined him; so that there is nothing between him and Monsieur de Catinat, who is posted at St. Pietro near Legnago, and they are seven miles distant from each other. Monsieur de Catinat has ordered all his troops to join him from Rivoli, &c. They are very uneasy at Verfailles, it being thought, that Prince Eugene will attack the French army, which has no way of avoiding a battle, but by retiring over the Mincio. It is not known what loss the Germans had."

Numb. 31. Vol. III.

(2) The Earl of Manchester in a letter to Secretary Vernon from Paris, August 10, 1701, has this passage.

"I believe the account of Prince Eugene's march will very much surprisè you, as it does most people here. On Monday last arrived here a Courier from Prince Vaudemont. The letters are of the 3d. On the 28th past, six hundred German horse marched over the Mincio at St. Lionne between Peschiere and Borghetto, where the French were posted. Monsieur de Catinat would not believe, that they intended to pass there; but, Prince Eugene having made his bridge for the foot, and the river being fordable in many places, ten thousand horse passed, and the next day the whole army, and they continued their march to Desenzano. Upon this, M. de Catinat held a Council of war on horseback, to resolve, whether they should advance, and give battle; but they were soon informed, that Prince Eugene was no longer there, and that he was gone towards Brescia; and, having got two days march before them, the Prince of Vaudemont and Count Tesse, with most of the horse and dragoons, made all the haste they could, and were come to Pizzighitone in the Cremonese upon the Adda. The Duke of Savoy and M. de Catinat, with the rest of the army, had passed Caneto upon the Oglio, and were expected that night at Cremona. It was thought, that their intention was to get, if possible, to the Adda, to cover the Milanese; Prince Eugene was passed the Oglio, and it is believed he would soon be at Canonica upon the Adda. The Duke of Savoy was, as soon as he came to the army, of opinion to pass the Mincio, and give battle, but that was not agreed to."

(3) He arrived in the French army in Italy on the 22d of August; and, as the Earl of Manchester observes in a letter to Mr. Blatwuyt, on the 26th of that month, held a Council of war, "and there declared, that he had orders to march directly to the enemy, and give them battle. He made bridges over the Oglio near Urago, and on the 28th at night the whole army was in march, consisting of ninety-two squadrons and sixty-nine battalions; the rest of the troops having been ordered to Cano, Cremona, &c."

and an exactness in execution, with all the courage, but without any of the rashness of youth.

His attempt in January following upon Cremona had almost proved a decisive one. Marshall Villeroi lay there with fix or seven thousand men, and commanded a bridge on the Po. Prince Eugene had passed that river with a part of his army : The Princess of Mirandola drove out the French, and recovered a garison from them. The Duke of Modena put his country into his hands, and gave him Berfello, the strongest place of his Dominions. The Duke of Parma pretended, that he was the Pope's vassal, and so put himself under the protection of his Holiness. Prince Eugene would not provoke the Pope too much, and therefore only marched through the Parmesan. Here he laid the design of surprizing Cremona with so much secrecy, that the French had not the least suspicion of it. The Prince put himself at the head of a body, that he brought from the Oglio, and ordered another to come from the Parmesan at the same time to force the bridge. He marched with all secrecy to Cremona ; and, at the same time, thro' the ruins of an old aqueduct, he sent in some men, who got through, and forced one of the gates ; so that he was within the town before Marshall Villeroi had an apprehension of an enemy being near him. He wakened on a sudden with the noise, got out into the street, and there he was taken prisoner. But the other body did not come up exactly at the time appointed ; by which means an Irish regiment secured the bridge ; and thus the design, that was so well contrived, and so happily executed in one part, failed. Prince Eugene had but four thousand men with him, so that, since the other body could not join him, he was forced to march back ; which he did without any considerable loss, carrying Marshall Villeroi and some other prisoners with him. In this attempt, though he had not an intire success, yet he gained all the glory, to which the ambition of a military man could aspire, so that he was looked upon as the greatest and happiest General of the Age. He went on enlarging his quarters, securing all his posts, and straitening the blockade of Mantua, and was in perpetual motion during the whole winter. The French were struck with this ill success. More troops were sent into Italy, and the Duke of Vendome went to command the armies there.

King Philip at Barcelona.

The Duke of Savoy was pressed to send his forces thither ; but he grew cold and backward. He had now gained all that he could promise himself from France. His second daughter was married to King Philip, and was sent to him to Barcelona, where he met her. That King fell into an ill habit of body, and had some returns of a feverish distemper. He had also great disputes with the States of Catalonia, who, before they would grant him the tax, that was asked of them, proposed, that all their privileges should be confirmed to them. This took up some time, and occasioned many disputes. All was settled at last ; but their grant was short of what was expected, and did not defray the charges of the King's stay in the place. A great disposition to revolt appeared in the Kingdom of Naples, and it broke out into some feeble attempts, that were soon muffled, and the leaders of them taken and executed, who justified themselves by this apology, that, till the Pope granted the investiture, they could not be bound to obey the new King. The Duke of Modena was a fervent Governor, both on his Master's account and on his own: Some of the Austrian party made their escape to Rome and Verona. They represented to the Emperor, that the disposition of the Country was such in his favour, that a small force of ten thousand men would certainly put that Kingdom wholly into his hands. Orders were therefore sent to Prince Eugene to send a detachment into the Kingdom of Naples; but, though he believed a small force would soon reduce that Kingdom, yet he judged that such a diminution of his own strength, when the French were sending so many troops into the Milanese, would so expose him, that it would not be possible to maintain a defensive war with such unequal force. Yet repeated orders came to him to the same effect; but in opposition to those he made such representations, that at last it was left to himself to do what he found safest and most for the Emperor's service. Upon this the matter was laid aside, and it soon appeared, that he had judged better than the Court of Vienna; but this was, by his enemies, imputed to humour and obsequy, so that, for some time after that, he was neither considered nor supported, as his great services had deserved. This might arise from envy and malice, which are the ordinary growth of all Courts, especially of feeble ones; or it might be the practice of the French, who had corrupted most Courts, and that of Vienna in particular, since nothing could more advance their ends, than to alienate the Emperor from Prince Eugene; which might so far disgust him, as to make him more remiss in his service.

In the North, the war went on still. The King of Sweden passed the Duna, and fell upon an army of the Saxons, that lay on the other side over against Riga, and routed them so entirely, that he became master of their camp and artillery. From thence he marched into Courland, where no resistance was made. Mitau, the chief town, submitted to him. The King of Poland drew his army into Liubuania, which was much divided between the Sopbia's and Oginski's; so that all those parts were falling into great confusion. The Court of Vienna pretended, that they had made a great discovery of a conspiracy in Hungary. It is certain, the Germans acted the Master very severely in that Kingdom, so that all places were full of complaints; and the Emperor was so besieged by the authors of those oppressions, and the proceedings were so summary upon very slight grounds, that it was not to be wondered, if the Hungarians were disposed to shake off the yoke, when a proper opportunity should offer itself; and it is not to be doubted, but the French had Agents among them by the way of Poland, as well as of Turkey, so the Emperor might have work enough at home.

gained to the French interest, but resolved not 1701. to declare himself, till his brother thought fit likewise to do it. All the progress, that the French made with the two brothers this summer was, that they declared for a neutrality, and against a war with France. The Dukes of Wolfenbüttele and Saxe-Gotha were also engaged in the same design. They made great levies of troops beyond what they themselves could pay, for which it was visible, that they were supplied from France. By this means there was a formidable appearance of great distractions in the Empire. An Alliance was also projected by France with the King of Portugal. His Ministers were in the French interest, but he himself inclined to the Austrian family. He for some time affected retirement, and avoiding the giving audience to foreign Ministers. But, as he saw no good prospect from England, and being pressed to an Alliance with France, his Ministers obtained leave from him to propose one, on terms of such advantage to him, that it was not expected they would be granted, and so it was hoped this would run into a long negotiation. But the French were as liberal in making large promises, as they were perfidious in not performing them; for the French King agreed to all that was proposed, and signed a treaty pursuant to it, and published it to the world (1). Yet the King of Portugal denied, that he had consented to any such project; and he was prevailed upon with such difficulty to sign the treaty, that, when it was brought to him, he threw it down, and kicked it about the room. At last however he consented; but it was generally thought, that, when he should see a good fleet come from the Allies, he would oblige this treaty with the French, as they have done their treaties with all the rest of the world.

During the course of these things, King William applied himself to the perfecting the Alliances, which he was negotiating abroad, and particularly that between the Emperor, England, and Holland, which was concluded at the Hague on the 7th of September (2). This treaty was framed in the nature of proposals, upon which France might come in; and accordingly the same were communicated to the Spanish Ambassador; otherwise it was agreed to have satisfaction given to the House of Austria, in relation to the Spanish Succession, to recover Flanders out of the hands of the French; and that the English and Dutch should keep whatever they should conquer in the West-Indies. This last article, so advantageous to England, was owing to the advice, which the Lord Sommers had formerly given to the King, when the Partition-treaty was in agitation.

But to return to the affairs at home. In Ireland, the Trustees for the Irish forfeitures went on to hear the claims of the Irish, and in many cases they gave judgment in their favour. But now it began to appear, that, whereas it had been given out, that the sale of the confiscated estates would amount to a million and a half, it

(1) The Earl of Manchester in a letter to Secretary Vernon from Paris, of the 13th of July 1701, writes thus:

"I have just now received a letter of the 21st past, from Mr. Methuen. The treaty betwixt France and Portugal was signed the 18th, and the next day he had an audience of the King, and a conference with the Secretary of State; but he could not get them to own, whether it was so or no. All they declared was, that they had done nothing to prejudice the treaty between England and that Crown. I was in hopes to get a sight of this treaty, but there is no copy come; only the original, for this King. There is some mystery still in that matter; but, since it is printed in the French Gazette as a league offensive and defensive, Portugal should be made to explain that matter." And Mr. Methuen, in a letter to the Earl of Manchester from Lisbon of the 27th of September 1701, has the following passage: "The 19th instant arrived here in Cascaes road his Majesty's ship the Lynn, dispatched to me by Sir George Rooke, with instructions from his Majesty; upon the receipt of which, I presently demanded an audience of the King of Portugal, and it was appointed me the next morning at ten of the clock. I was almost two hours with the King, during which time having said every thing to him, that I thought likely to make him sensible of his past errors and true interest, I concluded with acquainting him, that, it being absolutely necessary for the King my Master to be fully informed concerning the contents of the late treaties he had made with France and Spain, I desired, that a true copy of them should be communicated to me, together with a declaration of his final resolution, how he intended to act, in case a war should break out between England and France; adding, that I expected an immediate and positive answer, being resolved not to detain the King's ship above four and twenty hours. The arrival of the frigate, her remaining at the Cascaes, my demands, and the little time I gave them, put this King and his Ministers into a great consternation;

"for they supposed, that our fleet lay some where near the coast, expecting the return of the frigate with my answer; and this consternation made them very uneasy, which made me hope, that they would at last take some vigorous resolution in our favour. But my hopes were soon defeated by the news I received by an express from Cascaes the same night, that Monsieur Chateauneault appeared off with his squadron, which proved too true; for he came into this river the next day; and, the Portuguese having plucked up their spirits, the Secretary of State sent me an answer in writing, That the King of Portugal lay under no other obligations by his treaties with France and Spain, than those, which he had communicated to me already, as also to Mr. Secretary Vernon by his Envoy in England; and that the King had no reason to change any thing, that had been stipulated with the most Christian King, who had always been his good Friend and Ally. Monsieur Chateauneault's squadron consists of fourteen men of war, five fire-ships, and one hospital, which are now come up the river, and lie all before the City. Three of the ships are of three decks, and from ninety to a hundred guns; most of the others carry from fifty to sixty. This last step being made to crown the rest of their follies, I cannot think any thing can bring these people to their senses again but a miracle, or popular tumult; the last of which is much more likely to happen than the first; for every body seems dissatisfied at the present situation of affairs, excepting two or three of the Ministers."

(2) It contained the following articles:

1. There shall be a perpetual and inviolable friendship between the Emperor, the King of Great-Britain, and the States-General.

2. The Allies think nothing more effectual for establishing the general peace, than the procuring satisfaction to the Emperor in the Spanish Succession, and sufficient security for the dominions and commerce of the Allies.

3. The Allies shall employ two months time from

1701. it was not like to rise to the third part of that sum. In the mean while, the Trustees lived in great state there, and were masters of all the affairs of that Kingdom. But no propositions were yet made for the purchasing of those estates.

During the King's absence, the Nation was in a great ferment, which was increased by many books, that were written to expose the late management in the House of Commons and the new Ministry, the Earl of Rochester in particular, who was thought the promoter of all violent motions; and several tracts were published, to shew the dangers to be apprehended from the growth of the power of France, and the fatal consequences of a treaty with that Kingdom (1). The few books, that appeared in defence of the conduct of the new Ministers, were such wretched performances, that some were tempted to think, that they were written by men, who perorated the being on their side, on design to expose them.

The Earl of Rochester delayed his going to Ireland very long. He perceived, that the King's heart was not with him, and was very uneasy at it; as, on the other hand, the King complained much of his intractable temper and imperious manner, and, by his intercourse with him, the King came to see, that he was not the man he had taken him for; that he had no large nor clear notions of affairs abroad; and that, instead of moderating the violence of his party, he inflamed them; so that he often said, that the year, in which he directed his counsels, was one of the un happiest of his whole life. The Earl, finding the King's coldness towards him, expostulated with him upon it, and said, he could serve him no longer, since he saw he did not trust him. The King heard this with his usual sile, and concluded upon it, that he should see him no more. But Mr. Harley made the Earl a little more submissive and compliant. After the King was gone beyond sea, the Earl also went into Ireland, where he used much art in obliging people of all sorts, Dissenters as well as Papists; yet such confidence was put in him by the High-Church party, that they bore every thing at his hands. It was not easy to behave himself towards the Trustees for the Irish forfeitures, so as not to give a general distaste to the Nation, for they were much hated, and openly charged with partiality, injustice, and corruption. That, which gave the greatest disgust in his Administration there, was his usage of the reduced officers, who were upon half-pay, a fund being settled for that by act of Parliament. They had been ordered to live in Ireland, and to be ready for service there. The Earl called them before him, and required them to express, under their hands, their readiness to go and serve in the West-Indies. But, they not complying with this, he set them a day for their final answer, and threatened, that they should have no more appointments, if they stood out beyond that time. This was represented to the King as a great hardship put upon them, and as done on design to leave Ireland destitute of the service, that might be done by so many gallant officers, who were all known to be well affected to the present Government; upon which the King ordered a stop to be put to it.

4. But, if that cannot be obtained within the time limited, they engage to assist one the other with all their forces, according to the specification to be agreed on in a particular Convention.

5. The Confederates shall, among other things, endeavour to recover the Spanish Netherlands, to be a barrier between Holland and France, as likewise the Duchy of Milan, &c. for the Emperor's security; and also the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and the lands and islands upon the coast of Tuscany, belonging to the Spanish dominions.

6. The King of Great-Britain and the States may seize what lands and cities they can, belonging to the Spaniards in the Indies, and keep them.

7. In a war, the Confederates shall faithfully communicate their designs to one another.

8. No party shall treat of peace, truce, &c. but, jointly with the rest, they shall prevent the union of France and Spain under the same Government, or the French possessing the Spanish Indies. The subjects of the King of Great-Britain and the States shall enjoy all the privileges of trade, which they had before the death of the late King of Spain.

9. At the making of peace, the Confederates shall provide for the maintaining the trade of the English and the Dutch to the dominions taken from the Spaniards; and likewise secure the States by a barrier.

10. They shall at the same time agree about the exercise of Religion in the places acquired.

11. They shall assist one the other with all their forces, if the French King, or any one else, should invade any one on account of this Alliance.

12. After a peace, there shall remain a defensive Alliance between these Allies, for the maintaining of the said peace.

13. All Kings, Princes, and States, that please, may enter into this Alliance, but the Empire shall be particularly invited, and the Confederates may jointly or separately invite whom they please.

14. This treaty shall be ratified by all the Confederates within six weeks or sooner.

(1) One of these tracts was intitled, The dangers of Europe from the growing Power of France: With some free thoughts on the remedies, and particularly on the cure of our divisions at home, in order to a successful war abroad against the French King and his Allies. But the most considerable treatise upon this subject is thought to come from the hand of the Lord Sommers himself, and was called Anguis in Herba: Or, The fatal consequences of a treaty with France: Wherein it is proved, that the principles, whereby the French King governs himself, will not allow him to observe any treaty longer than it is for his interest to break it. That he has always aimed at the union of the Crowns of France and Spain since the Pyrenean treaty. That, notwithstanding his pretences to the contrary, such is his design at this day. And that nothing can prevent it, but to reduce his power to such a degree, as may perfectly break his measures. This, as well as the piece abovementioned concerning the dangers of Europe, is inserted in the third Volume of the State-tracts during the reign of King William III, and was reprinted at London in 1711 in 8vo. The Author begins with observing, that there are three things absolutely necessary to be done by those, who aim at universal Empire: 1. They must conceal their true design, lest all their neighbours should unite to destroy them, as common enemies and plagues to mankind: 2. They must divide their neighbours as much as possible in their counsels at home, and in their foreign interests in relation to one another: And, 3. That they never make a peace but of necessity, nor observe it longer, than till it become more profitable for them to break it than to keep it. These being both in fact and reason the plain, necessary, and undeniable consequences of aiming at universal Empire, it is easy to be observed, 1. That whoever makes that his aim, cannot bona fide be of any

1701. We are now come to the last period of the life of King James II. He had led, for above ten years, a very unactive life in France. After he had, in so poor a manner, abandoned first England, and then Ireland; he had entered into two designs for recovering the Crowns, which he may be said more truly to have thrown away than lost. The one was broke by the defeat of the French fleet at sea before Cherbourg, in the year 1692: The other seemed to be laid with more depth, as well as with more infamy, when an army was brought to Dunkirk, and the design of the assassination was thought sure; upon which it was reasonably hoped, that the Nation must have fallen into such confusions, that it would have been an easy prey to an army ready to invade it. The reproach, that so black a contrivance cast upon him, brought him under so much contempt, that even the absolute authority of the French Court could hardly prevail

religion, whether natural or revealed; and of consequence such a Prince is not to be bound by arguments or obligations deduced from any religion. 2. That all those most grossly deceive themselves, who treat with such a Prince, out of a prospect, that he will religiously and bonâ fide observe the treaty; for that would stand in his way between him and his great design of Empire. The necessary consequence from these truths is, that, whenever Providence shall so far second the prudence of the measures of those States and Powers, that are neighbours to such a Prince, as that an Alliance can be formed of strength sufficient to be able to reduce such an Aspirer to terms of moderation and equality, they are indispensably obliged to make use of that force to reduce him to those terms of moderation and equality, and never treat with him upon any other foot: For otherwise the Princes and Governors of those States and Powers, with all those, who give them contrary advice, become answerable before God and Man for that misery and ruin, that shall afterwards fall upon such States, either through ignorance or treason of their Governors or Councils. He then remarks, that it is evident the French King had all along aimed at the Empire of this part of the world, from his invasions of France and Franche Compté in 1667 and 1668, and of Holland, Flanders, Franche Compté, and Germany, from the year 1672 to the treaty of Nimeguen; his treatment of the Empire and Spain, after the peace of Nimeguen had disarmed them, and rendered them incapable of opposing him, by those great advantages it gave him over them; and his placing his Grandson upon the Throne of Spain, by which last step France raised itself to the highest pitch of grandeur, and threatened the destruction of the remaining Liberties of Europe and the Protestant Religion. He afterwards remarks, that union at home was the best means to prevent the designs of the French King: That no accommodation can be made with him, but what must be destructive to Europe: That the leaving Milan and Flanders in his hands would infallibly secure to him the universal Empire of Europe: That the Duke of Anjou holding Spain would be under the French power, it being his interest to give all advantages to France, and particularly in point of trade, while England and Holland would not be able to resent it: That the Spanish trade would greatly increase the French shipping: That France, by possessing of Gibraltar, would command the trade of the Streights; and that the seizing of Guipuscoa would secure the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. He next shews, that the possession of the Duke of Anjou is the possession of France, and that the French King always aimed at the union of the two Crowns of France and Spain, not thinking himself in the least obliged by the renunciation made by his Queen at the Pyrenean treaty, and never desisting to observe it, even at the time when he was solemnly swearing the contrary at the altar. That however his measures for uniting those Crowns were broke by the Revolution, and he was obliged by the treaty of Reswick to restore all that he had taken in Catalonia and Flanders during the war, together with Luxembourg, the county of Chiny, Courtray, which he had taken since the peace of Nimeguen, and almost all his re-unions; and was driven out of Italy, having lost Casal during the war, and upon the peace of Savoy forced to restore his conquests, together with Pignerol, which had been in the hands of France since the year 1631. He explains the designs of the treaty of Partition, in which King William and the States-General had been deceived by the infidelity of the French King, who after all rejected that treaty. He remarks, that the Duke of Anjou must enjoy both Crowns, if the Duke of Burgundy should die childless, though contrary to the King of Spain's will. That England and Holland ought to declare to the world, that they begin the war upon the foot of turning the Duke of Anjou out of the whole Spanish succession, since nothing could so intirely reconcile the Spaniards to the interest of the House of Austria and the designs of her Allies, as such a declaration, or would so effectually destroy the credit, that France might still have preserved in Spain; for, though the House of Austria governed Spain for near two centuries, yet they lost their interest there, when it was once known, that the Spanish sceptre could not be continued longer in that family, without dismembering her Empire; while France, her immortal enemy, offered to preserve her Monarchy intire, provided she would receive the Duke of Anjou for her King. "This single motive outweighed all other considerations; she forgot her inbred antipathy to the French Nation, and her friendship and obligations to the family of her former Kings. She accepted his most Christian Majesty's offer, tho' she could not but foresee, that a French King would necessarily make her Crown dependent on that of France. But the scene of affairs is much altered since that time. The exhausted state of France, the great confederacy formed against her, and the success of the Emperor's arms in Italy, sufficiently declare to all the world, and to Spain itself, that France cannot preserve her Monarchy intire. The Confederates can do it, if they are willing. France has taught us how the affections of that People are to be gained. Let us turn her own arts against her; nor can we fail to reap the greatest advantages from such a resolution, whenever England and Holland shall think it a proper time to land an army in Spain upon this foot. Besides, Spain will hereby recover her former independence. But, if we begin a war upon the foot of dividing her Monarchy, we make an inseparable union of interests between Spain and the Duke of Anjou; and, in this case, we must expect to meet with the last efforts of an incensed and desperate nation." He then shews, that all expedients to secure the trade of England and Holland are ridiculous, except that one of turning the Duke of Anjou out of Spain. When this shall be effected, the rest of the Monarchy, except Flanders and Milan, that are garrisoned by French troops, must follow the fortune of their Head. If we turn the Duke of Anjou out of Spain, the House of Austria will be able to make us a good compensation for the charges of the war; but, without that, we must expect no return for our expences. We know they cannot repay us in money; they can give us little or no advantage in our trade. And, for cautionary towns, I know none they could give us, that would be worth our acceptance, except Ostend and Newport. But, instead of repaying us any part of our expence, these garrisons would be a perpetual charge to us, besides the jealousy, that troops maintained there might create in the People of England. Moreover, the sale of Tangier and Dunkirk ought to make us sensible, that those garrisons will be more secure, if we put the House of Austria in a condition to protect them, by making the Archduke King of Spain, than if we kept them in our hands. He asserts then, that "it so far, as to have common respect paid him after that (1). He himself seemed to be the least concerned in all his misfortunes; and, tho' his Queen could never give over meddling, yet he was the most easy, when he was least troubled with those airy schemes, upon which she was employing her thoughts. He went sometimes to the Monastery of La Trappe, where the poor Monks were much edified with his humble and pious deportment (2). Hunting was his chief diversion; and for the most part he led a harmless, innocent life, being still zealous about his Religion (3). In the beginning of this year, he had been so near death, that it was generally thought the decline of it would carry him off. He went to Bourbon in April, where he continued till the latter end of May, but had no benefit of the waters there. In the beginning of September he fell into such fits, that it was concluded he could not live many days. The French King came to see him, and seemed to be much touched with the sight, and repeated to him, what he had be-

"is either a malicious or an ignorant surmise to say, that, if the Archduke were King of Spain, the House of Austria would become too powerful. The dominions of both branches of the House of Austria were united in the person of Charles V, who was great both for his wisdom, courage, and military conduct. The Kingdom of Spain was then at least four times more powerful than at this day. He was absolutely master of the seas. The Duchy of Burgundy, with the seventeen Provinces, were intire in him. Yet, notwithstanding all those advantages, he was but barely a match for France. If his son Philip II. put France very hard to it, we must not attribute that to the power of Spain, but to the civil wars of France; but, as soon as Henry IV. had appeased the civil wars, and settled the distracted condition of the Kingdom, the superiority of France quickly appeared; and all the world allows, that both the branches of the House of Austria could not have prevented some fatal blow, that he was preparing to strike, had not a sudden and violent death stopped his designs. Since that time France has taken from them a great part of Flanders, the Duchy of Burgundy, the Country of Roussillon, and some other places on the frontiers of Spain, and has made considerable conquests on the side of Germany. Spain is greatly discompleed, and her maritime power intirely lost. And, ever since the time Gustavus Adolphus broke the power of the German branch of the House of Austria, we find that both branches united have made no tolerable balance against France; the experience of which has cost us and all Europe very dear, during the continuance of the two last wars. Surely then it would be very extravagant, if, in order to make a balance in Europe, we shall take away from the weight of the House of Austria, which before was very much too light, and add to the weight of France, that was already exorbitantly great. And this must be the case, unless we turn the Duke of Anjou out of the whole."

(1) His friends had generally represented him as incapable of consenting to so shocking an attempt, as that of assassinating King William. But it is evident, from an original letter of his, in the Archbishop's library at Lambeth, printed in the first volume of Secretary Thurloe's State Papers, p. 666, that he was not averse to the employing of Roman Catholics in such a design against Oliver Cromwell, even though they demanded, as a reward for it, a Toleration of their Religion in England. The letter is as follows:

Paris, May, 14, 1655.

"There is a proposition has been made to me, which is too long to put in a letter, so that I will, as short as I can, let you know the heads of them. There are four Roman Catholics, that have bound themselves in a solemn oath to kill Cromwell, and then to raise all the Catholics in the City and the Army, which they pretend to be a number so considerable, as may give a rise for your recovery, they being all warned to be ready for something, that is to be done, without knowing what it is. They demand ten thousand lives in hand; and when the business is ended, some recompense for themselves, according to their several qualities, and the same liberty for Catholics in England, as the Protestants

"have in France. I thought not fit to reject this proposition, but to acquaint you with it, because the first part of the design seems to me to be better lay'd and resolv'd on, than any I have known of that kind; and for the defects of the second, it may be supply'd by some designs you may have to join it. If you approve of it, one of the four, intrusted by the rest, will repair to you, his charges being borne, and give you a full account of the whole matter. In the mean tyme, he desires, in his owne name and theirs, that you would let but one or two, whom you must trust, know it, and enjoyn them secrecy. This is all I can say of it at this tyme."

(2) Father Bretonneau, the Jesuit, in his Abridgement of the Life of King James II. extracted from an English Manuscript of the Reverend Father Francis Sanders, of the Society of Jesus, and Confessor to that King, tells us that the King never missed going to La Trappe once a year. He would stay there three or four days, and spend them in long meditations and spiritual conferences with the Abbot and his Confessor, whom he took with him. He assisted at the Choir-hours, except at night: He eat nothing but eggs, raisins, and other pulse, unless he was indisposed. But he was never so infirm, but he would dine once with the Religious in the Refectory, where no meat nor flesh is ever served up. The King wrote likewise this account of his retirement there:

"Forasmuch as it has pleased the Divine goodness, graciously to touch my heart, when I was at La Trappe, more sensibly than ever; I have since, by the aid of the same Grace, done my utmost to reform and amend my life. At first, I went thither, partly out of curiosity, to see, if the description, which had been made me of this holy place, and the accounts I had read of it in England, were answerable to the idea I had formed of it; and partly to know, if the Abbot, who first began this reform, merited the praises and commendations, that were given him. I was brought thither by an old friend of mine, the Marshal de Bellefont, for which I thanked him as long as he lived. I found, that I succeeded by degrees in the desire, which I had of leading a better life. After I had been there about two or three days (which, I thank God, I continued to do every year, since my return from Ireland) I perceived I had made a considerable improvement; for I began to have a more perfect knowledge of the vanity of human grandeur. I was very well convinced, that nothing ought to be more passionately desired than the love of God; and that it is the duty of every good Christian to mortify himself, especially such a wretch as I am, who have lived so many years in an almost continued state of sin, till at last it has pleased thee, O my God, out of thine infinite mercy, to call me back to thyself by thy fatherly corrections."

(3) Father Bretonneau tells us, "That the King's Confessor, after he had the honour to serve him, and be near his person nine years, thought he might safely affirm, that, in the most reformed state of Christianity, and the most virtuous and pious souls, it is very rare to find more unspotted intentions, a more exact watchfulness, and a greater delicacy and tenderness of conscience with respect to the least faults and the smallest imperfections." The same Writer likewise observes, "That his self-abbhorrence

1701. fore promised to his Queen, that he would, in case of his death, own the pretended Prince of Wales as King of England. King James died on Friday the 16th of September, N. S. with great marks of devotion, and was interred in the Church of the English Benedictines, in the Suburbs of St. James at Paris, in a private manner, and without any sort of solemnity, as he had desired.

King James's Character. Burnet.

He was a Prince that seemed made for greater things, than will be found in the course of his life, more particularly of his Reign: He was esteemed, in the former parts of his life, a man of great courage, as he was quite through it a man of great application to business: He had no vivacity of thought, invention, or expression: But he had a good judgment, where his Religion or his Education gave him not a bias, which it did very often: He was bred with strange notions of the obedience due to Princes, and came to take up as strange ones, of the submission due to Priests: He was naturally a man of truth, fidelity, and justice: But his Religion was so infused in him, and he was so managed in it by his Priests, that the principles, which nature had laid in him, had little power over him, when the concerns of his Church stood in the way: He was a gentle Master, and was very easy to all who came near him: Yet he was not so apt to pardon, as one ought to be, that is the Vicegerent of that God, who is slow to anger, and ready to forgive: He had no personal vices but of one sort: He was still wandering from one amour to another, yet he had a real sense of sin, and was ashamed of it: But Priests know how to engage Princes more intirely into their interests, by making them compound for their sins, by a great zeal for Holy Church, as they call it. In a word, if it had not been for his Popery, he would have been, if not a great, yet a good Prince. Burnet says, that, by what he once knew of him, and by what he saw him afterwards carried to, he grew more confirmed in the very bad opinion, which he was always apt to have, of the intrigues of the Popish Clergy, and of the Confessors of Kings. King James was undone by them, and was their Martyr, so that they ought to bear the chief load of all the errors of his inglorious reign, and of its fatal catastrophe. As he was dying, he said nothing concerning the Legitimacy of his Son; on which some made severe remarks; while others thought, that, having spoke so often of it before, he might not reflect on the fitness of saying any thing concerning it in his last extremity. He recommended to him firmness in his Religion, and justice in his Government, if ever he should come to reign. He said, that, by his practice, he recommended Christian forgiveness to him, for he heartily forgave both the Prince of Orange, and the Emperor. The naming of the Emperor, it was believed, had been suggested to him by the French, in order to render the Emperor odious to all those of his Religion.

Upon his death it was debated in the French Council what was fit to be done, with relation to his pretended Son, whom the King had promised him to acknowledge as King of England, at the persuasion of Madam Maintenon, whom King James's Queen had engaged for that purpose. The Ministry advised the French King to be passive, to let him assume what title he pleased; but that, for some time at least, his Majesty should not declare himself. That this might be some restraint on King William, whereas a present declaration must precipitate a rupture. But the Dauphin interposed with some heat for the present owning him King. He thought the King was bound in honour to do it: That he was of the blood, and was driven away on the account of his Religion. Upon this orders were given to proclaim him at St. Germain's. His own Court, it seems, was going about it, when a difficulty, proposed by the Earl of Middleton, put a stop to it. He apprehended, that it would look very strange, and might provoke the Court of France, if among the titles that of France should be used; and it might disgust their party in England, if it were omitted: So that piece of ceremony was not performed (1).

Soon after this, the King of Spain owned the Pretender as King of England, as likewise did the Pope and the Duke of Savoy; and the King of France pressed all other Princes to do it, in whose Courts he had Ministers, and prevailed on the Pope to press the Emperor and other Roman Catholic Princes to acknowledge him, though without effect. The King of Portugal's answer to the French Minister upon this occasion was, that he was resolved to maintain a friendship and good correspondence with his most Christian Majesty, and to observe religiously all his Alliances with him; but that he could

(1) The circumstances of his last illness and death, and the proclaiming the Pretender King, will best appear from the following extracts of the Earl of Manchester's letters.

1701. could not resolve upon a thing of that nature, which might be attended with dangerous consequences. The King of Denmark likewise made the same refusal.

The Earl of Manchester ordered to leave France, Cole.

King William was no sooner informed of this proceeding of the King of France, but he dispatched a Courier to the King of Sweden, as a Guarantee of the treaty of Ryswick, to give him an account of this manifest violation of it; and on the same day sent an Express to the Earl of Manchester, his Ambassador at Paris, to order him to return to England, without taking his audience of leave. Upon which his Excellency wrote the following letter to the Marquis de Torcy, Secretary of State for foreign affairs.

Paris, Octob. 2, 1701.

"The King my Master, being informed, that his most Christian Majesty has owned another King of Great Britain, does not believe, that his honour and his interest permit him to keep any longer an Ambassador with the King your Master; and has sent me orders to retire immediately; of which I do myself the honour to give you notice by this letter, and I do assure you at the same time, that I am, &c."

This letter being communicated to the French King, who was then at Fontainebleau, he assembled his Council, to deliberate upon an answer, 1701. which Monsieur de Torcy returned the same day in the following terms:

My Lord,

"I can add nothing to what I had the honour to tell you eight days ago, about the sincere desire, which the King has always had to preserve the peace with the King your Master, confirmed by the treaty of Ryswick. As to me in particular, I only pray you to be persuaded, that, in whatever place you are, you will find nobody, who is more truly than I shall be all my life-time yours, &c."

The French King likewise justified his conduct in owning the Pretender by the following manifesto, which he dispersed in all the Courts of Europe.

"The King of England dying at St. Germain's on the 16th of September 1701, the Prince of Wales immediately took the title of King, which belonged to him as son and heir of the late King his father. His most Christian Majesty made no difficulty of owning him under that title; and, even some time before the death of the King of England, his most Christian Majesty had assured him, that he would do so: As his Majesty had

The French King's manifesto in proclaiming the Pretender. Lambert. I. 689.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 5, 1701:

King James was taken on Friday last with fainting fits, which returned upon him yesterday. He was then so ill, that they gave him the extreme unction, and he was thought a dying. There is a report that he is dead, but I do not believe it; though by the accounts I have he cannot live twenty-four hours. I do therefore expect every moment the news of his Death. I do not think of sending a Courier till I see how the Court of France will act, and whether they will own the P. Prince of Wales. By what I can learn they are undetermined at present what to do, and whether they shall suffer those of St. Germain's to proclaim him. I will take care to inform his Majesty of every step that is made.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 7, 1701.

On Sunday last King James had again several fainting fits, which lasted so long, that they thought him dead; but they brought him at last to himself. He received the extreme unction, and seems much resigned. He exhorted my Lord Middleton, and the rest of his Protestant servants, to embrace the Romish Religion, and desired the P. Prince of Wales to keep his Faith, shewing him of how little value a Crown was in comparison to his Salvation. In short he continued long on this subject, and told the Curate of St. Germain's, that he would be buried in their Church with only an inscription, J. K. of England. The Physicians cannot tell what his distemper is. They think, that an imposthume is broke, for a great deal of corruption and blood comes continually from him. Yesterday he had another fit, which lasted an hour. The French King and the whole Court have been to take their leave of him; but he was not dead last night, though none expect he can recover. I know so much, that, as soon as he dies, the P. Prince will take upon him the Title of King of England, and he will be owned as such by those of St. Germain's. I am in doubt, whether the Court of France will own him so soon. As soon as I hear how this Court acts on this occasion, I intend to send an express to his Majesty for instructions and orders."

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 9, 1701.

King James is still alive, but without any hopes of recovery. He seems much resigned, and has exhorted the Lords Middleton, and Griffin, and the rest of his Protestant servants, to embrace the Romish Religion. I hear the latter is extremely uneasy, because the King of France was present, and took notice of him, and said, that he hoped he would consider what King James had said to him. This will have the greater effect, because, if he should not change, it is uncertain, whether the French Court will have any such regard for him, as it has had hitherto. They talk much of what King James said to the P. Prince to keep steadfast to his Religion, and not depart from it on any account whatsoever. I can tell you, that, the moment King James dies, the other will take the Title of King of England, and will be owned as such by those of St. Germain's. The French King is now at Marly, and at his return he goes to Fontainebleau: So it may be easily contrived not to see the P. Prince till his return. The Queen will be in a convent at Châlons till the King is buried, and the P. Prince at the Duke of Lauzun's at Paris, and after that they will return to St. Germain's. I doubt not but the French will call him Roy d'Angleterre.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 14, 1701.

It was expected, that King James would have died last night, but he was alive this morning, though they expect he will expire every moment, being dead almost up to his stomach, and he is sensible of no pain. The King of France was there last night, and did declare, that he would own the P. Prince for King of England

1701. "had always treated him as Prince of Wales, the consequence is natural to stile him King of England, as soon as the King his Father died. No reason opposes this, when there is no engagement to the contrary; and it is certain, there is none in the treaty of Ryswick. The fourth article of that treaty declares only, that his most Christian Majesty shall not disturb the King of Great Britain in the peaceable possession of his Dominions; nor assist with troops, or ships, or any other succour, those, who shall attempt to disturb him. His most Christian Majesty's intention is to observe punctually this article; and it is certain, that the title of King of England, which the Prince of Wales could not dispense with taking upon himself, will not procure him any other assistances from his most Christian Majesty, than what the late King his father received since the treaty of Ryswick, which were merely for his subsistence, and the alleviation of his misfortunes. The generosity of his most Christian Majesty would not allow him to abandon either that Prince or his Family. He is no Judge between the King of Great Britain and the Prince of Wales. He cannot determine against the latter, by refusing him a title, which his birth gives him. In a word, it is sufficient, if his most Christian Majesty observes exactly the treaty of Ryswick, and adheres strictly to the terms of that treaty, at a time, when the conduct of the King of Great Britain and the States General, the sailing of their fleets, the secret assistance, which they give the Emperor, the declarations, which they make in favour of that Prince, the troops, which they are raising in all parts, might be regarded with much greater reason, as a real contravention to treaties.

Besides, it is not a new thing to give to children the titles of Kingdoms, which the Kings their fathers have lost, though the Princes, who give those titles, are at peace with those who are in possession of those Kingdoms. History furnishes many examples among the Kings of Naples and those of Navarre. Lastly, the Kings of Poland of the House of Vasa, having lost the Kingdom of Sweden, were treated by France as Kings of Sweden till the peace of Oliva, at the time that there was the strictest Alliance with England immediately. This he said before several People, and I have it from such good hands, that I hardly doubt it.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 16, 1701.

We have ever since Tuesday last been expecting to hear of the death of the late King. His grand dilemma now is a lethargy, and he is often thought dead, though with cordials, &c. they keep him up without any hopes of recovery. The King of France was that day to see him, and then he declared publicly, that he would own the P. Prince for King of England, and ordered the Captains of the Guards to pay him the same honours they did to the late K. James. This is what his Majesty may rely upon. I know, that some of the foreign Ministers took notice of it yesterday to M. de Tercy, who said, that there was nothing in that contrary to the treaty of Ryswick. I cannot tell how they will explain this here, but certainly it cannot be understood so; and it shews at least, that this Court does not intend to keep any measures with his Majesty. There is now in the press an edict to prohibit all trade with England; but, that it may not look like a declaration of war, they do permit the bringing in of beer, cyder, glass-bottles, and wool. Notice is already sent to all the sea-ports, and, after the first of November next, no person is to wear any of the manufactures of England under severe penalties.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 17, 1701.

The late King James died yesterday between three and four o'clock in the afternoon; and the P. Prince was immediately proclaimed King of England by the title of James the Third. I do not hear, that there was any other ceremony than that, after he had taken the title of King, those of St. Germain's kissed his hand, and treated him with Majesty. After that the French complimented him, and did the like. What was done in the town was in a tumultuous manner, by crying, Long live King James the Third, &c. I do not doubt but before now the King of France and the rest of the Court have complimented him, and that matter having been settled beforehand. He continues at St. Germain's, but the Queen is come to Châtil, a convent near Paris. I do not find, that the late King is much regretted at St. Germain's, since the French King has promised, that all things there shall remain on the same foot they were. I shall not give my opinion, and I do take it, that none are so proper to judge about this as the Lords Justices, since it does not only regard the honour of his Majesty, but also that of the Nation; but I believe this is the first precedent of a King, who has owned another King; and, whilst his Ambassador is at Court, he owns another again with the same titles. I know they say here, that there is nothing in this contrary to the treaty of Ryswick, which they explain by their not intending to assist him in recovering his Crown, at least during the life of his Majesty; but I thought treaties between Princes extended to Them and their Successors; but that I suppose they will pretend to observe, since they have named a Successor. The foreign Ministers are extremely surpris'd, and say they could not have believed what they now see.

Vol. III. Numb. XXXII.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 19, 1701.

I have already acquainted the Lords Justices (since I believe his Majesty will come to no resolution till they have given their opinion) that the late King died on the 16th in the afternoon, and that immediately the P. Prince was proclaimed King of England by the title of James the Third. There was no other ceremony than that the Queen waited on him, and treated him as King; after that those of St. Germain's kissed his hand, and the French complimented him. What was done in the town was done in a tumultuous manner. Some say there was a Herald, an Irishman. Lord Middleton, &c. did not appear, because they could not tell how the title of France would be taken here, had they done it in form. Lord Middleton brought the Seals to him, which he gave him again. Others did the like. I am told, that, before the French King made this declaration, he held a Council at Marly, where it took up some time to debate, whether he should own him or no; or, if he did, whether it ought not to be deferred for some time. The secret of all this matter is this, that in short, there was a person, that governs here, who had some time since promised the Queen, that it should be done; so that whatever passed in Council was only for form's sake. The French King came to St. Germain's, and 1701. " King Gustavus and Queen Christina. I do not believe it to be necessary to cite these examples, because they are too manifest, that his Majesty's conduct in this point is just, worthy of his generosity, conformable to treaties, and to what he has done for the late King of England, since he sought an asylum in France."

But this manifesto could not pass on the world, since the owning the Pretender's right was a plain declaration, that France would assist him in claiming it, whenever the state of their affairs would allow of it. However, Monsieur Poussin, who had been Secretary to Monsieur de Tallard, and was left by him in England to manage the affairs of his Court there, offered to present this manifesto to Secretary Vernon, who refusing to receive it, he caused the substance of it to be published under the title of, The French King's reasons for owning the pretended Prince of Wales King of England, supposed to be communicated in a letter from Paris to a friend in London. These reasons were suppressed by the command of the Government, and Monsieur Poussin ordered to leave the Kingdom by a limited time; though, a night or two before his departure, a thing happened, which made a great deal of noise; for he was found at supper at a public tavern, with three Members of the House of Commons, who were zealous opposers of the Court, Mr. Anthony Hammond, Mr. John Tredenham, and Dr. Charles Davenant. This gave an alarm of secret correspondence; and, though they excused themselves upon accident and common civility, yet they fell under great odium; and with others of their party were branded assured the Queen and the P. Prince, that he would own him as soon as the King was dead. Upon which the Queen told him, that it would be a great consolation to the late King, if his Majesty would tell him as much; which he did, and then his servants were called in, to whom he declared the same. To-morrow the French King goes to St. Germain's, to make the P. Prince the first visit as King. The Queen is now at a convent at Chalot; but she returns to-morrow to St. Germain's, where she will continue. The body of the late King is brought to the English Benedictines, where it will be exposed forty days, and then let there till a proper opportunity of carrying it for England. I do hear, that at Court they pretend, that there is nothing in all this contrary to the treaty of Ryswick; which notion they explain by their not intending to assist him in recovering the Crown, at least not during the life of his present Majesty. I thought treaties extended to the Princes and their Heirs and Successors; but even there I suppose they are right, as having named the Successor. I assure you, most of the French are surpris'd at this proceeding; but it is generally said, that the French King has wrote to his Majesty, to shew the necessity he was under, and that M. de Torcy has spoke to me, whom I have not heard a word from; and therefore I do not believe the other. I cannot see what can be said to palliate this matter. I do not intend to appear at Court till I have his Majesty's orders, which I imagine will be rather to return to England. We shall see now, whether any of the foreign Ministers will compliment the P. Prince. I suppose the Spanish Ambassador will, which I take it is in our power to resent in the like manner.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 21, 1701.

I did not go to Versailles yesterday, for I thought it not proper till I had his Majesty's orders; and I am confident, that there are none here, if they dare to own their opinion, but they must say, that I am in the right. I think I should have made a worse figure than Count Zinzendorf did, when he was present whilst the Duke of Anjou was declared King of Spain. I was satisfied, that the whole discourse would be of their new Roy d'Angleterre, and of the French King's going to make him the first visit at St. Germain's, which he did that day. He staid but a little with him, giving him the title of Majesty. He was with the Queen a considerable time. The rest of the Court made their compliments the same day. I am told, that M. de Torcy declares, that this does not any way alter the intentions of the King from observing the treaty of Ryswick, and he alledges several examples in the like cases. He seemed concerned, that I was not there; and he did desire one to let me know, that he should be at Paris on Friday, and that he would either wait on me, or be glad to see me. I intend to see him, and to hear what he will say, and then I shall acquaint you with it. I have had a very difficult part to act, and I cannot but see this will make it worse.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 24, 1701.

I have seen Monsieur de Torcy, who did endeavour to put the best colour on this last proceeding. His chief aim was to shew me, that there was nothing in this contrary to the treaty of Ryswick; and I could perceive, that the French King was brought to do it at the solicitation of the Queen at St. Germain's. It is certain, that Monsieur de Torcy, as well as the rest of the Ministers, was against it; and only the Dauphin and Madam de Maintenon, whom the Queen had prevailed with, carried this point; which I am satisfied they may have reason to repent of. It begins to appear already, since I can assure you, that, if I take my leave, it will cause an universal conformation here. I see, that they are in no condition to support a war, and the affairs of France were never in so ill a posture. I told him my mind very freely, and there is so much to say on this subject, that he could not answer me. I said, that it was such a precedent, as might come home to them at last: That there were others, who pretended to the Crown of Spain, as well as the present King, and I left him to judge how that would be liked, if we should act as they do. It is not necessary to repeat all that passed; but, when I take myself to be in the right, I am apt enough to speak plain. I found him very calm, and even concerned. Without doubt they expect I shall be recalled; and they will be sorry, if it should happen so at last. I told him I would wait his Majesty's orders, and till then I could say nothing to this matter: That I supposed I should have them soon, and then I would acquaint him with them. He said, he hoped to see me at Fontainebleau. He entered on the subject of the negotiation, and how the peace would set all right. I told him, that it was visible, what difficulties there have been in relation to the Emperor; and that there was no occasion for creating new ones, which might oblige us to take such measures, as possibly we might otherwise not take. I know, that the King ordered Monsieur de Torcy to soften this matter to me as much as he could. I have thought of laying this whole conference, which lasted an hour, before his Majesty; though there is no relying on what this Court says or does, after what we have seen. I am afraid of even giving my opinion; and it would be better, if I could have the honour to relate this to his Majesty by discourse; though I fear there never will be any treating with this Court without great vigour and resolution, and with sword in hand.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 26, 1701.

I have seen Monsieur de Torcy, who did endeavour to put 1701. branded by the name of Poussineers, in a paper called the Black List (1).

The conduct of the French Court gave an universal distaste to the whole English Nation: All people seemed possessed with an high indignation upon it, to see a foreign power, that was at peace with them, pretend to declare, who ought to be their King. Even those, who were perhaps secretly well pleased with it, were yet, as it were, forced, for their own safety, to comply with the general sense of the rest in this matter.

The City of London began with an address, which was presented to the Lords Justices, in which they expressed, "That they were deeply sensible, how much they were in duty bound, highly to resent that great indignity and affront offered to his Majesty by the French King, in giving the title of King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the pretended Prince of Wales, contrary to his Majesty's most just and lawful title, and to the several acts of Parliament for settling the Succession to the Crown in the Protestant line. That by this it was apparent, that he designed,

"as much as in him lay, to dethrone his Majesty, to extinguish the Protestant Religion out of these his Majesty's Kingdoms, and to invade their Liberties and Properties, for the maintaining whereof his Majesty had signalized his zeal by the often hazarding his precious life. They therefore assured his Majesty, that they would at all times, and upon all occasions, exert the utmost of their abilities, and contribute whatever lay in their power for the preservation of his person, and the defence of his just rights, in opposition to all invaders of his Crown and Dignity."

This address being transmitted to the King in Holland, his Majesty gave special directions to the Lords Justices, to acquaint the Lord Mayor and Aldermen with the great satisfaction he had upon the receiving it. According to this precedent, numerous addresses came from all parts of the Kingdom. A great diversity of stile appeared in these addresses; some avoided to name the French King, the Prince of Wales, or the act of Settlement, and only reflected on the transaction in France in general and soft words.

But

put the best colour on the late proceedings. The will of the late King James is opened, but not yet published; but I hear it is to be printed. What I have learned of it is, that the Queen is made Regent; the French King is desired to take care of the education of the P. Prince: That, in case he be restored, the Queen is to be repaid all that she has laid out of her own: That all other debts, which they have contracted since they left England, and what can be made out, shall be paid: That the new King shall not take any revenge against his father's enemies, nor his own: That he shall not use any force in matters of Religion, nor in relation to the Estates of any persons whatsoever. He recommends to him all those that have followed him. I am told, that Lord Perth is declared a Duke, and Caryl a Lord. I do not doubt but we shall hear of several new Titles and Garters. Certainly there ought to be some stop put to all this, else we shall not know where we are.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

I have received yours of the 11th, and am much obliged to their Excellencies for the representation they have made to his Majesty. I am confident, that the King will be of that opinion, since they are so. I was unwilling to press this matter, lest conjectures might have been made to my disadvantage; though I hope it is apparent, that the only aim I have is his Majesty's service, and the honour of the Nation. I am satisfied, that this Court will contrive matters so, that it cannot be long before they will oblige me to be gone. Their actions shew, there is nothing now left but that. The Owning the P. Prince is against the fourth article of the treaty of Ryswick, if words can mean any thing; and the Prohibition of our Commerce is against the fifth article of the same treaty. But these are small matters to what you would have seen, had it been in their power. The only satisfaction we have is, that all Europe must be convinced, that we are not the Aggressors; and England must be convinced, that his Majesty is not for engaging them in a war, if it can be prevented; but you know already my opinion. The will of the late King will be printed, and I hope to send it you by the next post. There are to be great numbers sent into England, so that possibly you may have it before me. Lord Middleton is declared Earl of Monmouth by this will; Lord Perth is to be a Duke by an old Patent; but they say Lord Middleton will not take his new Title. There are several other Lords made, but not yet declared; so that the House of Lords will be well filled at their return. We shall soon hear, that some Garters are disposed of. It is a comical scene, and I hope it will end so. I find Mr. Poussin is a very pleasant Gentleman: I could send you many stories about him from hence. I am glad he is at last puzzled about our fleet. They are very uneasy about it here, and would fain know what we intend to do with it.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Octob. 1. 1701.

Last night arrived here a Messenger from Laas. Mr. Blathwayt acquaints me, that his Majesty, having considered the proceedings of this Court, does order me to return to England forthwith, without taking leave. I am only to let Monsieur de Torcy know the reasons, why his Majesty does not think it for his honour, nor service, to continue longer any Ambassador or other Minister here. I propose to set out in less than ten days, and I do desire their Excellencies the Lords Justices will order a yacht for me at Calais. I cannot but think this resolution is right, and I am glad it is taken; though, in relation to myself, I could have wished there had been no occasion for it, that so I might have left this Court in a better manner.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Octob. 4. 1701.

Mr. Collins, the Messenger, arrived here on the 30th past with his Majesty's orders; and the next day I received a duplicate of them by the post. On the 2d instant, I acquainted Monsieur de Torcy with them, in the manner you had directed me, and I have inclosed his answer. I have some reason to think, that the Court was a little surprized, though they might reasonably expect such a resentment. You will see, that Monsieur de Torcy refers me to the Conference I had with him before he went to Fontainebleau, of which I have already informed you. I must own, that they are much civiler on this occasion, than I expected they would have been; and I have great obligations to Monsieur de Torcy, who has, on all occasions, shewed himself extreme kind to me, and even in this case he expresses it. He will procure me passports for my goods, else I should not have known what to do. I intend to set out for England by the 10th.

(1) The story is thus related by a Writer of their own party, supposed to be Dr. Davenant, in a piece intitled, Tom Double returned out of the Country: Or, the true picture of a Modern Whig, set forth in a second dialogue

1701. But others carried the matter farther, encouraging the King to go on in his Alliances, promising him an Armada to assist him; and assuring him, that, when he should think fit to call a new Parliament, they would chuse such Members, as should concur in enabling him to maintain his Alliances. This raised the Divisions of the Nation higher.

The King having finished his Alliances, and especially that between England, Holland, and the Empire, began to prepare for his return; but was detained at the Hague above a month by a severe indisposition, which was concealed as much as possible; because the very news of his sickness would have been an obstruction to the interests of Europe: and, if his death had happened at that time, it must have occasioned great confusion in England, and other parts. The King began now to consider his illness as a preface, that he had not long to live; and was so sensible of his declining state, that he told the Earl of Portland, "That he found himself so weak, that he could not expect to live another summer;" but charged him, at the same time, to say nothing of it till he was dead.

The King at last embarked towards the beginning of November, and landed at Margate on the 4th of that month; and the first thing, that fell under debate, upon his return, was, whether the Parliament should be continued, or dissolved, and a new one called. Some of the leading men of the former Parliament had been secretly asked, How they thought they should proceed, if they should meet again? Of these, whilst some answered doubtfully, others said positively, that they would begin where they had left off, and would insist on their impeachments. The new Ministry struggled hard against a dissolution, and, when they saw the King resolved on it, some of them left his service. This convinced the Nation, that the King was not in a double game, which had been confidently given out before, and was too easily believed by many. The Parliament being first prorogued till the 13th of November, a proclamation was published on the 11th of that month for dissolving it, and summoning another to meet at Wejminster on the 30th of December. The heats in elections increased with every new summons; and this was thought so critical a conjuncture, that both sides exerted their full strength (1). Dialogue between Mr. Whiglove and Mr. Double. He tells us, p. 48, 49. that Mr. Hammond and Mr. Tredenham had agreed to sup together that night. About seven in the evening Mr. Hammond and one Mr. Auberry, a person of good substance and credit in the City, came to give Dr. Davenant a visit at Gray's-Inn. The Doctor proposed to them supping at a tavern in Holbourn; but Mr. Hammond answered, he was engaged to meet Mr. Tredenham at the other end of the town, and desired the Doctor and Mr. Auberry to be of their company, but Mr. Auberry said he had business in the City. So they went together without him, and in the way made a visit, where they staid till near nine of the clock. From thence they went to Mr. Tredenham's lodgings, who had left word he was at the Blue Posts in the Hay-Market; whom accordingly they found there with D. Bernardino, the Spanish Consul, whom he had met in the Park, and, being an old acquaintance, had proposed supping with him. In a quarter of an hour supper came in: When the meat was actually upon the table, it seems Monsieur Pouffin came to that house, and inquired for D. Bernardino. The drawer fetched out Bernardino to him, who told Monsieur Pouffin he was at supper there with Mr. Tredenham, who had a general acquaintance with Monsieur Pouffin, they having lodged in the same house together. Upon which D. Bernardino brought Monsieur Pouffin into the room; but, seeing two strangers there, he made an apology, and sat down. They supped in a ground-room, the door being all the while open, and two waiters attending; and after three quarters of an hour's stay at most, as soon as supper was ended, the Company separated.

(1) There was published upon this occasion a pamphlet in 4to, intitled, The Candidates tried: Or, a certain way how to avoid mistakes in chusing Members for the ensuing Parliament: The Author of which begins with observing, "That there is no person in the least acquainted with the present posture of affairs, but must see, that upon the choice of a good or ill House of Commons depends the happiness or misery of this Nation; and therefore it is, that our most gracious King has, by dissolving the last Parliament, given his People an opportunity of chusing such persons, as may enable his Majesty, in conjunction with his Allies, to restore the balance of Europe. How necessary this is to be, I need not, says he, mention, since nothing can be plainer, than that if Spain and the Spanish West-Indies, or Flanders, remain in the "power of France, the Nation is irrecoverably lost; and that, if we miss this opportunity, we cannot in all human probability expect another. And consequently an ill choice at this juncture is such an error, as can never be retrieved. Therefore it is highly necessary to offer some marks, whereby persons of the meanest capacities may distinguish their friends from their enemies; those, that pretend to be so, from those, that are really so." He then shews, that, as the nation was divided into two parties, known in former reigns by the names of Whigs and Tories, so it was plain, that the Papists, the swearing and the non-swearing Jacobites, agree in applauding and supporting the latter, and in reviling and opposing the former. And therefore those, who were not otherwise capable of discovering the Nation's friends from its enemies, could not well be mistaken, if in all elections they went counter to the Jacobites, and opposed the party they espoused. To shew that it was reasonable to act thus, he examines what grounds the Tory party had given the Jacobites to be so much in love with them, and by consequence for the well-wishers to the Government and the Protestant Religion, not to confide in them. "Have not these, says he, good reasons for their kindness, since the party, especially their Leaders, have all along shewn their disaffection to the present Establishment? How could they declare themselves fuller for what they call the right Line than by opposing the Abdication, the recognition, not allowing his Majesty to be a rightful King, and against entering into an Association to preserve his Majesty and the Government, when in most imminent danger. They owe them eternal gratitude for opposing all such equal and easy methods for raising money as would have kept us out of debt, on pretence left the King, whose ambition and delight it was to head armies, might, by the ease the People found in paying them, be tempted to perpetuate the war, or else the Nation might be induced to continue them in time of peace. By which means we run into land-banks and other deficient funds, which destroyed credit, and plunged the nation in immense debts. The party, not content herewith, were against reconcoiling the money, though it is evident, the not doing of it would have brought us into confusion. Afterwards they not only opposed its going by weight till reconciled, but obliged the Nation to make good all that was clipped, or to be clipped, by such a time, of which none had 1701. men, who were zealous for the King and Government (1); but the rotten part of our Constitution, as an eminent Author files the small boroughs, were in many places wrought on to chuse bad men. However, upon the whole, it appeared, that a clear majority was in the 1701. King's interests.

The Parliament being met, according to their ^{the sixth} summons, on the 30th of December, the King ^{Parliament} came to the House of Peers, and sent for the Commons, Dec. 30.

"any advantage but the traders in money, who, of all men, did not deserve such a favour. Neither was this all, but they were for raising the silver coin; and, when they could not carry that, they fought it out to the last for keeping up the price of guineas. What could the Jacobites desire more, since that very thing (had it proved successful) would have been of most fatal consequence? It is certain the French King depended very much on this project; for, when he found the Nation, notwithstanding the counter-assurances given him by his creatures, had overcome all the difficulties relating to the re-coining of the money, he despaired of bruing about his designs by a war, but hoped to do it more effectually in a time of peace by the jealousies, divisions, and animosities he could set on foot by the help of his party here." He then proceeds to observe, that the Jacobites could not be mistaken in their men, when those, that were most instrumental in the late reigns to carry on their villainous designs, are the leading men of that party now; and, the more they were concerned in promoting Popery and Slavery at home, and abroad in depriving of Holland, and exalting of France, the more they are cherished; as if that, and a violent opposition to the present Constitution, joined with an implacable hatred to all its friends, were the qualifications, that most recommended them to head the party. He then exposes their conduct in endeavouring to save Sir John Fenwick, when they were convinced in conscience, that he was guilty; and, though they had pretended to abandon their former Tory-principles, this was only a scheme of dissimulation the better to effect their designs, and to ingratiate themselves with the People. That, with regard to the act of Succession, though they could not have opposed it openly, without putting off the mask, and it must have gone down, whether they would or not, having the weight of the Nation with it, yet they did what they could to shew their dislike of it, by treating it with an air of contempt and ridicule, and their putting Sir John Bowles in the Chair, and constantly running out of the House as soon as he had taken it, was no sign they intended it any great honour. In a word, their conduct was such, that the Lords, though they designed several amendments, durst not trust the bill down again, for fear it might occasion the losing it, and so immediately passed it." He is very full likewise in shewing how great friends the Tory-party, in the two Houses, and those in the Ministry, had been to France, by their conduct upon the French King's making his Grandson King of Spain, and in many other instances.

(1) The City of London and the Borough of Southwark delivered to their Members remarkable papers of instructions. That from the City was as follows:

"Gentlemen,

"We earnestly desire and charge you, our Representatives, that in the approaching Parliament you heartily pursue the engagements made to his Majesty in the address of this City, and other loyal addresses from all parts of the Kingdom. To this purpose we expect, that, to the utmost of your power, and without loss of time, you endeavour to put his Majesty into a condition to maintain his undoubted right and title to the Crown, and to vindicate His and the Nation's honour: To enable him in this critical juncture to provide for the security of his Kingdoms; to appear at the head of the Protestant interest; to make good his Alliances, and, in conjunction with his Allies, to reduce the French King, that it may be no longer in his power to disturb and oppress the rest of Europe.

Nº. 32. Vol. III.

"In order to these good ends, we desire you diligently to labour to preserve an intire good correspondence between the two Houses of Parliament, and hinder the pursuing of private piques and animosities; to take care of our trade, support public credit, make good the deficiencies, and to have special regard to the Royal navy. And so God prosper your undertakings."

That from the borough of Southwark gives so distinct and concise a recapitulation of the affairs of Europe, that it is more remarkable than the other.

"Gentlemen,

"It is notorious, that for more than forty years the French King hath affected universal Monarchy; that he has constantly pursued the same by all methods of violence, rapine, and injustice; and that he has no otherwise regarded his oaths, treaties, and religion, than as so many solemn cheats to catch and ensnare all that have depended on him.

"To enable himself to marry the Infanta of Spain, he, by oath, renounced any title to that Crown for all the issue of that marriage; yet he hath made the invalidity of that renunciation the ground-work of every one of his wars with the King of Spain.

"By the Pyrenean treaty, he stipulated with that King to give no assistance to his enemy the King of Portugal; yet presently after dispatched so many troops to the assistance of that Prince, as reduced the Spanish Monarchy to a degree of weakness, from which it hath never since recovered.

"He lulled the Spaniards asleep with repeated promises of friendship; and then, without giving him any time to prepare for his defence, carried his conquests over the greatest part of Flanders, and was prevented only by the triple Alliance of England, Holland, and the King of Sweden, from reducing of the remainder of that Province.

"To the everlasting dishonour of the late King Charles II. he disengaged that Prince from so necessary an Alliance, and presently after invaded the seven United Provinces with all his forces; and could give no better reason for a bloody war, which reduced those flourishing States almost to utter ruin, than that he had been ill satisfied with their conduct.

"To break a powerful Confederacy against him, he made the peace of Nimwegen, by which concession was made to him of almost all his conquests in that war; and immediately after invaded the Empire himself, to assist his infidel Confederates.

"The peace of Ryswick gave an end to that war, and a balance to Europe, till the French, by colour of a will surreptitiously gained from the late King of Spain, in favour of the Duke of Anjou, has possessed himself of the Spanish Monarchy, contrary to his own renunciation and the Pyrenean treaty. Flanders and Milan he hath invested with his own troops, while the Duke of Anjou is forced to govern the rest of that Monarchy, as Viceroy to his Grandfather, both to obtain his support, and for fear of being excluded from a better Kingdom.

"He has exalted himself upon this good success, and has already named a Viceroy for more countries, by giving the title of his Majesty's Kingdoms to the pretended Prince of Wales. Our condition must be very miserable, if we are to be governed by the discretion of a King, who hath destroyed the Protestants of his own Kingdom by the sword, fire, and gallies: We cannot hope to be used with greater tenderness than his own subjects.

"Never-

1701. Commons, to whom the Lord-Keeper signified his Majesty's pleasure, that they should forthwith proceed to the choice of a Speaker, and present him the next morning. The competition for that office lay between Mr. Robert Harley and Sir Thomas Littleton. The King and Council inclined to Sir Thomas; but Mr. Harley was elected by a majority of fourteen voices. The King opened the Parliament with the best speech that he, or perhaps any other Prince, ever made to his People (1).

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Promise myself you are met together full of that just sense of the common danger of Europe, and the resentment of the late proceedings of the French King, which has been so fully and universally expressed in the loyal and feasonable addresses of my People.

"The owning and setting up the pretended Prince of Wales for King of England, is not only the highest indignity offered to Me and the Nation, but does so nearly concern every man, who has a regard for the Protestant Religion, or the present and future Quiet and Happiness of his Country, that I need not press you to lay it seriously to heart, and to consider what further effectual means may be used, for securing the Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, and extinguishing the hopes of all Pretenders, and their open and secret abettors.

"By the French King's placing his Grandson on the Throne of Spain, he is in a condition to oppress the rest of Europe, unless speedy and effectual measures be taken. Under this pretence, he is become the real Master of the whole Spanish Monarchy; he has made it to be intirely depending on France, and disposes of it, as of his own Dominions, and by that means he has surrounded his neighbours in such a manner, that, though the name of peace may be said to continue, yet they are put to the expence and inconveniencies of war.

"This must affect England in the nearest and most sensible manner, in respect to our trade, which will soon become precarious in all the variable branches of it; in respect to our peace and safety at home, which we cannot hope should long continue; and in respect to that part, which England ought to take in the preservation of the liberty of Europe.

"In order to obviate the general calamity, with which the rest of Christendom is threatened by this exorbitant power of France, I have concluded several Alliances, according to the encouragement given me by both Houses of Parliament, which I will direct shall be laid before you, and which, I doubt not, you will enable me to make good.

"There are some other treaties still depending, that shall be likewise communicated to you as soon as they are perfected.

"It is fit I should tell you, the eyes of all Europe are upon this Parliament; all matters are at a stand, till your resolutions are known; and therefore no time ought to be lost.

"You have yet an opportunity, by God's blessing, to secure to you and your posterity the quiet enjoyment of your Religion and Liberties, if you are not wanting to yourselves, but will

"Nevertheless, we cannot doubt but his repeated ill successes in Italy, the vast debts of his Crown, increased by his prodigious expences among his Confederate Princes, will oblige him to offer a treaty, that he may save by a peace, a considerable share of the Spanish Monarchy, rather than lose the whole by a war. And we had reason to be afraid, that the division of the two Houses of Parliament, the animosities of those men, that have opposed the Settlement, the Recognition and Association, and the great Authority of others, who, in former Reigns, had always given countenance for the French invasions, might oblige his Majesty to hearken to such a peace, as France would please to give him.

"But we hope, Gentlemen, that the dissolution of the Parliament has put an end to the division of the two Houses; and we have that assurance of your integrity and moderation, that you will do nothing to revive the same division. It is indeed very popular and very just to be severe with such Ministers, as have betrayed the Commonwealth. But, when the Lords, so considerable a part of the Legislative Power, have espoused the innocence of any person, we hope you will either give credit to their authority, or defer your resentments during our common danger. We are assured, that you will neither join with the enemies of the King, nor with the advocates of France, to hang upon the wheels of the Government.

"We beseech you, Gentlemen, not to be amused with the offers of any treaties from the French King; or, for the sake thereof, to defer any supplies, that shall be convenient, before he shall have given intire satisfaction to the Emperor for his right to the Spanish Monarchy, and to his Majesty for the affront put upon him and his people, by giving the title of his Kingdoms to the pretended Prince of Wales. We hope you will be ready upon all occasions to address the King, that he will never enter into any treaty with France, which shall not effectually secure to his people their Religion and Commerce.

"We beseech you, Gentlemen, that, setting aside all other business, you will be so early and so diligent in your supplies to his Majesty, to support

"Alliances, and enemies, any terms of the neutrality or otherwise. That other Princes, like those of Savoy, Portugal, and Cologne, may not make separate treaties for themselves with the common.

"We beseech you, Gentlemen, to be so careful of the credit of the Government, and to join your votes with such as shall be for the most speedy and most effectual methods of raising money; that the blame of buying every thing for the King at excessive prices may not be cast upon the Ministers, which has been most justly due to the distance or insufficiency of those funds, which Parliaments have given.

"Above all, Gentlemen, we conjure you to be most tender of the Person of his Majesty; to endeavour, that no indignity may be offered to a Prince born for the good of Europe; to distinguish between one that sits upon his Throne, and sends Generals abroad to make slaughters and desolation among his neighbours, and a King, who has so liberally and so generously exposed his life for the liberty of his country against this common enemy."

(1) The Lord Sommers is supposed to have assisted in framing this speech, which was so acceptable to the well wishers to the Revolution, and their friends abroad, that it was printed with decorations in English, Dutch, and French, and hung up in frames in almost every house in England and Holland, as his Majesty's last legacy to his own and all Protestant people.

1701. "will exert the ancient vigour of the English Nation; but I tell you plainly, my opinion is, if you do not lay hold on this occasion, you have no reason to hope for another.
 "In order to do your part, it will be necessary to have a great strength at sea, and to provide for the security of our ships in harbour; and also that there be such a force at land, as is expected in proportion to the forces of our Allies.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I do recommend these matters to you with that concern and earnestness, which their importance requires. At the same time I cannot but press you to take care of the public credit, which cannot be preserved but by keeping sacred that maxim, That they shall never be losers, who trust to a Parliamentary security.

"It is always with regret, when I do ask aids of my People; but you will observe, that I desire nothing, which relates to any personal expence of mine; I am only pressing you to do all you can for your own safety and honour, at so critical and dangerous a time; and am willing, that what is given, should be wholly appropriated to the purposes for which it is intended.

"And, since I am speaking on this head, I think it proper to put you in mind, that, during the late war, I ordered the accounts to be laid yearly before the Parliament, and also gave my assent to several bills for taking the public accounts, that my subjects might have the satisfaction to know, how the money given for the war was applied; and I am willing that matter may be put in any further way of examination, that it may appear, whether there were any misapplications and mismanagements; or whether the debt, that remains upon us, has really arisen from the shortness of the supplies, or the deficiency of the funds.

"I have already told you, how necessary dispatch will be for carrying on that great public business, whereon our safety, and all that is valuable to us depends. I hope, what time can be spared, will be employed about those other very desirable things, which I have so often recommended from the Throne; I mean, the forming some good bills for employing the poor, for encouraging trade, and the further suppressing of vice.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I hope you are come together determined to avoid all manner of disputes and differences; and resolved to act with a general and hearty concurrence for promoting the common cause, which alone can make this a happy Session.

"I should think it as great a blessing as could befall England, if I could observe you as much inclined to lay aside those unhappy fatal animosities, which divide and weaken you, as I am disposed to make all my subjects safe and easy as to any, even the highest offences committed against me.

"Let me conjure you to disappoint the only hopes of our enemies by your unanimity.

"I have shewn, and will always shew, how desirous I am to be the common Father of all my People. Do you, in like manner, lay aside parties and divisions. Let there be no other distinction heard of amongst us for the future, but of those, who are for the Protestant Religion, and the present Establishment, and of those, who mean a Popish Prince, and a French Government.

"I will only add this; if you do in good earnest desire to see England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the Protestant interest, it will appear by your right improving the present opportunity."

This wise and affectionate speech was extremely grateful to both Houses, and they were very unanimous in their thanks for it. The Lords began the new year with expressing, That they had heard with all imaginable satisfaction his Majesty's most gracious speech, for which they returned their most humble and hearty thanks. And though the several particulars, which his Majesty was pleased to recommend to them, were of the highest importance; and they would lose no time in proceeding to the consideration of them with great duty to his Majesty; yet they could not defer expressing their just resentments of the proceedings of the French King, in owning and setting up the pretended Prince of Wales for King of England, and other his Majesty's Realms and Dominions; which they took to be the highest indignity, that could be offered to his Sacred Majesty and this Kingdom. And they assured his Majesty, they were so sensible thereof, that they were resolved to assist his Majesty to the utmost of their power in defending his Sacred Person and Government from all attempts whatever, that should be made either from his open or secret enemies. And, that no enemies to their Religion and Country might ever hope to prosper in their attempts against them, when, to their great unhappiness, it should please God to deprive them of his Majesty's protection, they further declared their resolutions to assist and defend, to the utmost of their power, against the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other Pretenders whatsoever, every person and persons, who had right to succeed to the Crown of these Realms, by virtue of the two acts of Parliament, intitled, An act declaring the rights and liberties of the Subject, and settling the Succession of the Crown; and, An act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the Subject. And they concluded with their earnest prayers to Almighty God, for his Majesty's long and happy reign over them.

Their Lordships ordered all such, as were bound, willing, to sign this address, which was entered into their books. This was without a precedent, and yet it was promoted by those, who, as was thought, hoped, by so unusual a practice, to prevent any further proceedings on that head.

To this address his Majesty made this answer, "I heartily thank you for your very reasonable address, and for all your kind expressions of duty to me in it; and I recommend to you to take into your speedy consideration the other matters mentioned in my speech," and 1701-2. "and doubt not but that your resolutions will "be for the honour and safety of the Kingdom."

The address of the Commons. The Commons likewise, on the 5th of January, "returned their most humble and hearty
"thanks to his Majesty for his most gracious
"speech, and humbly craved leave to assure "him, that they would support and defend "his lawful and rightful title to the Crown of "these Realms against the pretended Prince of "Wales, and all his open and secret abettors and "adherents, and all other his Majesty's enemies
"whatsoever: And that they would enable him
"to shew his just resentment of the affront and "indignity offered to his Majesty and this Na"tion by the French King, in taking upon him
"to declare the pretended Prince of Wales King
"of England, Scotland, and Ireland: And that "they were firmly and unanimously resolved to "maintain and support the Succession to the "imperial Crown of this Realm, and the do"minions and territories thereto belonging,
"in the Protestant line, as the same was settled
"by an act, declaring the rights and liberties of "the Subject, and settling the Succession of the "Crown, and further provided for by an act "of the last Parliament, intitled, An act for the "further limitation of the Crown, &c. And "they declared, that, for the better effecting the "same, they would, to the utmost of their "power enable his Majesty to make good all "those Alliances his Majesty had made or "should make, pursuant to the addresses and "advices of his most dutiful and loyal Com"mons of the last Parliament, for the preserv"ing the liberties of Europe, and reducing the "exorbitant power of France."

To this address the King returned the following answer.

Gentlemen,

"I give you hearty thanks for this address,
"which I look upon as a good omen for the "Session. The unanimity, with which it pas"sed, adds greatly to the satisfaction I receive "from it. So good a step, at your first en"trance upon business, cannot but raise the "hopes of all, who wish well to England and "the common cause. I can desire no more of "you, than to proceed as you have begun; and "I depend upon it. For, when I consider how "cheerfully and universally you concurred in "this address, I cannot doubt but every one "of you will sincerely endeavour to make it
"effectual in all the parts of it."

The Lords having taken into consideration the dangerous state of Europe, more especially second ad-arising from the Duke of Anjou's possessing the d. of Crown of Spain, which made in effect a conjunction with France, and so must inevitably overthrow the balance of power, unless timely prevented by strong Alliances of other States and Princes, the 6th of January presented a second address to the King, wherein they made so true and ample a representation of the French King's unjust and violent proceedings, that it greatly helped to confirm every one in their just abhor-rence of them, and their zeal to have him reduced to reason (1).

To bring the House of Commons into more effectual measures for espousing and supporting the cause of a new war, the King commanded before the Commons.

(1) This address was as follows:

"We your Majesties loyal and dutiful subjects,
"the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament as"sembled, are highly sensible of what we owe to Al"mighty God for the great deliverance he hath "wrought for us by your Majesty. We are highly "sensible of the dangers you have hitherto in"curred for the public and private dangers, to which your "Sacred Person hath been exposed; and we hope
"the same Providence will carry your Majesty through "the great work, which seems reserved for you, the "reducing the exorbitant power of France, and main"taining the balance of Europe."

"All true Englishmen, since the decay of the Spa"nish Monarchy, have ever taken it for granted, that "the security of their Religion, Liberty and Prop"erty, that their honour, their wealth, and their "trade, depend chiefly upon the proper measures to "be taken from time to time in Parliament against "the growing power of France. But it is their pec"uliar blessing in your Majesty's reign, to have a "Prince upon the Throne, who not only agrees with "them in this opinion, but who, in the frequent "Parliaments assembled, is ever reminding them of "this their greatest concern; and who, to compleat
"his happiness, is always ready, with the hazard of "his Person, to support his Subjects and Allies, against "their common enemy."

"And we esteem it a further good fortune, in the "time of public danger, that the French King has "taken those measures, which will make it impos"sible for him to impose any more upon the world by "treaties so often violated. Neither can he hope
"any longer to cover his ambitious designs, or justify "his usurpations under the specious pretences of peace.
"Your Majesty has so justly represented the dan"ger, to which Europe is exposed by the French
"King's placing his Grandson on the Throne of Spain;

"your Majesty is so justly sensible, that under that "pretence he is become absolute Master of the whole "Spanish Monarchy; and we are so well apprized of "the dangerous consequence of this bold attempt,
"that we think it most proper to assure your Majes"ty in your own words, that we are under the high"est impatience, that speedy and effectual measures
"may be taken against the undoubted ambition of the "French King."

"And as the placing his Grandson upon the Throne
"of Spain is, visibly to the whole world, the cause of "all those dangers mentioned in your Majesty's "speech, and of the breach of the balance of power
"of Europe, which the People of England are so "deeply engaged to preserve; so we humbly conceive
"the remedy is as apparent as the disease; and that "your Majesty, your Subjects, and Allies, can never "be safe and secure, till the House of Austria be re"stored to their rights, and the invader of the Spanish
"Monarchy brought to reason."

"To conclude, Sir, as we humbly addressed to "your Majesty last Parliament to enter into Allian"ces with the Emperor, the States of Holland, and "other Princes and States, willing to unite against the "power of France; so we take the liberty at this "time to assure you, we are willing and zealous to "lay hold of this opportunity, which the blessing of "God and your Majesty's care have put into our "hands; resolving to make our utmost efforts for our "own security and the support of our Allies; de"siring of your Majesty to rest assured, that no time
"shall be lost, nor any thing wanting on our part,
"which may answer the reasonable expectations of "our friends abroad; not doubting but to support the "reputation of the English name, when engaged under
"so great a Prince in the glorious cause of maintain"ing the liberty of Europe."

1701-2. Mr. Secretary Vernon to lay before them the copies of the treaties of the Grand Alliance, viz.

1. The treaty between himself, King of Denmark, and the States-General, June 15, 1701.
2. The secret articles of that treaty.
3. The treaty between the Emperor, his Majesty, and the States-General, Sept. 7, 1701.
4. A Convention between his Majesty, the King of Sweden, and the States-General, Sept. 26, 1701.
5. The treaty between his Majesty and the States-General, Novemb. 11, 1701.

Their registrations.
Pr. H. C.
III. 187.

All which were so well approved, that the House immediately resolved, that a supply be granted to his Majesty; and that whoever should advance or lend to his Majesty's Exchequer the sum of six hundred thousand pounds, for the service of the fleet, should be repaid the same with interest at six per cent. out of the first aids to be granted this Session: And that whosoever should advance the further sum of fifty thousand pounds, for the subsistence of the guards and garrisons, should be repaid in like manner.

They then took the state of the navy into consideration, and ordered the Commissioners of the Admiralty to lay before that House a state of the fleet, and condition of each respective ship, and place, where they are; with a state of the debt of the navy, and an estimate of what was necessary for the extra repairs of it: And, to encourage the people with the hopes of making good all former deficiencies, they ordered an account of the debts of the Nation unprovided for, both principal and interest, to be laid before them. And further, to justify the disposal of public funds, they ordered the Speaker to write to two of the Trustees for the forfeited estates in Ireland to attend the House, and lay before them a full account of their proceedings in execution of that act. But what gave the greatest vigour to a war abroad and unity at home, was, that on the 9th of January they resolved unanimously, that leave be given to bring in a bill, for securing of his Majesty's Person, and the Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, and extinguishing the hopes of the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other Pretenders, and their open and secret abettors. And the next day they further resolved, that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to take care, that it be an article in the several treaties of Alliance between his Majesty and other Potentates, that no peace shall be made with France, until his Majesty and the Nation have reparation for the great indignity offered by the French King, in owning and declaring the pretended Prince of Wales King of England, Scotland, and Ireland: They agreed at the same time, "That the proportion of land-forces to act in conjunction with the forces of the Allies, for making good the Alliances, be forty thousand men, and forty thousand more for sea-service." These were the numbers the King by the Alliances was obliged to furnish, and all was consented to in every particular; though some angry men shewed much rancour against the King, and tried to cross every thing that was proposed, 1701-2. both as to the quota's of the troops, and as to the strength of the fleet.

The Commons began a bill for the attainder of the pretended Prince of Wales, to which, though it could not be opposed, much less stopped, many shewed a coldness, and absented themselves on the days, on which it was ordered to be read. It was sent up to the Lords, and passed that House on the 20th of February, with an addition of an attainder of the Queen, who acted as Queen regent for him. This was much opposed; for no evidence could be brought to prove the allegation; but the fact was so notorious, that it passed, and the bill was sent down again to the Commons. It was excepted to there as not regular, since but one precedent in King Henry VIII's time was brought for it; and in that the Commons had added some names, by a clause in a bill of attainder sent down to them by the Lords; and as this was a single precedent, so it seemed to be a hard one. For, attainders by bill being the greatest rigours of the law, the stretching of that ought to be avoided. It was therefore thought more proper to attain her by a bill apart than by a clause in another bill, to which the Lords agreed, and so the bill against the pretended Prince of Wales passed. The Lords also passed a new bill attainting the Queen, but that was let sleep in the House of Commons.

The matter, that occasioned the longest and warmest debates in both Houses, was an act for abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales, and him, for swearing to the King, by the title of rightful and lawful King, and his Heirs, according to the act of settlement. This was begun in the House of Lords, and the first design was, that the oath should be voluntary, it being only to be tendered to all persons, and their subscription or refusal to be recorded, without any other penalty. This was vehemently opposed by all the Tory party, at the head of whom the Earl of Nottingham set himself. Those, who argued against it, said, that this Government was first settled with another oath, which was like an original contract, and that it was unjust and unreasonable to offer a new one. There was no need of new oaths, as there was no new strength got by them. Oaths relating to men's opinions had been always looked upon as severe impositions. A voluntary oath seemed to be by its nature unlawful; for we cannot swear lawfully, unless we are required to do it. To all this it was answered, that in ancient time the oath of Allegiance was short and simple, because then it was not thought, that Princes had any right other than what was conveyed to them by law. But of late, and indeed very lately, new opinions had been started of a divine right, with which former times were not acquainted; so that it was necessary to know, who among us adhered to these opinions. The present Government was begun upon a comprehensive foot, it being hoped, that all parties might have been brought to concur in support-

"great conjuncture; and he hoped, that their joint endeavours would be successful for restoring the balance of Europe, and establishing the common security."

ing it. But the effects had not answered expectation: Distinctions had been made between a King de jure and a King de facto; by which men plainly declared, with whom they believed the right was lodged. This opinion mult, whenever that right comes to be claimed, oblige those, who hold it, to adhere to such Claimants. It seemed therefore in some sort necessary, that the Government should know, on whom it might depend. The discrimination made by such a test, was to be without compulsion or penalty; no hardship was put on any person by it. Those, who refused to give this security, would see what just cause of jealousy they gave, and would thereby be obliged to behave themselves decently and with due caution. When a Government tendered an oath, tho' under no penalty, that was a sufficient authority for all to take it, who were satisfied with the substance of it. While therefore there was so great a power beyond sea, that espoused so openly the pretensions of this young man, and while there were just grounds to suspect, that many at home favoured him, it seemed very reasonable to offer a method, by which it should appear, who obeyed the present Government from a principle, believing it lawful, and who submitted only to it as to a prosperous usurpation. About twenty Lords persisted in their opposition to this bill, those, who were for it, being thrice that number. But in the House of Commons, when it appeared how the Lords were inclined, they resolved to bring in a bill that should oblige all persons to take this abjuration. It was drawn by Sir Charles Hedges. All employments in Church and State were to be subject to it. Some things were added to the abjuration, such as an obligation to maintain the Government in King, Lords, and Commons, and to maintain the Church of England, together with the Toleration for Dissenters. Mr. Finch offered an alteration to the clause abjuring the Prince of Wales, so that it imported only an obligation not to assist him; but, though he pressed this with unusual vehemence in a debate, that he resumed seventeen times in one Session, against all rules, he had few to second him in it. The debate, whether the oath should be imposed or left free, held longer. It was carried but by one vote to impose it. The party chose that, rather than have it left free; for they reckoned, that the taking an oath, which was imposed, was a part of their submission to the usurpation; but the taking any oath, which strengthened the Government, of their own accord, did not suit with their other principles. But, to help the matter with a shew of zeal, they made the clause, which imposed it, very extensive, so that it comprehended all Clergymen, Fellows of Colleges, School-masters, and private Tutors. The clause of maintaining the Government in King, Lords, and Commons, was rejected with great indignation, since the Government was only in the King; the Lords and Commons being indeed a part of the Constitution, and of the Legislative body, but not of the Government. This was a direct Republican notion, and used to be condemned as such by the same persons, who now pressed it. It was further said, that, if it appeared, that our Constitution was in danger, it might be reasonable to secure it by an act and an oath apart; but since the single point, that required this abjuration, was the French King's declaring, that the pretended Prince of Wales was King of England, it was not fit to join matters foreign to that in this oath. Upon the same reason, the clause in favour of the Church, and of the Toleration were also laid aside. The design of this act was to discover to all, both at home and abroad, how unanimously the nation concurred in abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales. But here was a clause to one part of which (the maintaining the Church) the Dissenters could not swear; and even the more moderate men of the Church, who approved well of the Toleration, yet might think it too much to swear to maintain it, since it was reasonable to oblige the Dissenters to use their liberty modestly, by keeping them under the apprehension of having it taken away, if it was abused by them. One addition was offered to make it equally penal to compels or imagine the death of her Royal Highness the Princess Anne of Denmark, as it is to compels or imagine the death of the King's eldest Son and Heir, which was admitted without any debate or shadow of opposition. The Tories pretended great zeal for her Highness, and gave it out, that there was a design to set her aside, and to have the House of Hanover to succeed the King immediately; though it could never be made appear, that any motion of this kind had ever been either made or debated, even in private discourse, by any of the whole Whig party. Great endeavours were used, and not altogether without effect, to infuse this jealousy into the Princess, and into all about her, not without insinuations, that the King himself was inclined to it. When this clause was offered, its being without a precedent gave handle enough to oppose it; yet there was not one word said in opposition to it in either House, all agreeing heartily in it. This ought to have put an end to the suspicion; but surmises of that kind, when raised on design, are not soon parted with.

The Commons, after a long delay, sent up the bill for abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales. In the House of Lords the Tories opposed it all they possibly could; and, as it was a new bill, the debate was intirely open. They first moved for a clause, excusing the Peers from it. If this had been received, the bill would have been certainly lost, for the Commons would never have yielded to it. When this was rejected, they tried to bring it back to be voluntary. This motion was thought a strange inconsistency in those, who had argued against even the lawfulness of a voluntary oath; but it was visible, that they intended by it only to lose or at least to delay the bill. When this was over-ruled by the House, not without a mixture of indignation in some against the Movers, they offered next all those clauses, which had been rejected in the House of Commons, with some other very strange additions, by which they discovered both great weakness and an inveterate rancour against the Government; but all the opposition ended in a protest of several Peers against the bill, when it passed on the 24th of February (1).

The

(1) This protest was as follows, 1. We conceive, that no new oath should be imposed upon the subject, for-

1701-2. The public interest was now so visible, and the concurrent sense of the Nation ran so vehemently for a war, that even those, who were most averse to it, found it convenient to put on the appearance of zeal for it. The City of London was more united than it had been at any time during this Reign; for the two Companies, that traded to the East-Indies, saw, that their common interest required they should come to an agreement; and, though men of ill designs did all they could to obstruct it, yet in conclusion it was happily effected. This made the body of the City, which was formerly much divided between the two Companies, fall now into the same measures. But those, who intended to defeat all this good beginning of the Session, and to raise a new flame, set on debates, that must have embroiled all again, if they had succeeded in their designs. They began with complaints of some petitions and addresses, that had reflected on the proceedings of the last House of Commons, and particularly of the Kentish petition (1). However, it was carried against them, that it was the undoubted right of the People of England to petition or address to the King, for the calling, sitting, or dissolving of Parliaments, and for the redressing of grievances: And that every subject, under any accusation, either by impeachment or otherwise, 1701-2. had a right to be brought to a speedy trial. Not discouraged at this, they went on to complain, that the Lords had denied them justice in the matter of the late impeachments. This bore a long and hot debate in a very full House: But it was carried, though by a small majority, that justice had not been denied them. After this, the party gave over any farther struggling, and things were carried on with more unanimity.

The House had a multiplicity of other business before them; as the produce of the Customs; the Quaker's bill; the more effectual punishing of vagrants; the number, and charge, and condition of the forces to be filled up and raised for sea and land; the affair of the abuses committed in the King's brew-house at St. Catharine's; the Apothecaries bill; the care of regulating collections; the examination of stories related by William Fuller, the impostor; and of a letter sent to the Speaker from one Dr. Stringer, pretending the discovery of a plot against the Government; with other intervening affairs; notwithstanding which, the House proceeded vigorously in the more important business of the Nation; for, on the 3d of February, they resolved, That a sum not exceeding forasmuch as those, established by an act made in the first year of the reign of his Majesty and the late Queen Mary, were, together with our rights and liberties, ascertained in that act under the terms of our Submission to his Majesty, which were enacted to stand, remain, and be the law of this Realm for ever; and which, we conceive, do comprehend and necessarily imply all the duty and allegiance of the subject to their lawful King.

2. And much less should any new oath be imposed upon the Lords, with such a penalty as to lose their seats in Parliament, upon their refusing it; such a penalty being, in some measure, an intrenchment upon our Constitution, and expressly contrary to the standing order of this House made the 30th day of April 1675.

3. And, if such an infringement of the rights of Peers might be admitted, yet, in a matter of so great importance to all the Peers, we conceive, that in justice they should all have had notice of this matter, and been especially summoned to have attended the House upon so great an occasion; which has not been done, though it was moved and humbly desired on behalf of the absent Lords.

4. And, if any further evidence of the subjects fidelity were, at this time, necessary to be required, we conceive a new oath is no such evidence, nor any additional security to the Government; because those who have kept the oaths, which they have already taken, ought in justice to be esteemed good subjects; and those, who have broken them, will make no scruple of taking or breaking any others, that shall be required of them. And consequently this new oath may be of dangerous and pernicious consequence to the Government, by admitting such ill men, who do not fear an oath, into the greatest trusts, and who, under the specious pretence and protection of this new oath, which is to free them from suspicion, will have greater opportunities of betraying their King and their Country.

5. If a new oath were necessary, as we conceive it is not, yet the words of this oath are so very ambiguous, and have been so differently construed by several Lords, who have declared their sense of them, that this may become a snare to men's consciences, or tend to overthrow the obligation of an oath, by allowing men liberty to take it in their own sense; whereas this, as all other oaths, ought to be taken in the sense of the

Imposer, which hath not been declared in this case, though we earnestly pressed it, and though it has been done in other cases of the like nature.

6. And we conceive, that it necessarily follows from hence, that this oath can be no bond of union among those, who do take it; nor any true mark of distinction between the friends and the enemies of this Government; and therefore repugnant to the very nature of a test.

Pr. H. L. II. 34.

(1) In the contraverted election at Maidstone, between Thomas Blisse and Thomas Culpepper, Esquires, it was resolved, That the latter had been not only guilty of corrupt, scandalous, and indirect practices, in endeavouring to procure himself to be elected a Burgess, but likewise, being one of the instruments in promoting and presenting the scandalous, insolent, and seditious petition, commonly called, the Kentish petition, to the last House of Commons, was guilty of promoting a scandalous, villainous, and groundless reflection upon that House, by aspersing the Members with receiving French money, or being in the interest of France; for which offence he was ordered to be committed to Newgate, and to be prosecuted by his Majesty's Attorney-General. The House also resolved on the 26th of February, 1. That, agreeable to the opinion of a Committee appointed to consider of the rights, liberties, and privileges of their House, to assert, that the House of Commons is not the only Representative of the Commons of England, tends to the subversion of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, and the fundamental Constitution of the Government of this Kingdom. 2. That to assert, that the House of Commons have no power of Commitment, but of their own Members, tends to the subversion of the Constitution of the House of Commons. 3. That to print or publish any books or libels, reflecting upon the proceedings of the House of Commons, or any Member thereof, for or relating to his service therein, is a high violation of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons. Pr. H. C. III. 188.

1701-2. ceeding three hundred and fifty-two thousand pounds be granted to his Majesty, for the maintaining of guards and garrisons, and for providing for officers upon half-pay. And, to quicken the Allies, as well as to support the King, they resolved at the same time, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to interpose with his Allies, that they may increase their quota's of land-forces to be put on board the fleet, in proportion to the numbers his Majesty shall have on board his fleet." To which his Majesty answered, That he would do it. When they had settled the sums appropriated to the several uses of the war, they agreed, on the 7th of February, to another address to the King, "That he would provide for the half-pay officers in the first place, in the recruits and levies to be now made." To which he answered, That it was always his intention.

His Majesty, to encourage the dispatch of publick affairs, came to the House of Peers, and gave the Royal assent to a bill, which had miscarried in the last Parliament, intitled, An act for the appointing Commissioners to take, examine, and determine the debts due to the army, navy, and the transport-service, and also an account of prizes taken during the war.

Amendments and removals.

Before this, the King had thought proper to make several advancements and removals; Charles, Earl of Carlisle, was appointed first Lord Commissioner of the Treasury, in the room of the Lord Godolphin; and the Earl of Radnor was sworn of the Privy-Council, as was the Earl of Burlington. The Earl of Manchester was made one of the Secretaries of State, in the room of Sir Charles Hedges; the Earl of Pembroke was declared Lord High-Admiral, while the Duke of Somerset succeeded him as Lord-President of the Privy-Council.

The King's projects.

The King had likewise framed a scheme to reduce the exorbitant power of France. He had, before he left Holland, concerted measures with the Prussian and Dutch Generals for the siege of Keyserwaert, a place, which the Elector of Cologne had put into the hands of the French. The Elector of Hanover was at the same time to fall on and disarm the Princes of Wolfenbuttle, who, in the heart of the Empire, had raised troops with French money, and sent for a General of that Nation to command them. The King of the Romans and Prince Lewis of Baden were to besiege Landau; and the Emperor had engaged to send a powerful supply to Prince Eugene, to enable him to attack in form the city of Mantua, which he kept closely blocked up, and the conquest of which must very probably be attended with the total ruin of the French interest in Italy. Besides these designs, his Majesty was now laying another, both more glorious in the execution, and extensive in its consequences, with the Prince of d'Armstadt and the Duke of Ormond, and that was, the besieging Cadix both by sea and land; upon the taking of which place, the Prince of d'Armstadt had assured the King, that the Admiral of Castile, and several other Grandees of Spain, with all their dependents, would declare for the House of Austria. The three first of these projects were successfully executed, but the other two miscarried, as will be seen in their proper places.

Soon after this Session was opened, the Earl 1701-2. of Rochester wrote to the King, and asked leave to come over; which was soon granted him: But, when he signified this to the Council of Ireland, the whole board joined in a request to him, that he would lay before the King the great grievances, under which the whole Kingdom lay, by the proceedings of the Trustees for the forfeited estates, who stretched the authority, which the law gave them, in many instances, to the oppressing of the Nation. The Earl seemed uneasy at the motion, but promised to lay it before the King, which he did at his coming over. Soon after that, petitions were sent round all the Counties of Ireland, and signed by many, representing both the hardships of the act, and the severe methods taken by the Trustees in executing it. It was thought, that all this was set on secretly by the Court, in hope that some temper might be found in that matter, so that the King's grants might again take place in whole or in part. The House of Commons was moved to proceed severely against the Promoters of these petitions; yet the complaining of grievances had been so often asserted to be a right of the subject, that this was let fall. But, since no person appeared to justify the facts set forth or suggested in those petitions, they were voted false and scandalous; and this stopped a further progress in that method. The heat, with which that act had been carried, was now much qualified; and, the Trustees having adjudged so many claims in favour of Irish Papists, shewing too manifest a partiality for them, and having now fast two years, in which they had consumed all the rents, that arose out of the confiscated estates, the House was applied to for their interposition by many petitions relating to that matter. This was the more necessary, because, as has been related, when that act was passing, they had made a vote against receiving any petition relating to it. The thing had now lost much of the credit and value, that was set upon it at first; and, though the same party still opposed the receiving any petitions, yet the current was now so strong the other way, that they were all received, and in a great many cases justice was done, yet with a manifest partiality in favour of Papists; it being a maxim among all, who favoured King James's interests, to serve Papists, especially those whose estates were confiscated for adhering to him. One motion was carried, not without difficulty, in favour of those, who had purchased under the Grantees, and had made great improvements, that they should be admitted to purchase, with an abatement of two years value of the estates. The Earl of Athlone, whose case was very singular, having sold his grant to men, who had reason to think they had purchased under a secure title, a special clause was offered in their favour; but the party had studied so far to inflame the Nation against the Dutch, that in this the votes were equal, and, the Speaker's vote being to turn the matter, he gave it against the Purchasers. Many bills were brought in relating to Irish forfeitures, which took up the greatest part of this Session.

The King being very sensible, that the Protestant Succession would not be so easily settled in Scotland, where it might be retarded, on purpose for a claim to an independence on the Crown.

The King's letter for an union Scotland. Feb. 23. Pr. H. C. 189.

1701-2. Crown of England, and that nothing was more seasonable at this juncture, than an union of the two Kingdoms, wrote the following letter to the House of Commons, being disabled from coming to the House of Peers by a fall from his horse two days before :

William R.

" HIS Majesty, being at present hindered by an unhappy accident from coming in person to his Parliament, is pleased to signify to the House of Commons, by message, what he designed to have spoken to both Houses from the Throne. His Majesty, in the first year of his Reign, did acquaint the Parliament, that Commissioners were authorized in Scotland to treat with such Commissioners, as should be appointed in England, of proper terms for uniting the two Kingdoms, and at the same time expressed his great desire of such an union. His Majesty is fully satisfied, that nothing can more contribute to the present and future security and happiness of England and Scotland, than a firm and inviolable union between them; and he cannot but hope, that, upon a due consideration of our present circumstances, there will be found a general disposition to this union. His Majesty would esteem it a peculiar felicity, if, during his Reign, some happy expedient for making both Kingdoms one might take place; and is therefore extremely desirous, that a treaty for that purpose might be set on foot; and does, in the most earnest manner, recommend this affair to the consideration of the House."

The occasion of this letter.
Burnet.

The immediate occasion of this message was a motion, which the Earl of Nottingham had made in the House of Lords, when the act of Abjuration was agreed to; who said, that though he had differed from the majority of the House in many particulars relating to it, yet he was such a friend to the design of the act, that, in order to the securing a Protestant Succession, he thought an union of the whole Island was very necessary; and that therefore they should consider how both Kingdoms might be united. But in order to this, and previous to it, he moved, that an address should be made to the King, that he would be pleased to dissolve the Parliament now sitting in Scotland, and to call a new one, since the present Parliament was first a Convention, and then turned into a Parliament, and was continued ever since, so that the legality of it might be called in question; and it was necessary, that so important a thing as the union of both Kingdoms should be treated in a Parliament, against the Constitution of which no exception could lie. This motion was warmly opposed; for that Nation was then in such a ferment, that the calling a new Parliament would have been probably attended with bad consequence: For which reason that project was let fall, and no progress made upon the King's message.

The King's illness and fall from his horse.
Burnet.

The King seemed all this winter in a fair way of recovery: he had made the Royal apartments in Hampton-Court very noble; and he was so much pleased with the place, that he went thither once a week, and rode often about the park. But on the 21st of February riding from Kensington, as he was putting his horse to the gallop, the horse fell, and he, being then very feeble, fell off, and broke his right collar-bone. Upon this accident, he was carried to Hampton-Court, where the bone was set by Monsieur Ronjat, Serjeant-surgeon to the King, who, having felt his pulse, told him, that he was feverish, and that any other person in his condition would be let blood. The King answered, as for that, he had now and then had a head-ach, and some shivering fits for a fortnight past, and had that very morning a pain in his head before he went out a hunting. In the afternoon the King finding himself easy, contrary to advice, returned to Kensington, and slept almost all the way in his coach. He came to Kensington about nine at night, with his right arm tied up, and, as he entered the great bed-chamber, he saw Dr. Bidloo, to whom he said, "I have got a hurt in my arm; pray come, and see it." And soon after added to this effect: "I was riding in the park at noon, and while I endeavoured to make the horse change his walking into a gallop, he fell upon his knees. Upon that I meant to raise him with the bridle; but he fell forwards on one side, and so I fell with my right shoulder upon the ground. It is a strange thing, for it happened upon a smooth level ground. Ronjat says, there is a little bone broken, and indeed I feel some pain towards my back." At the same time he pointed with his left hand to the shoulder-blade, saying, There, there. Dr. Bidloo, finding his pulse in good order, dissuaded him from bleeding; and, after viewing the affected part, told him, that the right collar-bone was broke obliquely, a little below its juncture with the shoulder-blade. Then the King asked, If it was well set? And, the Doctor answering No, he said to Ronjat, "Justify yourself, Monsieur Ronjat, is it well set?" Ronjat replied, "It was well set; but that the jolting of the coach, and the loosening of the bandage, had occasioned a disunion." After the fracture was taken care of, the King went to bed, and slept the whole night so soundly, that the Gentlemen, who sat up with him, said, they did not hear him complain so much as once.

The King seemed in a fair way of doing well till Sunday, March the 1st, a fluxion fell upon his knee, which was a great pain and weakness to him, and thought to be a very ill symptom. He took it as a warning for the dispatch of public affairs, and therefore the next morning this message was sent from the House of Peers to the Commons:

" Mr. Speaker,

" The King hath granted a Commission under the Great Seal for passing the Royal Assent to those bills, which have been agreed to by both Houses of Parliament; and, the Lords commissioned by the King, do desire, that this House would presently come up with their Speaker, to be present at the passing thereof." Then the Speaker with the House went up, and the Lord-Keeper acquainted both Houses, that his Majesty, by an unhappy accident, had been prevented from coming in person, and had granted a Commission to several Peers for passing the bills therein mentioned; and then the Royal Assent was given by Commission to these and some other bills:

1701-2. An act for the attainder of the pretended Prince of Wales of high treason.

An act that the solemn affirmation and declaration of the people, called Quakers, shall be accepted, instead of an oath in the usual form.

On the 3d of March, the King had a short fit of an ague, which he regarded so little, that he said nothing of it; and the next day he seemed so well recovered of the lameness in his knee, that he took several turns in the gallery at Kensington; but at length, finding himself tired and faint, he sat down on a couch, and fell asleep, which probably occasioned that shivering fit, which soon after seized him, and which turned to a fever, accompanied with vomiting and a looseness. Upon this, the King thought proper to send for Sir Thomas Millington, who attended him to the last moment; as did also Sir Richard Blackmore, Dr. Hutton, Dr. Hannes, Dr. Brown, Dr. Laurence, Sir Theodore Colladon, Dr. Bidloo, and others of that faculty, who administered several remedies to him, that gave him great relief. He continued indifferently well till the 5th, when his vomiting and looseness returned so violent upon him, that he refused to take any sustenance till two o'clock the next morning, when he drank a cup of chocolate, and soon after took a sleeping-draught, which had that good effect, that he rested for three hours after. In the forenoon he took some broth and a cordial, and found himself somewhat easier, though excessively weak. His mind was so fixed upon the public interest, that he immediately ordered another Commission for passing the Malt and Abjuration bills, that were ready for his Assent; and, because he was now so weak, that he could not write his own name, a stamp was prepared, for his signing the Commission, which, according to form, must be signed by the King, in the presence of the Lord-Keeper and the Clerks of the Parliament. They came to the King when his fit began, and staid some hours before they were admitted. In the mean while, some of the House of Commons moved for an adjournment, though the Lords had sent to desire them not to adjourn for some time. By this means the party hoped, that the bill of Abjuration would be lost. But, as it was contrary to all rules to adjourn, when such a message was sent to them by the Lords, they waited till the King had signed the Commission, by which the Royal Assent was given to the Abjuration-bill in the last day of the King's life (1).

On the same day, about five in the morning, the Earl of Albemarle, who had been sent over to Holland to put things in readiness for an early campaign, arrived at Kensington, and immediately went to wait upon the King, who, being willing at that time to be retired, bid him go and take some rest, and come to him some hours after. The Earl attended accordingly, and gave so good an account of the posture of affairs in Holland, that, if matters of that kind could have wrought on the King, it must have revived him; but the coldness, with which he received it, shewed how little hopes were left.

Soon after he said, Je tire vers ma fin, (I draw towards my end.)

In the evening an extraordinary Council was called, before whom the Physicians appeared frequently; and at last acquainted them by Sir Thomas Millington, that all their hopes, under God, depended upon the use of those remedies, which they had already prescribed, and upon his Majesty's taking some little sustenance. Upon this the Duke of Devonshire, and several other Noblemen, desired Dr. Bidloo to press him to take something. Accordingly Dr. Bidloo spoke to him in Dutch, and he made answer, Liste me up, and I will take as much as I can of what is thought proper. Then he took some of Ralegh's cordial, with the julep, and soon after some hot claret. About the same time he thanked Dr. Bidloo for the great care he had taken of him, adding to this effect, "I know that you and the other learned Physicians have done all that your art can do for my relief; but, finding all means ineffectual, I submit." About three o'clock on Sunday morning he called again for Dr. Bidloo, and complained to him, that he had had a bad night, and could not sleep. Upon that he sat up, and leaned on him, saying, "I could sleep in this posture: Sit nearer me, and hold me so for a little time." In this posture he slept about half an hour, and, when he awakened, said, "You can bear me up no longer." Then he was held up by Mr. Freeman on the right side, and Mr. Sewell on the left, both of them having pillows in their arms. Soon after the Physicians gave notice, that they were apprehensive he had not long to live.

The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Salisbury attended him from Saturday morning, and did not leave him till he died. The Archbishop prayed some time with him on that day; but he was then so weak, that he could scarce speak, but gave him his hand, as a sign, that he firmly believed the truth of the Christian Religion, and said, he intended to receive the Sacrament. His reason and all his senses were intire to the last minute. About five on Sunday morning he desired the Sacrament, and went through the office with great appearance of seriousness, but could not express himself. The Lords of the Privy-Council, with many of the Nobility and Gentry, attended in the adjoining apartments, and several of them were called in at times, to whom he spoke a little, and then they withdrew. Amidst all their tears the King did not betray the least concern or fear of death, but laboured to speak with ease and cheerfulness; and particularly when he talked a little to Lord Overkirk, he raised his voice, whom he thanked for his long and faithful services. He took leave of the Duke of Ormond and others, and delivered to the Lord Albemarle the keys of his closet and scrutore, telling him, that he knew what to do with them. After seven o'clock, he took Dr. Bidloo by the hand, and, breathing with great difficulty, asked him, If this could last long? The Doctor answering No, he asked again, How long? To which the Doctor replied, An hour, or an

He was often looking up to heaven in many short ejaculations. Between seven and eight o'clock, he began to rattle in his throat, when the commendatory prayer was said for him; and, as it ended, he expired in the arms of Mr. Sewell, one of the pages of the backstairs, in the fifty-second year of his age, having reigned thirteen years and one month wanting five days. As soon as the breath was out of his body, the Lords Lexington and Scarborough, who were then in waiting, ordered Ronjat to take off from the King's left arm a black ribbon, which tied next to his skin a gold ring with some hair of the late Queen Mary, which shewed the tender regard he had for her memory.

The King

Two days after the Royal corps was opened (1) and embalmed, and, having lain for some time in state at Kensington, was interred with all the magnificence, which a private funeral could admit of, on Sunday night, April the 12th, in a vault in Henry VII's Chapel in Westminster-Abbey; and, in the beginning of May, a will, which he had made October 18, 1695, and deposited in the hands of Monsieur Schuylenberg, was opened at the Hague, whereby it appeared, that he had appointed his cousin, the Prince Fris-son of Nassau, eldest son of Prince Casimir Nassau, Stadtholder of Friseland, his sole and universal Heir, and the States-General his Executors, without mentioning either the King of Prussia, the Prince of Nassau Siegen, or the Princess of Anhalt, who all claimed a right to his Succession. But, by a codicil annexed to that will, the Lordship of Breveer, and a legacy of two hundred thousand gilders were given to the Earl of Albemarle.

Thus lived and died King William III. He had a thin and weak body; his hair brown, and his constitution delicate. He had a Roman eagle nose, bright and sparkling eyes, a large front, and a countenance composed to gravity and authority. All his senses were critical and exquisite. He was always asthmatical; and, the dregs of the small pox falling on his lungs, he had a constant deep cough. His behaviour was solemn and serious, seldom cheerful, and but with a few. He spoke little and very slowly, and most commonly with a disgusting dryness, which was his character at all times, except in a day of battle; for then he was all fire, though without passion, and was every where, and looked to every thing. He had no great advantage from his education. De Witt's discourses were of great use to him; and he being apprehensive of the observation of those, who were looking narrowly into every thing he said or did, had brought himself under an habitual caution, that he could never shake off, though in another scene it proved as hurtful, as it was then necessary to his affairs. He spoke Dutch, French, English, and German equally well; and he understood the Latin, Spanish, and Italian, so that he was well fitted to command armies composed of several Nations. He had a memory, that amazed all about him, for it never failed him. He was an exact observer of men and things. His strength lay rather in a true discerning and a sound judgment, than in imagination or invention. His designs were always great and good; but it was thought he trusted too much to that, and did not defend enough to the humours of his people, to make himself and his notions more acceptable to them. This in a Government, that has so much of freedom in it as ours, was more necessary than he was inclined to believe. His reservedness grew on him, so that it disgusted most of those, who served him; but he had observed the errors of too much talking more than those of too cold a silence. He did not like

(1) The Physicians and Surgeons, who were summoned by the Privy-Council to assist at and examine the dissection, made this report:

1. Upon viewing the body before the dissection, the following appearances were remarkable. The body in general was much imaciated. Both the legs up to the knees, and a little higher, as also the right hand and arm, as far as the elbow, were considerably swelled. There was likewise on the left thigh, near the hip, a bladder full of water as big as a small pullet's egg, resembling a blain.

2. Upon opening the belly, the guts were found of a livid colour, and the blood contained in their vessels black. The gut, called lium, had in some places the marks of a slight inflammation. The stomach, pancreas, mesentery, liver, gall, bladder, spleen, and kidneys, were all found, and without fault.

3. In the thorax or chest we observed, that the right side of the lungs adhered to the pleura, and the left much more; from which, upon separation, there issued forth a quantity of purulent or frothy serum. The upper lobe of the left side of the lungs, and the part of the pleura next it, were inflamed to a degree of mortification: And this we look upon as the immediate cause of the King's death. From the ventricles of the heart, and the greater blood-vessels arising out of them, were taken several large, tough, flesh-like substances of the kind called Pelypus. The heart itself was of the smaller size, but firm and strong.

4. Upon laying bare the right collar-bone, we found it had been broken near the shoulder and well set. Some extravasated blood was lodged above and below the fracture.

5. The brain was perfectly sound, and without any sign of distemper.

6. It is very rare to find a body with so little blood as was seen in this, there being more found in his lungs, than in all the parts besides put together.

1701-2. like contradiction, nor to have his actions censured; but he loved to employ and favour those, who had the arts of complacency; yet he did not love flatterers. His genius lay chiefly to war, in which his courage was more admired than his conduct. Great errors were often committed by him, but his heroic courage set things right, as it animated those, who were about him. He was too lavish of money on some occasions both in his Buildings and to his Favourites; but too sparing in rewarding services or in encouraging those, who brought intelligence. He was apt to take ill impressions of people, and these stuck long with him; but he never carried them to indecent revenges. He gave too much way to his own humour almost in every thing, not excepting that, which related to his own health. He knew all foreign affairs well, and understood the state of every Court in Europe very particularly. He instructed his own Ministers himself, but he did not apply enough to affairs at home. He tried how he could govern us by balancing the two parties one against another, but he came at last to be persuaded, that the Tories were irreconcilable to him; and he was resolved to try and trust them no more. He believed the truth of the Christian Religion very firmly, and he expressed an horror at Atheism and Blasphemy; and, though there was much in both at his Court, yet it was always denied to him, and kept out of sight. He was most exemplarily decent and devout in the public exercises of the worship of God; only on week-days he came too seldom to them. He was an attentive hearer of sermons, and was constant in his private prayers, and in reading the Scriptures, and, when he spoke of religious matters, which he did not often, it was with a becoming gravity. He was much possessed with the belief of absolute decrees, because he did not see, how the belief of Providence could be maintained upon any other supposition. His indifference as to the forms of Church-government, and his being zealous for Toleration, together with his cold behaviour towards the Clergy, gave them generally very ill impressions of him. In his deportment towards all about him, he seemed to make little distinction between the good and the bad, and those who served well, or those who served him ill. He loved the Dutch, and was much beloved among them; but the ill returns he met with from the English Nation, their jealousies of him, and their perverseness towards him, had too much soured his mind, and had in a great measure alienated him from them, which he did not take care enough to conceal, though he saw the ill effects this had upon his business. He grew in his last years too remiss and careless as to all affairs, till the treacheries of France awakened him, and the dreadful conjunction of the French and Spanish Monarchies gave so loud an alarm to all Europe; for the watching over the French Court, and the opposing of their practices, was the prevailing passion of his whole life. Few men had the art of concealing and governing passion more than he had, yet few men had stronger passions, which were seldom felt but by inferior servants, to whom he usually made such recompences for any sudden or indecent vents he might give his anger, that they were glad every time it broke upon them. He was too easy to the faults of those about him, when they did not lie in his way, or cross any of his designs; and he was so apt to think, that his Ministers might grow insolent, if they should find, that they had much credit with him, that he seemed to have made it a maxim to let them often feel, how little power they had even in small matters. His Favourites had a more intire power, but he accustomed them only to inform him of things, but to be sparing in offering advice, except when it was asked. It was not easy to account for the reasons of the favour, that he shewed in the highest instances to two persons beyond all others, the Earls of Portland and Albemarle, they being in all respects men, not only of different, but even of opposite characters. Secrecy and fidelity were the only qualities, in which it could be said, that they did in any fort agree. He appeared to be a person raised up by God to resist the power of France, and the progress of tyranny and persecution. The series of the five Princes of Orange, that was now ended in him, was the noblest Succession of Heroes, that we find in any history; and the thirty years, from the year 1672 to his death, in which he acted so great a part, carried in them so many amazing steps of a glorious and distinguishing providence, that in the words of David he might be called, The man of God's right hand, whom he made strong for himself. After all the abatements, that may be allowed for his errors and faults, he ought still to be reckoned among the greatest Princes, that our history, or indeed any other can afford.

This is the character of King William, as drawn by Bishop Burnet, who had occasion to know him well, having (as he says himself) observed him very carefully in a course of sixteen years. To this character shall be added the following account of the same Prince, penned and communicated by a person, extremely well versed in the affairs of those times.

To draw a character, with any tolerable degree of propriety and truth, is far from being an easy undertaking. The difficulty increases from a variety of particulars, and many appearances of strong contradictions. This is evidently the case of the Prince, of whom I shall presume to offer a free and impartial account.

He came into the world, and struggled thro' life with many and perpetual inconveniencies and disadvantages. The Father, dying immediately after his attempt on Amsterdam, produced many misfortunes to the Son, with regard both to his education and interest. Indolence and aversion to business, which requires confinement, are great misfortunes to a Prince; and they are consequences of not being under the restraints proper to form the mind to knowledge. Without attention and careful deliberation, how can any thing be well performed in the great scenes of life?

In his long minority, power and the conduct of affairs had been in the hands of the sure enemies of the Orange family; but under these disadvantages, when he was not above sixteen or seventeen years of age, he gave an instance of prudence, caution, and wisdom, worthy the experience of the oldest and ablest Minister of State. The fact is so very remarkable, that it deserves a particular relation. De Witt, having taken him under his government and tuition, in order to be master of all his actions and motions, 1701-2. tions, removed all his old servants, and placed others about him, in whom he could confide. One young man, who had constantly attended him from a child, and was his Valet de chambre, at the earnest request of the Prince, was suffered to continue in his service. But De Witt took care, at the same time, to engage him in his interest. The Prince had a constant, but very secret, correspondence with the English Court, in matters that concerned his own views and interest. On the receipt of letters from thence, he usually put them into his waistcoat pocket. The Valet, when his Highness was in bed and asleep, took out the letters, copied them for the Pensionary, and carefully replaced the originals. This continued some time, till De Witt, talking with the Prince upon his affairs, and warning him against intrigues inconsistent with their Government, and dangerous to his Highness, let fall expressions, from which the Prince inferred his having seen some of his secret letters from England. He took not the least notice to any one of what had happened, but, when he went to bed, feigning sleep, he saw the faithless operation of his Valet without the least notice or motion. He continued to conceal the discovery, but took care, in his subsequent letters to England, to write in such a manner, and to receive such answers for his waistcoat-pocket, for the treacherous use of his servant, and De Witt's information, as by degrees removed his jealousies, and kept him ever after in a false security relating to the Prince's transactions and correspondencies abroad. When the Prince had overcome all his difficulties, and was made Stadtholder, he coolly let his Valet know what great service he had done, while he was intending to betray him. After this confounding explanation, he was immediately dismissed from his service: But the Prince notwithstanding gave him a place for life about an hundred a year at Breda.

When he entered into public life, most of his friends and assistants were men distinguished only by noise and zeal. Circumstances as importantly unhappy attended him in England. The Marquis of Halifax, the Earl of Danby, Sir Edward Seymour, and several others, had been eminently useful in the contrivance and execution of the Revolution, and in fixing the Government. Neglects and disappointments under King James, and great expectations from the new settlement, were the chief motives of their behaviour. They could have no sense of civil and religious liberty, nor real concern for it's interests either at home or abroad, the whole of whose lives had been spent in bold and constant endeavours for it's subversion. But though, in the distribution of places, they had their full proportion, yet, because all their views were not answered, they quickly conceived bitter discontents, and infused their temper into all their dependents; but continued in place, in order more effectually to distress and disturb. Thus they had many opportunities of fatally advising in home and foreign affairs. They hated the King, and endeavoured to make him odious for his moderation and good temper in matters of Religion; and yet they flattered, and pretended zeal for his honour. They laboured with too much success in giving him disgusts to those, who were his friends both by principle and inclination; and engaged him to confide in, and employ those, whose enmities to him were unalterable.

The avarice and rapaciousness of foreign Favourites was another very great misfortune. In order to silence the clamours of enemies, some of the chief of the Tories, particularly Danby, were liberal partakers in the Crown-lands. Such proceedings could not fail to be matter of grief and offence to the best friends of the Government. The King's regards to a favourite Lady, not many weeks after the Queen's decease, were published to the world by a most profuse and prodigious grant. This Lady's influence and management in general are known; but many particulars have not been represented, and many can never be produced to light. She engaged persons of the first rank to enter into business. She offered the Tories, by way of bargain for her Irish grants, to have Lord Sommers removed, whose disgrace, as well as that of the Earl of Portland, was chiefly owing to her address. Her brother, the Earl of Jersey, was a zealous and known Jacobite, and yet had all sorts of honour and trusts. A great variety of particulars might be added, but the reflections, which arise from what has been mentioned, is sufficient to our purpose.

A military life was most agreeable to his genius; but here his disadvantages and distresses were perpetual. He came to the rescue of his country in the lowest and most dejected state. His first performances are therefore to be regarded as the most glorious particulars of his conduct. His principal Ally, the Spaniard, only gave him vain promises and assurances, for they were every where feeble and unprepared.

After he came to England, in how many ways was he embarrassed? The unredressed and unsettled state of Ireland gave the enemy great advantages on the Continent. The Court of Vienna only attended to the war in Turky; every thing else was neglected. The German troops had no existence but in pompous lists published before the campaign. The part, which the Elector of Bavaria afterwards acted openly, seems to give credit to the suspicions, which were then entertained. Some traitors belonging to him were discovered, but perhaps not the principal. The King, for the support of the wars, had the name and sound of great supplies, but effectual services were very different from these appearances. The funds were insufficient, and the difficulties in raising money immediately were insuperable. When a little more vigour both at home and abroad began to open to us better views, the disorderly state of the coin defeated all the fair appearances.

The conduct of the treaty of Ryswick fell into the hands of the incapable or disaffected. After the peace, the King was on terms of diffidence and distrust with all his capable friends; which the discontented, the disaffected, and the eager for popularity improved into the fatal reduction of the army. When the long-dreaded event of the death of the King of Spain happened, he was found in the hands of those whose enmity was immoveable. They treated France with esteem and respect, while his Allies endured all the effects of their infolence and pride.

With regard to his military abilities and skill, the world has been greatly divided in their opinion.

1701-2. opinion. The Tories, while he was alive, prevailed in the obtaining places for themselves, by assurances of their peculiar regards to regal power; but, after his decease, they took the first opportunity of stigmatizing him as a Warrior; as appeared from their dividing so strongly for the word retrieved. His courage, bravery, and resolutions, were unquestionable; his conduct, temper, and skill, are not so generally allowed. Something of this kind will ever be supposed in a Commander, who fails of success in almost every enterprize. Victory scarce ever attended him, except in the passage of the Boyne. He expelled the French from most of the fortresses belonging to the Dutch, but was far from making any effectual opposition to their progress in the Spanish Netherlands; and they acquired, in a few years, towns and territories, which have contributed to their strength and riches, in an amazing and terrible manner.

In his political and civil management, true skill and resolution seem to have been much wanting. Perpetual changes of persons and parties were notorious throughout his Reign. Those, who were against all engagements, and all assurances of the fidelity of his subjects, and who, in important struggles, opposed the owning him as lawful and rightful King, after such repeated indignities, were preferred to his sure and most sincere friends. The Convention Parliament, to which he owed his all, was dissolved; the betrayers of Corporations, and the tools of Arbitrary power in the two former Reigns, were protected and preserved; while his zealous adherents were delivered up to contempt and disgrace. In return for this astonishing preference, the City of London chose such of the Members, as were then alive, who had been imposed on them by King James, who had delivered them from the incumbrance of all their privileges. The new Senate placed one at their head, who was of a malevolent and corrupt temper, and had been ready and willing to perform for the abdicated Monarch, the most profligate and desperate services. With regard to the coin, the King followed the mischievous and distressing advice of Seymour, and rejected the safe and salutary Councils of Sommers. Plottings and treasons of the most bloody and barbarous kind were repeated by great numbers of people of all ranks; and yet all possible methods were used to preserve from punishment the guilty; and the Leaders, in such managements, continued to be taken into his Councils and Confidence.

An effectual opposition to France, seemed to employ his most ardent wishes and endeavours; but measures quite opposite were pursued. The whole winter after the peace of Ryswick, he did not once confer either with Lord Sommers, or any of those who served with inclination and affection. The Earl of Rocheſter, and his adherents, though in the highest posts, after the infamous proceedings of Lewis XIV. with regard to the Spanish Succession, recommended that King's being treated with respect in the House of Lords, and resented some just freedoms. The Earl of Jersey, who is said to have often avowed to the King his affection for St Germain's, was sent Ambassador to France; and, instead of duly observing and resenting the perfidy and indignities of that Court, his business was to cultivate an interest with King James.

But at last the King was sensible of these errors, and, just before his death, resolved to bring again into his service the true friends to himself, and to the liberty and interests of his Kingdom.

Pride and neglect were imputed to him by the great Commanders, with whom he was concerned in military affairs, who thought themselves treated with too great a coldness and reserve. As he had nothing of the easy and affable in his manner, this is said to have offended the Elector of Bavaria, and to have occasioned great prejudice to the common cause. To his first conceptions of what was proper to be done, he adhered in a determined manner; and no counsels, except what were agreeable to these, were regarded.

Such in this world are the parts, which enter into the composition of the eminent and distinguished. However, the great Name which we have so freely placed in the most impartial light, deserves, on many accounts, to be remembered with gratitude and honour.

He had just views of the horrid consequences of the unrestrained progress of the power of France. With great integrity and vigour, he therefore made it the business of his life to oppose all it's mischievous motions; nor did he faint or grow weary in the glorious and difficult toil. He had an enemy, who was ever well prepared and provided; while his own situation was quite different. He was often baffled and disappointed, and rarely attended with triumphant success. However, the preservation of Europe from absolute subjection, may justly be ascribed to his endeavours. He knew in what a scandalous and mercenary manner his two Predecessors had surrendered themselves to the will and pleasure of the enemy; nor was he ignorant of the weak and corrupt condition of many other States. But, though thus discouraged, the offer of the Sovereignty of the greatest part of his country could not seduce him from the common cause. This is sufficient to silence the accusations of his enormous love of power.

As he proved himself the friend of the liberties of Europe, and preserved it's free States from being the oppressed Provinces of an universal Monarchy, so equally sincere was his zeal for the religious rights of mankind. He had a just abhorrence of Popish tyranny and usurpation on conscience. The bitterness and envyings amongst Protestants gave him great concern; and he wished for an effectual cure of these evils, and contrived the most proper measures. Uniformity in opinions and practices is not to be compassed: Therefore mutual forbearance, and restraining the several parties and professions among Christians from injuring one another, ever had his constant attention. The religious notions, which education and a habit of thinking had fixed, gave him no aversion to those who opposed his sentiments. In his days, and by his means, the firm and consistent foundations were laid, of what is truly valuable in civil or religious affairs. Before his time, avowing the rights of mankind, in a full and consistent manner, was criminal or disgraceful: As they had power and opportunity, the several parties of Christians oppressed and injured one another.

1701-2. An unthinking and ungrateful world is only delighted with hurry and mischief, and has therefore no sense of it's most valuable benefactors. But those, who will reflect and consider, must acknowledge a more real friend to human beings never appeared in this part of the earth. To him we owe the asserting and securing our most important immunities and privileges. To him the intellectual world is indebted for the full freedom of debating all subjects, and of avowing and defending their sentiments.

The appearances of Providence for his safety and preservation were many and very affecting. No life was ever more eminently exposed in the day of battle, nor did his many disadvantages abate his ardour: Far from declining, he fought opportunities. His enemies, not satisfied with the several chances thus offered, by many vile and dark methods, attempted his destruction both at home and abroad.

From an immature birth he derived a weak and feeble constitution; but a vigorous mind carried him through a perpetual succession of cares and labours. Considering an accidental hurt befalling a decayed and wasted frame, his days were prolonged beyond all expectation. His last work completed his good designs for conveying to us the great and valuable blessing of the Protestant Succession. Had he been cut off in any of the periods of his glorious struggle for our happiness and the welfare of Europe, the miseries and mischiefs, which must naturally have followed, would surely have equalled all the suggestions of the blackest and most melancholy imagination. But the unthinking part of the world, because wholly delivered, have not been, nor ever will be, duly sensible.

Henry IV. of France, and Queen Elizabeth, are perpetually produced as instances of superior Princely merit. How truly King William not only equalled but excelled them, in the really glorious qualities of a great and good Governor, might easily be made appear. On a careful examination, his difficulties and distresses will be found greater than theirs; and his faults, and mismanagements, less enormous and more excusable.

Before the conclusion of this Reign, it will be necessary briefly to relate such Ecclesiastical matters, as have been purposely omitted, that the narration of the Civil affairs might not be interrupted.

And here it may not be improper to premise an account of the rise and progress of our religious differences, from the Reformation to the time of the Revolution.

When Christendom was over-run with the superstitious and absurd doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome, and such things were established, as contradicted not only the Scriptures, but the reason, understanding, and very senses of men, then it was that several Reformers arose in different parts of Europe, and separated from a Church so overwhelmed with corruption and error. It was laid down as a maxim, that the Scriptures are the sole rule of Faith, wherein all things necessary to Salvation are so plainly revealed, that every man may judge for himself, and needs not an infallible guide in matters of religion. Upon this foundation, Infallibility, Transubstantiation, Indulgences, Worship of Saints and Angels, with a numerous train of the like absurdities, were attacked, and proved to be repugnant to the Gospel. But the misfortune was, that, in the progress of the Reformation, the principle on which it was grounded was intirely forgot; instead of restoring Christianity to it's primitive state, as contained in our Saviour's last instructions to his Apostles, That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name to all nations: Instead of adhering to this plain and rational scheme of the Gospel, St Austin's doctrines were made the standard of Religion, and such systems were framed, as were as unintelligible to reason, and as difficult to be proved by Scripture, as the tenets of that Church from which the Reformers had separated. They were not content with saying, that by the sin of our first parents all mankind are great sufferers; that the effects of it are transmitted to all their posterity, namely, loss of paradise, labour and toil, sorrow in conception, subjection to sickness, diseases, and all the calamities of life; and finally, to the greatest of all natural evils, death itself. They were not satisfied with asserting, that man, since the fall, is prone to evil, too easily led astray by the force of example, education, prejudice, and temptation; and that, when the world lay buried in wickedness, God sent his Son to quicken men to a sense and practice of their duty, by the assurance of pardon, for his sake, of past offences upon repentance and amendment of life; by the promise of everlasting happiness to well-doers, and by the threatening of future punishment to all evil-doers, according to their respective deserts. Not content with this, the Reformers, copying after St Austin, declared, that Adam was the representative of all mankind, and consequently not only the effects, but also the guilt, of his sin is transferred on all his descendants, who are thereby obnoxious both to death and eternal damnation. That, since the fall, how free soever the will may be as to civil affairs, it is so far enslaved as to religious matters, that man is totally unable of himself to think a good thought, or to do a good action (1). That God, before the foundations of the world were laid, secretly decreed to save a certain number of persons, whom he has unconditionally chosen out of lost mankind. That, as Adam's sin is imputed to all his posterity, so the righteousness of Christ is imputed to the Elect, for whom only He died. That to the Elect is given both a preventing Grace, that they may have a good thought, and an assisting Grace, to enable them to put it in practice. That in this state of Grace the Elect will certainly persevere, and cannot finally fall from it. That the rest of mankind, for want of this efficacious and irresistible Grace,

(1). As the Papists held, that men were able not only to perform their duty, but even to do works of supererogation, or more than were necessary for salvation; so the Reformers ran into the other extreme, and asserted, that man of himself can do no work acceptable to God.

Grace, remain in a state of curse and damnation (1).

Such were the doctrines that at first more generally prevailed among the Reformers, with this difference only, that some (thence called Supralapsarians) asserted, that God decreed Adam's sin, and the damnation, as well as salvation, of such as should be lost for his own glory; whilst others (thence styled Sublapsarians) affirmed, that, Adam having sinned freely, God decreed to save a certain number, and left the rest in their fallen state, without any farther determination about them.

In the progress of the Reformation, some of these doctrines began to be softened. Arminius, Divinity-Professor at Leyden, and his followers (from him called Arminians, and also Remonstrants or Universalists) declared, that God decrees not absolutely any person to be saved or damned, but conditionally, or according to what he foresees they would do: That Christ did not die only for a particular number whom God intended to save, but for all men; so that every one is intitled to the benefit of his death, who rejects not the Gospel-terms of faith and repentance: That Grace, or the assistance given to men to enable them to do their duty, is not irresistible, but the efficacy of it comes from the freedom of the will, which either may, or may not, co-operate with it as it pleases; and consequently, that the perseverance of those, to whom such Grace is given, is not certain, but they may finally fall away from that state (2).

The two chief branches of the Reformation are the Lutherans and Calvinists, so called from their founders Luther and Calvin. The Lutherans, though at first they were followers of St. Austin, and even denied the freedom of the will, altered their opinion in time, and eagerly came into the Arminian scheme of conditional decrees (3), whilst the Calvinists closely adhered to St. Austin's doctrines of absolute and unconditional Predestination, as before explained.

These two branches differ also in their notions of the Eucharist. The Lutherans hold, that, together with the bread and wine, the real body and blood of Christ is distributed. The Calvinists say, that, under the bread and wine, the body of Christ is really, tho' spiritually, received. Here again, if the Bible had been adhered to, this subject of dispute had been avoided; for, from the words of the primitive institution, neither a real, nor a spiritual, presence can be inferred. Both parties avow the principle of perfection (4); and, on account of their religious differences, such animosity reigns between them, that they refuse to hold Communion with each other, and, in many places, will not allow a mutual Toleration (5). When the Arminian scheme began to spread in Holland, and to be favoured by the Government as more rational in itself, and more intelligible by the people than the Calvinistical, the Predestinarian party, who were most prevalent there, grew outrageous at the progress of the Arminian doctrines, and called the authors of them Devils and Plagues, animating the Magistrates to extirpate and destroy them, and utterly refusing to enter into any treaty of reconciliation. They never ceased till they had leave to hold a national Synod at Dort in 1618, from which all the Arminian Divines being expelled, their tenets were condemned, and the Predestinarian or Calvinistical doctrines more firmly established.

The Reformers made great alterations in the discipline, as well as in the doctrine, of the Church of Rome.

The Hierarchy was intirely demolished, and Episcopacy every where (except in a few Lutheran Dioceses) wholly abolished. Bishops and Presbyters are affirmed to be the same in Scripture, and all superiority of the one over the other being denied, and a parity asserted, the Ecclesiastical Government is (by the Calvinists at least) lodged in the hands of Presbyters, Lay-Elders, and Deacons.

In Scotland the Reformation was also settled after the Calvinistical or Geneva-model, both as to doctrine and discipline, and episcopacy not only rooted out, but declared to be repugnant to the word of God.

In

(1). The Pelagians (so called from Pelagius) think there is no need of any other Grace but that of Pardon, and deny both the preventing and assisting Grace. The Semipelagians think, that an assisting Grace is necessary, but that the first turn of the will to God is the effect of a man's own choice.

(2). There were some that went farther. They denied the certain foreknowledge of future contingencies, and therefore they thought the decrees of God, from all eternity, were only general; that such as believe and obey the Gospel shall be saved, and that such as live and die in sin shall be damned; but that there were no special decrees made concerning particular persons, these being only made in time, according to the state in which they are. They thought also, that man is by nature so free and so intire, that he needs no inward Grace; so they deny a special predestination from all eternity, and do likewise deny inward assistances. These, from Socius their founder, are called Sociinians, and also Unitarians, from their asserting the Supremacy of the Father, and denying the received doctrine of the Trinity.

(3). When Luther began to form his opinions into a body, he clearly saw, that nothing did so plainly destroy the doctrine of merit and justification by works as St. Austin's opinions: He found also in his works every express authorities against most of the corruptions of the Roman Church; and being of an order that carried his name, and by consequence accustomed to read and reverence his works, it was no wonder if he, without a strict examining of the matter, espoused at first all his opinions, though, before he died, he is reported to have changed his mind; for Melancthon, who had been of the same opinion, as to the freedom of the will, did retract it, and was not blamed for it by Luther.

(4). Luther allowed of perfection as far as banishment; but Calvin thought it lawful to put Heretics to death. Beza published a treatise in favour of perfection, which was translated into Dutch by Bogerman, President of the Synod of Dort.

(5). It may here be observed, that one standing cause of their not holding Communion with one another, is, that both parties have taken care to insert their peculiar tenets and doctrines into the offices of their public worship. For instance, there is scarce a Calvinistical prayer, but what supposes absolute predestination and election, partial redemption, total inability of man to any thing that is good, efficacy or grace, final perseverance, or some other controverted point, by which means a Lutheran or Arminian cannot join in it, without straining the words to their own sense, which is sometimes hardly to be done.

In England a middle course was steered. Though the articles of Religion are a plain transcript of St Austin's doctrine in the controverted points of Original Sin, Predestination, Justification by Faith alone, Efficacy of Grace, and Good Works, yet are they composed with such a latitude and such additional cautions, as that they may be taken in an Arminian as well as Calvinistical sense. For instance, in the article of Predestination it is not expressed, whether God's decree was absolute or conditional; and therefore, though the Authors very probably meant, that the decree was absolute, yet the Remonstrants may subscribe to it in a conditional sense. However this be, of the thirty-nine articles, the most rigid Calvinist can give his assent to all, except three relating to the discipline of the Church. For though the doctrine of the Church of England, as it stands in the Articles and Homilies, agrees with that of the Calvinists, yet the discipline is intirely different. The Hierarchy, or Church-government by Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, is preserved in England, and declared to be Apostolical: The Bishops are held to be of a superior order to the Priests, and to have the sole power of Ordination. The English Reformers thought proper also to retain the Papish Ecclesiastical habits or vestments, the Surplice, Hoods, &c. and also some of the ceremonies, as the Cross in Baptism, Ring in Matrimony, Kneeling at the Sacrament, &c. The Liturgy or Common-Prayers were chiefly taken from the offices of the Church of Rome, and certain responses were added to engage the attention of the People, who before had no concern in the publick devotions which were uttered in an unknown tongue.

It happened in Queen Mary's reign, that great numbers of the Reformed, upon the restoration of Popery, fled beyond sea, and were kindly entertained by the Protestant States in Germany, Switzerland, and Geneva, who allowed them Churches for their public worship. Among these were five Bishops, as many Deans, some Archdeacons, and above fifty eminent Preachers and Doctors, and of Noblemen, Merchants, &c. above seven hundred. Many of these exiles, returning home in Queen Elizabeth's reign, brought with them a great liking of the Discipline and Worship of the Reformed Churches abroad, and used their utmost endeavours to cause the Church-Discipline to be reduced to a nearer Conformity with the Calvinistical plan. They alledged, that the Scriptures are a Standard of Discipline as well as Doctrine: That the form of Government, appointed by the Apostles, was, like the Jewish Sanhedrim, Aristocratical, and to be administered by Pastors, Elders, and Deacons: That this form was designed as a pattern for the Churches of all ages, not to be departed from, on account of any customs of the Papacy or practice of the earlier ages, unless warranted by the Bible. They objected to the Act of Supremacy, as giving too much power to the Crown in matters of Religion. They said, that Christ and no other was the sole Law-giver and Head of the Church: That the direction of religious matters was by God's ordinance committed to the Church-officers: That the Civil Magistrate might call a Council of his Clergy, and be there in person or by deputy, but not a Moderator or Judge:

No. 33. Vol. III.

That it was his province not to make ordinances or determine controversies, but to see the decrees of the Clergy executed, and to punish the contemnners. They declaimed against those habits, rites, and ceremonies, which were used by Papists, insisting that those things, which were left indifferent by the Scriptures, ought not to be made necessary by any human law, and that such rites as had been abused to Idolatry, and tended to lead men back to Superstition, were no longer indifferent, but to be rejected as unlawful. They, who were thus for carrying on the Reformation farther than the Establishment, were by their adversaries termed Puritans.

These were told, that, in the affairs of Church-government, not only the Scriptures, but the practice of the Church, for the first four or five centuries, was to be regarded: That therefore the later corruptions of the Papacy, from the time the Pope usurped the title of universal Bishop, were only to be rejected, and those things left standing, which could be traced much higher; such as Archbishops, Bishops, Priests, and Deacons: That every Prince had authority to correct all abuses of Doctrine and Discipline within his own territories, and that things indifferent, such as Rites, Ceremonies, Habits, &c. might be settled by the command of the Civil Magistrate, and in such cases it was the indispensible duty of all subjects to observe them.

Hence it appears, that both parties agreed in the necessity of Uniformity of public worship, and of calling in the sword of the Civil Magistrate for the support of their several schemes, but differed about the standard of this same Uniformity, one party asserting, it was the Queen's Supremacy and the laws of the land; the other, the decrees of Provincial and National Synods, allowed and enforced by the Magistrate. Neither party thought of admitting Liberty of Conscience and Freedom of Profession, which seems to be the right of every man, as far as is consistent with the peace of the Government.

From this principle of Non-toleration both parties in their turns, when they had the Civil Power in their hands, failed not to oppress one another. The Puritans were the first sufferers. The controversy began about the habits, (which had been objected against in the reign of Edward VI) several refusing Bishopricks or other preferments, on account of the vestments and ceremonies, and great numbers being deprived for not using them. Queen Elizabeth, jealous of her Ecclesiastical Power, and fond of pomp and shew in the externals of Religion, was so far from granting the least indulgence in these matters, that she insisted on a strict Uniformity as well in discipline as doctrine. The Puritans, rather than comply, submitted to suspensions and deprivations, the number of which in her reign amounted to several thousands. Penal laws were multiplied and rigorously executed. Non-compliance with, or speaking, or acting, against the Liturgy, was for the third offence perpetual imprisonment, with loss of preferment to a Clergyman, and forfeiture of goods and chattels to a layman. Absence from Church was first punished with 12 d. a Sunday, afterwards with 20 l. a month, and lastly with imprisonment prisonment without bail; and, unless a declaration of Conformity was made in three months after conviction, with perpetual banishment; and, in case any returned, they were to suffer death without benefit of the Clergy. During these proceedings, though the Puritans in general were unwilling to forsake the established Church, and therefore evaded the force of these laws by coming to Church, when the prayers were almost over, and receiving the Sacrament where it was administered with some latitude; yet others resolved to separate from it, and to assemble, wherever they could, to worship God in their own way. The Brownists (so called from Robert Brown their Pastor, educated in Corpus Christi College Cambridge) formed the first separate Congregation; but they were quickly forced to leave the Kingdom and retire to Holland, where Mr Robinson, Pastor of the Church at Leyden, first struck out the Congregational or Independent form of Church-government (1). Part of this Church, transplanting themselves at length into America, laid the foundation of the colony of New-England.

Here was the beginning of the Separation, whereby people of the same country, of the same religion, and of the same judgment and doctrine, parted Communion, on account of a few habits and ceremonies, which by degrees begot unspeakable mischiefs to the Nation, and in the end proved the destruction of the Constitution both of Church and State. A strong instance of the weakness, perverseness, and superstition of mankind! How weak must it be to part with a livelihood and embrace poverty, rather than wear a surplice or square cap! How perverse to enforce the use of such things against conscience! How superstitious to believe it of any consequence to religion, to use or disuse them! Had these external things been left as indifferent in their practice as they are in their nature, there had been probably no Schism in the Church, nor civil War in the State. For, though the Puritans had many other objections to the established Discipline, they would doubtless have remained in the Church, if the use of the habits had been dispensed with. But the Queen's resolution, not to indulge them, drove many into an actual separation, which widened the breach. For the controversy, which had been chiefly confined to the habits and a few ceremonies, began to open into several considerable branches, and particularly the Hierarchy was attacked. The Puritans were also divided, and a new dispute arose concerning the necessity of a Separation from the established Church.

Soon after the Accession of King James, the Canons of the Church were established by the King and Convocation. By these Canons all were declared to be ipso facto excommunicated, that affirmed, the Church of England not to be a true and Apostolical Church, or the Liturgy to be corrupt, or the rites and ceremonies to be antichristian, or that separated from the Church, and pretended that any sect of Ministers and Lay-persons, may make rules, orders, and constitutions, without the King's authority. Thus the Puritans found themselves in a worse condition than ever, excommunication (the consequences of which are terrible) being added to suspensions and deprivations (2). Things were in this state, when a great turn happened in the Doctrine of the Church. The Arminian or Remonstrant Tenets (which had been condemned by the Synod of Dort) began to spread in England. They were espoused by the Court and the Universities (3). The Calvinistical sense of the articles was discouraged, and injunctions were published against Preaching upon Predestination, Election, Efficacy of Grace, &c. whilst the Arminians were suffered to inculcate their doctrines. As Arminianism was first embraced by those who were for exalting the prerogative above law, all that

(1). In the year 1616, Mr Jacob (who, after conferring with Robinson, embraced his sentiments of Church discipline) set up the first Independent or Congregational Church in England. Some time after, some of the most rigid, being dissatisfied about the lawfulness of Infant-Baptism, chose Mr Jesse their Minister, who laid, 1640, the foundation of the first Baptist Congregation in England. The Brownists increased in such a manner, that in 1592, Sir Walter Raleigh declared in the Parliament House, that there were no less than 20,000 divided into several Congregations, in Norfolk, Essex, and about London. They had now at their head, Smith, Jacob, and Ainsworth, the Rabbi of the age. Copping and Thacker, two of their Ministers, were condemned and put to death for Non-Conformity, in 1583. The Brownists did not differ from the Church in any doctrinal points; but were so rigid and narrow in points of discipline, that they not only maintained the discipline of the Church of England to be Antichristian, but renounced communion with all other reformed Churches, except such as should be of their model.

(2). In the Reign of King James, two persons were burnt for Heresy; one was Bartholomew Legate, an Arian; he was well versed in the Scriptures, and of an unblameable conversation. The King himself and some Bishops conferred with him, but could not convince him of his errors. After having lain some time in Newgate, he was convened before Bishop King, in his Consistory at St Paul's, who, with some other Divines and Lawyers, declared him an obdurate

Heretic, and certified the same into Chancery by a significavit, delivering him up to the secular arm. Whereupon the King signed a writ de Hæretico comburendo to the Sheriffs of London, who brought him to Smithfield, March 18, 1612, and in the midst of a vast concourse of people burnt him to death. A pardon was offered at the stake, if he would recant, but he refused it. The next month Edward Wightman, of Burton upon Trent, was convicted of Heresy by Bishop Neile, and was burnt at Lichfield, April 11. He was charged in the warrant with the Heresies of Arius, Cerinthus, Manicheus, and the Anabaptists. — There was another condemned to the fire, but the constancy of the other two sufferers moved such compassion in the spectators, that it was thought better to let him linger out a miserable life in Newgate. Fulter, B. X. 63, 64.

(3). The Predestinarian controversy was began in 1595, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, by Barret, Fellow of Caius College, Cambridge, who preached against Calvin's doctrine of Predestination, &c. for which he was censured by the University, and forced to retract in St Mary's Church. He was afterwards sent to Lambeth, and examined before Archbishop Hitchcote; who enjoined him to confess his errors, and not teach the like doctrines for the future; but he chose rather to quit the University. This gave occasion for the famous Lambeth-articles, in which the Calvinistical sense of Predestination, Election, and the other controverted points, is strongly asserted; and to which the Scholars in the Universities were strictly enjoined to conform.

that adhered to the side of liberty, or to the Calvinistical sense of the articles, though ever so good Churchmen, were branded by the Court with the name of Puritans. Hence the distinction of State or Doctrinal Puritans, and Discipline Puritans or Disciplinarians. By this means the Puritans acquired great strength, for the bulk of the People and Clergy were at once confounded with them. At the head of the Arminians was Laud, and of the Doctrinal Puritans, Archbishop Abbot.

When King Charles I. came to the Crown, the state of the controversy between the Church and the Puritans was intirely changed. In the reigns of King James and Queen Elizabeth, the Puritans were almost all for the Presbyterial Government, but, from the time that Arminianism prevailed in the Church, the whole body of Calvinists came to be called Doctrinal Puritans. There was no mention for many years before the civil wars of the old Book of discipline, (framed by the Puritans in Queen Elizabeth's Reign) but all seemed to unite in a moderate Episcopacy (1), and the controversy ran upon the Doctrinal Articles, upon the Reduction of Episcopal Power, and upon Innovations in the Church. For Laud, instead of indulging the Puritans, widened the breach between them and the Church, by introducing many new and pompous ceremonies in the publick worship. These not only made the terms of Conformity more difficult, but were enforced both upon the Clergy and Laity with all the terrors of the High-commission, to the ruin of many families, and the raising very great disturbances in many parts of the Kingdom. Upon these proceedings great numbers transplanted themselves and families into America, and gave birth to a second colony in New-England, that of Massachusetts's bay (2).

The Church was now in the height of its splendor, Episcopacy was declared to be of Apostolical, and consequently of Divine Institution, and the Presbyterial Government, though challenging the title of Christ's Kingdom and Ordinance, to have no foundation in Scripture, nor in the practice of the Church for fifteen hundred years. The Clergy were all obliged, on pain of deprivation, to swear that they approved the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church, and would never consent to alter the Government of it by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. The Churches were adorned with paintings, images, altar-pieces, &c. and, instead of Communion-tables, altars were set up, and bowings to them and the Sacramental elements enjoined. The Predestinarian doctrines were forbid, not only to be preached, but to be printed, and the Arminian sense of the articles was encouraged and propagated.

On the other hand the Puritans loudly complained of these innovations, and taxed the Authors of them with a design to introduce Popery. The more severely they were used, the more they increased and continued to do so, till the meeting of the long Parliament in 1640, when the affairs of Religion took a new turn.

This Parliament being composed chiefly of *State and Doctrinal Puritans, one of their resolutions was, to redress the grievances of the Notes, Church. They began with censuring the Authors of the late innovations, and voted them down. A solemn protestation was drawn up for all to subscribe, that they would maintain the true reformed Protestant Religion, expressed in the doctrine of the Church of England, against all Popery and Popish innovations, &c. The High-Commission Court and Star-Chamber were abolished. The votes and temporal jurisdiction of the Bishops were taken away; and afterwards, in compliance to the Scots, a bill passed both Houses for the utter abolishing all Archbishops, Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries, Deans, Chapters, Archdeacons, Canons, Prebends, &c. Thus the discipline of the Church was voted away, and no other was erected in its room till several years after. In this interval, the Clergy were permitted to read more or less of the Liturgy, as they pleased, and to govern their parishes according to their discretion. The Vestments were left indifferent, some wearing them, and others, in imitation of the foreign Protestant Churches, making use of a cloak. The Puritan Clergy, being zealous Calvinists, and having been prohibited for some years from preaching against the Arminians, now pointed all their artillery against them, and insisted upon little else in their sermons but Predestination, Justification by Faith alone, Salvation by Free Grace, and the inability of man to do that which is good. Moral duties were too much neglected, and, from a strong aversion to Arminianism, these Divines made way for Antinomianism, running from one extreme to the other, till at last some of them were lost in the wild mazes of enthusiastic dreams and visions, and others, from false principles, pretended to justify the hidden works of dishonesty. In the mean while, the Presbyterians were labouring the Establishment of their form of Church-Government as the discipline of Jesus Christ, but See Note, in vain; for the Parliament, instead of complying with a petition to that end, voted it scandalous. Nor could they ever obtain the power of the Keys, Excommunication, &c. for which they were continually applying to the Parliament. It is true, by an ordinance of August 19, 1645, the Presbyterian Church-Government became the national Establishment, as far as an ordinance

(1). That is, instead of a Bishop governing alone a Diocese of five hundred or a thousand parishes by his Chancellor, Commissaries, Officials, and other Ecclesiastical officers, they were for a Bishop or Stated-President over a district of ten or twelve parishes, who jointly, with the Parochial Ministers, should manage the Church affairs of his district.

(2). It is said, there were eight sail of ships at once, in the spring of 1638, in the river of Thames, bound for New-England, and filled with Puritan families, among whom (according to Bates and Dugdale) were

Oliver Cromwell, afterwards Protector, John Hampden, Esq; and Mr Arthur Haselrigge, who, seeing no end of these oppressions, were determined to spend the remainder of their days in America; but by an order of Council, dated May 1, 1638, the ships were stopped, and the passengers commanded to be put on shore; and, to prevent the like for the future, the King prohibited all masters and owners of ships to carry any passengers to New-England, without a special licence from the Privy-Council. Upon which great numbers went over and settled in Holland.

nance of the Parliament could make it; and, by another of Sept. 1, 1646, Episcopacy was abolished, and the Church-lands alienated for payment of the public debts. Notwithstanding all this, though the Hierarchy was destroyed, and the best, if not all the livings of the Kingdom distributed among them, the Presbyterians were not satisfied. For it must be observed, that the Presbyterian Government was more narrow than the Episcopal, and allowed not a liberty of conscience, but claimed a Civil as well as Ecclesiastical authority over men's persons and properties. Consequently they were still discontented, for want of Church-power to crush the Sectaries, as they termed all that dissented from them. Of these the Independents were the chief, whose opinion it was, that every Congregation had power to chuse or ordain their Pastor, and jointly with him to manage their religious concerns without Classical or Synodical Assemblies, and consequently they were for universal Toleration. These two points, Independency of Congregations (from whence they were called Congregationalists) and Toleration were the constant subjects of dispute between them and the Presbyterians, who were professed enemies to both. The Presbyterians insisted upon a strict Uniformity in worship and discipline, and bitterly inveighed against Toleration, which they called the Great Diana of the Independents. Not content with having their form of Government made the national Establishment, they were continually soliciting the Parliament for a Coercive Power, in order to persecute all that differed from them. On the other hand the Independents, who multiplied daily, and the Anabaptists (who differed from them in little else but Infant-baptism) were as strenuous for Toleration and Liberty of Conscience, declaring no opinions or sentiments of Religion are cognizable by the Magistrate any farther than they are inconsistent with the peace of the Civil Government. Little did the Presbyterian Divines think, that in less than twenty years all their artillery would be turned against them: That they should be excluded the Establishment by an Act of Episcopal Uniformity, and reduced to the necessity of pleading for that indulgence, which they now denied others. Their thoughts were intirely engrossed with Covenant-Uniformity and the Divine Right of their Presbytery, which, after all, the Parliament would never admit in the extent they desired.

During these proceedings, the Episcopal Clergy felt in their turn the effects of non-tolerating principles. By an ordinance of the 23d of August 1645, the Directory was enjoined to be read openly in all Churches, under the penalty of forty shillings, and whoever spoke or acted against it was to forfeit from five to fifty pounds. The use of the Common-prayer-book was forbid, not only in any Church or place of public worship, but even in any private place or family, under the penalty of five pounds for the first offence, ten for the second, and for the third a year's imprisonment. The Covenant was imposed upon them, and whoever refused to take it was ejected. Several thousands of the Parochial Clergy lost their livings, after the civil wars were begun; some left them, and fled over to the King's party; others were deprived by the Committees of the Counties, and the rest for refusing the Covenant. About two hundred Masters and Fellows of Colleges in Cambridge, besides inferior Scholars, were expelled that University; and about nineteen or twenty Heads of Colleges, besides Fellows, were expelled at Oxford: But nothing shews how far the governing Presbyterians in those days would have carried the use of their power, if it had been supported by the sword of the Civil Magistrate, than the ordinance against Blasphemy and Heresy, which, perhaps, is one of the most shocking laws to be met with. This ordinance is dated May 2, 1648, and ordains, among other things, that whoever affirms, That there is no God: That God is not Omnipresent, Almighty, &c. That the Father is not God, the Son is not God, the Holy Ghost is not God, or that these three are not one eternal God, or that Christ is not God equal to the Father: That the Godhead and Manhood of Christ are not distinct natures: That the death of Christ is not meritorious: That Christ is not risen: That there is no resurrection or a future judgment: That the Scriptures are not the Word of God, &c. shall suffer death as in case of felony. And that whoever says, That all men shall be saved: That man by nature hath Free-will to turn to God: That man is bound to believe no more than by his reason he can comprehend: That the Baptism of Infants is unlawful, &c. shall upon conviction be committed to prison, till he find sureties that he will not publish or maintain the said error or errors any more. This ordinance was a comprehensive engine of cruelty, and would have inclosed great numbers, if it had not been laid aside by the influence of the Army, till it was voted to be determined (1). The Presbyterian Government, which, by the former ordinance, had not been absolutely established, was at last settled without limitation of time, by an ordinance of June 21, 1648. This was done without laying any penalty on Recusants, or such as did not come to the Sacrament, or submit to their discipline; which was the utmost length that Presbytery obtained in the Kingdom. And therefore, when afterwards many Sectaries sprung up, as Seekers (2), Ranters (3), Quakers

(1). In this ordinance, Papists, Arminians, Antinomians, Arians, Socinians, Anabaptists, Quakers, and the other Sectaries would have been included, if the confusion of the times had not hindered the Presbyterians from putting it in execution.

(2). These taught, That the Scriptures were uncertain: That present miracles were necessary to Faith: That our Ministry is null, and without authority; and our worship and ordinances unnecessary or vain, the true Church, Ministry, Scripture, and Ordinances being lost, for which they were seeking. The Papists hated and actuated this Sect. Some of them were real Papists, and others Infidels.

(3). These made it their business, as the Seekers, to set up the Light of Nature, under the name of Christ in Men, and to dishonour and cry down the Church. Scriptures, Ministry, Worship, and Ordinances; and called men to hearken to Christ within them. But, withal, they conjoined a cursed doctrine of Libertinism, which brought them to abominable filthiness.

April 4.

Quakers (1), Behmenists (2), (whose doctrines were almost the same, though they differed in name) all declaring against a settled Ministry, and for the guidance of the light within; and the Independents (who were equally enemies of the Episcopal and Presbyterian Uniformity) came to be so far masters, as to hold the Presbyterians in a sort of subjection (3), the Presbyterians turned to the thoughts of restoring King Charles II., and joined with the Episcopalians in that affair, upon the King's declaration of liberty to tender consciences, and that no man should be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion, which did not disturb the peace of the Kingdom. When the King was restored, some moderate Episcopal men thought of an union with the Presbyterians. But the more politic part of them knew, that all their ancient power and revenues would be restored to them, and none suffered to share with them, but such as were intirely of their mind and way. The Presbyterians, who were possessed of most of the great benefices in the Church and in the Universities, were in great hopes of favour, not only from the King's declaration, but upon ten or twelve of their Divines being made the King's Chaplains in ordinary. By this means they had easy access to his Majesty, and, intending to improve it to the common good, waited upon him with the Lord Manchester, recommending to his serious consideration the union of his subjects in religious matters, for which he had now a most happy juncture for effecting, and begging, that only things necessary might be the terms of union, and that the true exercise of Church-discipline might be allowed. The King declared himself highly pleased with their inclinations to agreement, but told them, that this agreement could not be expected to be compassed, but by abating something on both sides, and therefore desired them to offer some proposals about Church-Government, that being the main difference, and to set down the most they could yield to. Hereupon they declared, They could not pretend to speak for, or oblige others, and therefore what they did must signify but the minds of such as were present. The King told them, It should be so taken. Then they begged, that, at the same time that they offered their concessions, the brethren on the other side might also bring in theirs, containing the utmost they could yield on their side, in order to concord. And the King promised it should be so.

In about three weeks time they agreed to a paper of proposals, in which they offered to allow of the true ancient Presidency in the Church, with a due mixture of Presbytery, and proposed that Bishop Usher's Reduction of Episcopacy should be the ground-work of an accommodation. As to the Liturgy, they desired that a new one might be compiled, or the old reformed; and begged that Kneeling at the Sacrament might not be imposed, and the Surplice, Crofs in Baptism, and bowing at the name of Jesus rather than Christ, might be abolished. The Ministers waiting on the King with their proposals, he treated them very respectfully, told them he was well pleased that they were for a Liturgy, and yielded to the essence of Episcopacy, and promised them, that the places, where the old Incumbents were dead, should (as they had desired) be confirmed to the Possessors.

As they expected to meet (according to the King's promise) some Divines of the other side, and to see their proposals, it much disappointed them to find none of them appear. After some time of waiting for the compliances of the Episcopal Divines, they at length received a sharp answer, reflecting on their proposals, in which Usher's Reduction was rejected as a heap only of private conceptions, the filthiness of life. They taught, as the Familists, That God regardeth not the actions of the outward man, but of the heart: And to the pure, all things are pure, even things forbidden. The horrid villainies of this Sect soon put an end to it.

(1). The Quakers, who (as Calamy says) were the Ranters reversed, turned from horrid profaneness and blasphemy, to a life of extreme austeriety. Their doctrines were mostly the same with the Ranters. They make the Light which every man hath within him a sufficient rule; and consequently, the Scripture and Ministry are set light by. They speak much for the dwelling and working of the Spirit in us, but little of justification, pardon of sin, and reconciliation with God through Jesus Christ. They pretend their dependence on the Spirit's conduct against set times of Prayer, and against Sacraments, Scriptures, and Ministry. They will not have the Scripture called the word of God. Their principal zeal lieth in railing at Ministers as Hirelings, Deceivers, and False Prophets, and in refusing to swear before a Magistrate, &c. Their chief Leader, James Nayler, had his tongue bored through as a blasphemer, by the Parliament. Many Franciscan Friars and other Papists have been proved to be disguised Speakers in their assemblies. But afterwards William Pen, their Leader, undertook the reformed the Sect, and set up a kind of Ministry among them.

(2). The opinions of the Behmenists were much like those of the Quakers, they being for the sufficiency of the light of Nature, and a dependence on Revelations. But they were fewer in number, and of much greater meekness than the rest of the Sectaries. They had their name from Jacob Behmen, in whose writings their doctrine is to be seen at large.

(3). The Presbyterians were so rigid in point of Uniformity, as that, in the treaty of the life of Wight, they would not allow the King liberty to have the Common-Prayer read privately in his family. Upon which the Army, whose favourite point was liberty of Conscience, was justly incensed against them, and said, If Presbyterian Conformity should take place, what must the Independents and Sectaries expect, since the King himself was thus used by them? What have we been fighting for, if, after all the hazards we have run to set up Presbytery, we must be banished our country, or driven into corners? Thus the rigid Uniformity of the Presbyterians threw the Army upon the desperate measures of assuming the Sovereign power; bringing the King to justice: Setting aside the Covenant, and erecting a Commonwealth.

the Liturgy was applauded as unexceptionable, but a revival was agreed to in case the King thought fit; and, as for the ceremonies, not one could be parted with. It is very remarkable, that, when the Puritans in 1641 would have been satisfied with Usher's scheme for the Reduction of Episcopacy, they could not obtain it from the King and Bishops; that afterwards, when the King offered the same scheme at the treaty of the Ile of Wight, the Parliament and Puritan Divines would not accept it, for fear of breaking with the Scots. And now when the Presbyterian Ministers presented it to King Charles II., as a model with which they were satisfied, both the King and Bishops rejected it with contempt, and would not suffer it to be debated (1).

Shortly after, instead of the Dioceſan concessions, the Ministers were told, that the King would put all that he should grant them into the form of a Declaration, and they should see it before it was published. Accordingly on a day appointed it was read by the Chancellor before the King, several Noblemen, and some Divines of both sides. Each party was to speak to what they disliked, and the King to determine how it should be. There were various altercations about Prelacy, and Re-ordination, and the particulars of the Declaration. When the whole was perused, the Chancellor drew out another paper, intimating, that the King had also been petitioned by the Independents and Anabaptists for liberty, and therefore he read an additional part to the Declaration to this purpose, "That others also be permitted to meet for religious worship, so be it they do it not to the disturbance of the peace; and that no Justice of Peace or Officer disturb them." This being designed to secure liberty to the Papists, there was a general silence upon the reading it. The Bishops thought it a nice point, and said nothing. The Presbyterians were afraid to speak against it, lest all the Sects should look upon them as the causers of their sufferings. But at length Mr Baxter, fearing their silence might be misinterpreted, said, "As they humbly thanked his Majesty for his declared indulgence to themselves, so they distinguished the tolerable party from the intolerable: For the former, they humbly craved just lenity and favour; but for the latter, such as Papists and Socinians, they could not make their Toleration their request." To this the King said, "There were laws sufficient against the Papists." Baxter replied, "They understood the question to be, Whether those laws should be executed or not?" Upon which the matter was dropped. At length the Declaration came out so amended, as that it was fitted to be an instrument of concord and peace, if settled by a law; and so the division might have been healed, upon the alteration of the Liturgy, as the Declaration promised (2).

But

(1). Usher's Reduction of Episcopacy consisted of the four following articles.

I. In every parish the Rector, or the Incumbent Pastor, together with the Church-Warden and Stewards, may every week take notice of such as live scandalously in that Congregation; who are to receive such several admonitions and reproofs, as the quality of their offence shall deserve; and, if by this means they cannot be reclaimed, they may be presented unto the next monthly Synod, and in the mean time be debarred by the Pastor from access unto the Lord's Table.

II. Whereas by a Statute in the 26th of H. n. VIII. (revived in the 1st of Queen Elizabeth) Suffragans are appointed to be erected in twenty-six several places of this Kingdom, the number of them might very well be conformed unto the number of the several Rural Deaneries, into which every Diocese is subdivided; which being done, the Suffragan (supplying the place of those, who in the ancient Church were called Chorepiscopi) might every month assemble a Synod of all the Rectors, or Incumbent Pastors, within the Precinct, and according to the major part of their voices conclude all matters that should be brought into debate before them. To this Synod the Rector and Church-wardens might present such impenitent persons, as by admonition and suspension from the Sacrament would not be reformed; who, if they would still remain contumacious and incorrigible, the sentence of Excommunication might be decreed against them by the Synod, and accordingly be executed in the Parish where they lived. Hitherto also all things that concerned the Parochial Ministers might be referred, whether they did touch their doctrine or their conversation: As also the censure of all new opinions, Heresies, and Schisms, which did arise within that circuit, with liberty of appeal, if need so require, unto the Dioceſan Synod.

III. The Dioceſan Synod might be held once or twice in the year, as it should be thought most convenient; therein all the Suffragans, and the rest of the Rectors or Incumbent Pastors, or a certain select number out of every Deanery within that Diocese might meet; with whose consent, or the major part of them, all things might be concluded by the Bishop or Superintendent (call him which you will) or in his absence by one of the Suffragans, whom he should depute in his stead to be Moderator of that assembly. Here all matters of greater moment might be taken into consideration, and the orders of the monthly Synods revised, and (if need be) reformed. And, if here also any matter of difficulty could not receive a full determination, it might be referred to the next Provincial or National Synod.

IV. The Provincial Synod might consist of all the Bishops and Suffragans, and such of the Clergy as should be elected out of every Diocese within the Province. The Primate of either Province might be the Moderator of this meeting (or in his room some one of the Bishops appointed by him) and all matters be ordered therein by common consent, as in the former assemblies. This Synod might be held every third year, and, if the Parliament do then sit, both the Primates and Provincial Synods of the Land might join together, and make up a National Council; wherein all appeals from inferior Synods might be received, all their acts examined, and all Ecclesiastical Constitutions, which concern the State of the Church of the whole Nation, established.

(2). This Declaration was dated October 25, 1660, wherein the King thus expresses himself, "When we were

But, after all, the Declaration had no effect, except only a year's suspension of the law that afterwards took place; nor as to Church-Government were any of the concessions put in execution.

However, pursuant to a promise in the Declaration, that the Liturgy should be reviewed, a Commission was granted to certain persons (twelve of a side, with nine assistants to each side) to meet for that purpose at the Savoy. At the first meeting, instead of an amicable conference, it was infisted upon by the Bishops, that the Ministers should bring all their Exceptions at one time, and all their Additions at another. Accordingly the Exceptions were drawn up, and in some time offered to the Bishops; and Baxter alone undertook to frame a new Liturgy, which was generally approved of by the Ministers.

This Liturgy (called the Reformed Liturgy) being presented with a petition to the Bishops, they, after some delay, sent the Ministers a paper of reasonings against their exceptions, without any abatements or alterations at all worth the mentioning. An answer to which was also drawn up. But it is very probable, that neither this answer, nor the Reformed Liturgy, were ever read by the generality of the Bishops and Doctors, who were present at the meetings. So that it seems, before they knew what was in them, they were resolved to reject the papers of the Ministers. After many debates, a dispute was at last agreed on, to argue the necessity or no necessity of altering the Liturgy. Three of a party were chosen on each side, to manage the dispute, which was done in writing; and the sole argument handled was, The sinfulness of injoining Mini- sters to deny the Communion to all that dare not kneel. This dispute was drawn out to a great length, and ended in exclamations against one of the Disputants *, for asserting, That a thing, not evil in itself, may have accidents so evil, as may make it a sin to him that shall command it. As if it followed from thence, Nothing may be commanded, for fear of those evil accidents, in cases where the Commander cannot be chargeable with any hand in them. Whereas his meaning was, That whenever the commanding or forbidding of a thing indifferent is like to occasion more hurt than good, and this may be foreseen, the commanding or forbidding it is a sin.

Thus ended the dispute at the Savoy, and all endeavours for reconciliation upon the warrant of the King's Commission.

Notwithstanding these discouragements, endeavours were used to get the King's Declaration passed into a law, but, when it came to the trial, it was rejected; and so the Declaration did not only die before it was executed, but all attempts for union were at an end. Nay, a rigorous act was brought in for Uniformity, by which all, who did not conform to the Liturgy by the 24th of August, St Bartholomew's day, in the year 1662, were deprived of all Ecclesiastical benefices, without leaving a discretionary power with the King in the execution of it, and without making provision for the maintenance of those who should be deprived: A severity neither practised by Queen Elizabeth, in the enacting her Liturgy, nor by the Parliament in ejecting the Royalists, in both which, a fifth part of the benefice was reserved for their subsistence. Indeed, while the bill was depending,

"were in Holland, we were attended by many grave and learned Ministers from hence, who were looked upon as the most able and principal assertors of Presbyterian opinions, with whom we had as much conference, as the multitude of affairs, which were then upon us, would permit us to have: And, to our great satisfaction and comfort, found them persons full of affection to us, of zeal for the peace of the Church and State, and neither enemies (as they have been given out to be) of Episcopacy or Liturgy; but modestly to desire such alterations in either, as, without shaking foundations, might best allay the present distempers, which the indisposition of times, and the tenderness of some men's consciences, had contracted. For the better doing whereof, we intended upon our first arrival in these Kingdoms to call a Synod of Divines: And in the mean time published in our Declaration from Breda a liberty to tender consciences. We need not profess the high esteem and affection we have for the Church of England, as it is established by law. Nor do we think that reverence in the least degree diminished by our contentions, nor peremptorily to insist upon some particulars of ceremony, which, however introduced by the piety, devotion, or order of former times, may not be so agreeable to the present; but may even lessen that piety and devotion, for the improvement whereof they might be first introduced, and consequently may be well dispensed with. And we have not the least doubt, but the present Bishops will think the "present concessions now made by us, to allay the present distempers, very just and reasonable, and will very cheerfully conform themselves thereto." Of these concessions, this was the substance: "The King declared his resolution to promote the power of godliness, to encourage the exercises of Religion both in public and in private, to take care that the Lord's day should be applied to holy exercises, without unnecessary diversifications; and that insufficient, negligent, and scandalous Ministers, should not be permitted in the Church. That no Bishops should ordain, or exercise any part of jurisdiction, which appertains to the censures of the Church, without the advice and assistance of the Presbyters, and neither do, nor impose any thing, but what was according to the known laws of the Land; that Chancellors, Commissaries, and Officials, should be excluded from acts of jurisdiction, the power of the Pastors in their several congregations restored, and a liberty granted to all the Ministers to assemble monthly, for the exercise of the pastoral persuasive power, to the promoting of knowledge and godliness in their flocks. That the Ministers should be freed from the subscription required by the Canon, and the oath of Canonical obedience, and receive ordination, institution, and induction, and exercise their function, and enjoy the profits of their livings, without being obliged to it: And that the use of the ceremonies should be dispensed with, where they were scrupled."

pending, the Ministers, still interposing, as they had opportunity, were positively promised by some in great places, that the King would grant that by indulgence, which had been denied in the way they desired it; and that care should be taken, that the King should have power reserved to him, to dispence with the act to such as deserved well of him at his Restoration, or whom he pleased. But when the act passed (by a very few votes) all their great friends left them in the lurch; and when, afterwards, upon encouragement from men in power they drew up a petition for indulgence, they were threatened with incurring a Præmunire by so bold an attempt, though they had worded it so cautiously, that it did not extend to the Papists. During this interval, the Presbyterians were under great perplexities. They had many meetings, and much disputing about Conformity. Reynolds accepted the Bishoprick of Norwich, but Calamy and Baxter refused the Sees of Lichfield and Hereford. At length, the appointed day came, when about two thousand Ministers fell under the Parliamentary deprivation; whereas, had the terms of the King's Declaration been stood to, it is affirmed, not above three hundred would have been deprived. This raised an outcry over the Nation, tho' few of the Episcopal party were troubled at it, or apprehensive of the ill effects such a severity was like to have. Here were men much valued, some on better grounds, others on worse, who were now ignominiously cast out, reduced to great poverty, provoked by spiteful usage, and thrown upon those popular practices, that both their principles and circumstances seemed to justify, of forming separate Congregations, and of diverting men from the public worship, and from considering their Successors as the lawful Pastors of those Churches in which they had served.

Thus, instead of healing the religious differences, it was resolved to widen them, by making the terms of Conformity much stricter than before the war (1). All persons were obliged to subscribe an unfeigned assent and consent to all and every particular, contained in the book of Common-prayer: And all, who had not Episcopal Ordination, were made incapable of holding any benefice. Instead of Indulgence or Comprehension, an act^{Jan. 30. 1663.} passed, declaring any meeting for religious worship, at which five were present more than the family, to be a Conventicle. And every person above sixteen, that was present at it, was to lie three months in prison, or to pay five pounds for the first; six months for the second, or twenty pounds; and for the third offence, was to be banished to any plantation except New-England, or pay a hundred pounds. During the plague, some Nonconformists preaching in the empty pulpits, as well as in other places, a severe act passed in the Parliament at Oxford, requiring all silenced Ministers to take an oath, declaring it unlawful, on any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the King, or any commissioned by him, and that they would not at any time endeavour an alteration in the Government of the Church or State. Such as refused this oath were not to come within five miles of any City or Corporation, or of the Church where they had served. In 1668, a project of a Comprehension for the Presbyterians, and of an Indulgence for the Independents, and the rest, was prepared by Bridgman and Wilkins, consisting chiefly of those things that the King had promised by his Declaration in 1660; but this was exclaimed against by the Church-party, and the House of Commons was then so possessed against the Nonconformists, that, when it was known that a bill was ready to be offered to the House for that end, a very extraordinary vote passed, that no bill to that purpose should be received. After struggling several years under these difficulties, the Dissenters had a little respite by the King's Declaration for suspending the execution of all penal laws, both against Papists and Non-conformists. Great endeavours were used by the Court to persuade them to make addresses upon it, but few were so blind as not to see it was chiefly designed for the sake of the Papists. However, the Presbyterians, with Dr Manton at their head, came and thanked the King for it, which offended many of their best friends. But this indulgence lasted not long; for the House of Commons, alarmed at this step in favour of Popery, voted the King's Declaration illegal, and passed the Test-act, by which it was enacted, that no man should bear any office or place, who

(1). It had at first been resolved, when the Bishops were restored to their power and revenues, instead of using means to bring in the Dissenters, to seek the most effectual methods for casting them out, and bringing in a new set of men into the Church. The King was pleased with this design, though from a different view; for he was in another and deeper laid design for introducing Popery, to which he intended to make the heat of the Episcopal party subservient. It was thought that a Toleration was the only method for spreading Popery over the Nation; and nothing could make a Toleration for Popery pass, but the having great bodies of men put out of the Church, and put under severe laws, which should force them to move for a Toleration, and should make it reasonable to grant it to them; and it was resolved, that whatever should be granted of that sort should be so comprehensive as to include the Papists. Hence the Papists were instructed to oppose all propositions for a Comprehension, and animate the Church-party to maintain their ground against all Sectaries. At the same time they spoke of Toleration, as necessary both for the peace of the Nation and encouragement of Trade. The King being thus resolved on fixing the terms of Conformity to what they had been before the war, without making the least abatement or alteration; it is plain, the Savoy conference, and the other appearances of moderation, were never intended to have any effect. The Church-party, out of their old animosity to the Presbyterians for what they had done during the war, helped to carry on the King's designs, till his Declaration of universal indulgence plainly discovered his intentions.

who did not take the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and receive the Sacrament, according to the usage of the Church of England. This act, though intended against the Papists, affected also the Non-conformists; however, the friends of the Presbyterians did not oppose it, that an effectual security against Popery might not be prevented. For this reason it was, that, when the designs of the Court for Popery were now fully discovered, the same House of Commons, that had passed such severe acts against the Dissenters, voted the bringing in a bill in their favour, which however was, after a second reading, dropped in the Committee. Though this Bill was not finished, the prudent behaviour of the Non-conformists on this occasion did so soften their adversaries, that no more Votes or Bills were offered against them.

1680. the contrary, a Bill passed both Houses for repealing the severe Act in Queen Elizabeth's Reign against the Puritans; but on the day of prorogation, when the King came to pass the Bills, the Clerk of the Crown, by the King's particular order, took this Bill from the table, and it was no more heard of. However, the Commons, in the morning before they were prorogued, passed two extraordinary votes, That the laws against Popish Recusants, ought not to be executed against Protestant Dissenters, and That it was the opinion of the House, that the laws against the Dissenters ought not to be executed. Though this shewed the sense of the Commons, yet, instead of being a kindness to the Non-conformists, it raised a storm against them, and after the dissolution of the Parliament they were persecuted afresh. Orders and directions were sent from the King and Council-board to suppress all Conventicles, and the laws against them were rigorously executed. Many Ministers were imprisoned, and they and their hearers fined. This persecution continued all the rest of the Reign of King Charles II.; and, when King James ascended the Throne, it was still continued, till the King, to carry on his design for the introduction of Popery, issued out a Declaration for liberty of Conscience to all persons of what persuasion soever. The Church-party, perceiving that Popery was advancing with large steps, instead of any longer exclaiming against the Dissenters, thought proper to lay aside their resentments, and join with them in promoting the Revolution. The Bishops declared in their petition to the King, that their refusal to read his Declaration of indulgence, did not proceed from any want of due tenderness to Dissenters, in relation to whom they were willing to come to such a temper as should be thought fit, when that matter should be considered in Parliament and Convocation. Accordingly it was hoped, by the moderate of all parties, that our religious differences would, in great measure, have ceased at the Revolution, by the union of such Protestant Dissenters with the Church, as expressed an inclination towards it: But the proceedings of the first Convocation in 1689 (of which a large account has been given) soon put an end to these hopes. The King was so far from obtaining a Comprehension, that the removal of the Sacramental Test (originally intended against the Catholics) and the admission of all his Protestant subjects into places of trust, were rejected by the Parliament. All that could be done for the Dissenters was the act of Indulgence, whereby they were excused from all penalties for their not coming to Church, and for going to their separate Meetings. This, indeed, was a valuable privilege, as it put an end to all persecution in matters of conscience, and secured to them the first and chief right of human nature, of following the dictates of conscience in the service of God.

The Non-juring Bishops and Clergy, persisting in their refusal to take the oaths to the Government, were deposed, and their vacant dignities filled up in 1691. Upon this, great contests arose, and a Schism began to be formed in the Church. One side asserting, that the State could not deprive Bishops of their Episcopal character, whilst the others maintained, that Princes had power intirely to depose them. These contests between the two parties in the Church were carried on with great warmth, when Archbishop Sancroft died in 1693. He died in a state of Separation from the Church; and yet he had not the courage to own it in any public declaration: For, neither living nor dying, did he publish any thing concerning it: His death ought to have put an end to the Schism, that some were endeavouring to raise upon this pretence, that a Parliamentary deprivation was never to be allowed, as contrary to the intrinsic power of the Church; and therefore they looked on Sancroft as the Archbishop still, and reckoned Tillotson an usurper; and all that joined with him were counted Schismatics; they were willing to forget, as some of them did plainly condemn, the deprivations made in the progress of the Reformation, more particularly those in the first Parliament of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, and the deprivations made by the act of Uniformity in the year 1662: But, from thence, the controversy was carried up to the fourth century; and a great deal of angry reading was brought out on both sides, to justify or condemn those proceedings. But arguments will never have the better of interest and humour: Yet now, even according to their own pretensions, the Schism ought to have ceased; since he, on whose account it was set up, did never assert his right; and therefore that might have been more justly construed a tacit yielding it.

Whilst a Schism was thus forming in the Church, the Dissenters were no less divided about doctrinal matters, and such heats arose among them, as justly exposed them to censure. Many papers passed between the two parties, called Presbyterian and Congregational, in order to a renunciation of Arminianism on one hand, and Antinomianism on the other, but to little purpose. Some Independents were raising the old Antinomian tenets, as if men, by believing in Christ, were so united to him, that his righteousness became theirs, without any other condition, besides that of their faith: So that, though they acknowledged knowledgeed the obedience to his laws to be necessary, they did not call it a condition, but only a consequence of justification. In this, they were opposed by most of the Presbyterians, who seemed to be sensible, that this struck at the root of all Religion, as it weakened the obligation to a holy life (1). The Presbyterians had been also engaged in disputes with the Anabaptists. They complained, that they saw too great a giddiness in their people, and seemed so sensible of this, and so desirous to be brought into the Church, that a few inconsiderable concessions would very probably have brought the bulk of them into our Communion: But the greater part of the Clergy were so far from any disposition this way, that they seemed to be more prejudiced against them than ever (2). The Churchmen and Dissenters being thus both engaged at once (though in different ways) neither side could much insult the other.

Debates about the Trinity.

This year there was a great contest in the Church about the doctrine of the Trinity. It seems, the Socinians had got considerable ground in England since the Revolution. Many books were printed against the Trinity, which were dispersed by Thomas Firmin (a noted Citizen of London) over the Nation, and by him distributed freely to all who would accept them. By this means it became a common topic of discourse, to treat all mysteries in Religion as the contrivances of Priests, to bring the world into a blind submission to them. Priestcraft grew to be another word in fashion, and the enemies of Religion vented all their notions under the cover of these words. But, while these pretended much zeal for the Government, those, who were at work to undermine it, made great use of all this; they raised a great outcry against Socinianism, and gave it out that it was like to over-run all; for Archbishop Tillotson, and some of the Bishops, had lived in great friendship with Firmin, whose charitable temper they thought it became them to encourage.

Many Divines undertook to write in this controversy, but they did not all go in the same method, nor upon the same principles. Dr Sherlock engaged in the controversy; he was a clear, a polite, and a strong writer, and had got great credit in the former Reign, by his writings against those of the Church of Rome; but he was apt to assume too much to himself, and to treat his adversaries with contempt; this created him many enemies, and made him pass for an insolent haughty man; he was at first a Jacobite, and, while, for not taking the oaths, he was under suspension, he wrote against the Socinians, in which he took a new method of explaining the Trinity; he thought there were three eternal Minds, two of these issuing from the Father, but that these were one, by reason of a mutual consciousness in the three to each others thoughts: This was looked on as plain Trithemism; but all the party applauded him and his book. Soon after that, an accident of an odd nature happened.

There was a book drawn up by Bishop Overall, fourscore Years ago, concerning Government; in which, it's being of a divine institution was very positively asserted; it was read in Convocation, and passed by that body, in order to the publishing it, in opposition to the principles laid down, in that famous book of Parsons the Jesuit, published under the name of Doleman; King James the First did not like a Convocation entering into such a theory of politics; so he wrote a long letter to Abbot, who was afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, but was then in the Lower House; Bishop Burnet had the original, writ all in his own hand, in his possession; by it he desired, that no further progress should be made in that matter, and that this

(1). Mr Asgil, a Member of Parliament, published a book, grounded on their notions, on which he had grafted a new and wild inference of his own, that, since true Believers recovered in Christ all that they lost in Adam, and our natural death was the effect of Adam's sin, he inferred, that Believers were rendered immortal by Christ, and not liable to death: And that those who believed, with a true and firm Faith, could not die. This was a strain beyond all that ever went before him, and, since we see that all men die, the natural consequence that resulted from this was, that there neither are, or ever were, any true Believers.

(2). The Quakers had likewise a great breach made among them by one George Keith, a Scotchman, educated at Aberdeen. He had been thirty-six years among them; he was esteemed the most learned man that ever was in that sect; he was well versed both in the oriental tongues, in philosophy, and mathematics; after he had been above thirty years in high esteem among them, he was sent to Pennsylvania (a colony set up by Penn., where they are very numerous) to have the chief direction of the education of their youth. In those parts, he said, he first discovered that which had been always either denied to him, or so disguised that he did not suspect it; but being far out of reach, and in a place where they were masters, they spoke out their mind plainer; and it appeared to him, that they were Deists, and that they turned the whole doctrine of the Christian Religion into allegories; chiefly those, which relate to the death and resurrection of Christ, and the reconciliation of sinners to God; by virtue of his Cross: He, being a true Christian, set himself with great zeal against this, upon which they grew weary of him, and sent him back to England. At his return, he set himself to read many of their books, and then he discovered the mystery, which was formerly so hid from him, that he had not observed it: Upon this, he opened a new meeting, and by a printed summons he called the whole party, to come and see the proof that he had to offer, to convince them of these errors: Few Quakers came to his meetings, but great multitudes of other people flocked about him: He brought the Quakers books with him, and read such passages out of them, as convinced his hearers, that he had not charged them falsely: He continued these meetings, being still, in outward appearance, a Quaker, for some years; till having prevailed as far as he saw any probability of success, he laid aside their exterior, and was reconciled to the Church, and took holy orders.

this book might not be offered to him for his assent: Thus that matter slept, but Sanerost had got Overall's own book into his hands; and, in the beginning of this Reign, he resolved to publish it, as an authentic declaration, that the Church of England had made in this matter; and it was published, as well as licenced by him, a very few days before he came under suspension, for not taking the oaths: But there was a paragraph or two in it, that they had not considered, which was plainly calculated, to justify the owning the United Provinces to be a lawful Government: For it was there laid down, that, when a change of Government was brought to a thorough settlement, it was then to be owned and submitted to, as a work of the Providence of God; and a part of King James's letter to Abbot related to this. When Sherlock observed this, he had some conferences with the party, in order to convince them by that, which he said had convinced himself. Soon after that he took the oaths, and was made Dean of St Paul's; he published an account of the grounds he went on, which drew out many virulent books against him; after that, they pursued him with the clamour of Tritheism, which was done with much malice, by the very same persons, who had highly magnified the performance, while he was of their party: So powerful is the bias of interest and passion, in the most speculative and the most important doctrines.

Dr. South, a learned but an ill-natured Divine, who had taken the oaths, but with the reserve of an equivocal sense, which he put on them, attacked Dr. Sherlock's book of the Trinity, not without wit and learning, but without any measure of Christian charity, and without any regard, either to the dignity of the subject, or the decencies of his profession. He explained the Trinity in a common method, that the Deity was one Essence in three Subsistencies; Sherlock replied, and charged this as Sabellianism; and some others went into the dispute, with some learning, but with more heat. A Fellow of University College in Oxford, in a public sermon, preached Dr. Sherlock's notions, and asserted, That there were three distinct Minds and Substances in the Trinity;

and also, That the Three Persons in the Trinity are three distinct Minds or Spirits, and three individual Substances. The friends of Dr. South making complaint of these words, the Heads of the Colleges, Nov. 25, 1695, caused them to be censured by a solemn decree in Convocation, wherein they were declared to be false, impious, and heretical, and all persons, under their institution or care, were required to affirm no such doctrine, either by preaching or otherwise. When Sherlock's book was first published, it met (as was said) with a general applause; and Firmin was told, that, if it did not reclaim him from his Heresy, it would rise up in judgment against him. But, when the Oxford decree came abroad, his former abettors intirely deserted him: And now said, Universities speak but seldom, and by way of authority; but, as they interpose but rarely, it is always with certainty. Thus the same persons who had boasted of his book (not only as orthodox, but) as unanswerable, now turned about, and as much approved the Oxford decree. Sherlock (who used to say, I am sure I am right) quickly published his Examination of this decree, wherein he says*, "These Decreeing and Heresy-making" p. 46.
"Heads of Colleges have condemned the true
"Catholic Faith, the Nicene Faith, and the "Faith of the Church of England." Adding, in the same page, "Three Divine Persons, who are not three distinct Minds and Substances, is not greater Heresy than it is Non-sense." As Sherlock wrote against the Oxford censure with the highest strains of contempt, so the Socinians triumphed not a little upon all this, and in several of their books divided their adversaries into real and nominal Trinitarians; Sherlock was put into the first class; as for the second class, they pretended, it had been the doctrine of the Western Church, ever since the fourth Lateran Council (1).

(1) For the better understanding these matters, it will be proper briefly to state the Trinitarian, Arian, and Socinian doctrines of the Trinity.

The Trinitarians (called by their adversaries Athanasians) believe that in the Godhead, there are three co-equal, and co-eternal Persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, each singly God, and all Three as existing in the same undivided substance but one God.

The Arians on the contrary, believe the Father only to be the supreme God, and that the Son and Holy Ghost derived before all ages, their Being from him, and are subordinate to him.

The Socinians also believed the Father alone to be the supreme God, and affirm the Son had no existence before his miraculous conception and birth, and that the Holy Ghost or spirit of God, is not a real Person, but only the power, operation, or influence, of the Father.

From the different manner of explaining the word Person, the Trinitarians are called nominal or real.

Nº. 33. Vol. III.

Nominal Trinitarians explain the Three Persons by three Modes (or manners) of subsistence, or by three differences in the Godhead, such were Wallis, South, Tillotson, &c. This explanation borders upon Sabellianism, and differs but little from Socinianism. The Real Trinitarians believe the Three Persons to be three intelligent Agents, having each an understanding and will; such was Sherlock at the time of this controversy, and such was the late Dr. Waterland, whose explanation of the Trinity seems now to be generally received; namely, there are Three Persons or intelligent Agents existing in one undivided substance, and as they thus exist in the same undivided substance, they are all Three but one God.

The Trinitarians charge their adversaries with asserting blasphemy, and denying the Divinity of their Saviour; on the other hand, the Arians and Socinians charge the Trinitarians with denying the Supremacy of the Father, with Tritheism or having three Gods, and with asserting impossibilities, absurdities, and contradictions.

any other doctrine concerning the blessed Trinity, than what is contained in the holy Scriptures, and is agreeable to the Three Creeds, and the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

"II. That, in the explication of this doctrine, they carefully avoid all new terms, and confine themselves to such ways of explication, as have been commonly used in the Church.

"III. That care be taken in this matter, especially to observe the fifty-third Canon of this Church, which forbids public opposition, between preachers; and that, above all things, they abstain from bitter invectives, and scurrilous language against all persons whatsoever.

"IV. That the foregoing directions be also observed by those who write any thing concerning the said doctrine."

July 26. With these injunctions, Archbishop Tenison also sent forth his circular letters, containing many rules and orders for general observation.

This put a stop to those debates, as Firmin's death put a stop to the spreading of Socinian books (1).

9th, Dissenters still continued their doctrinal contentions. An attempt was now made for a re-union among them. There was an offer on one side to renounce the Arminian, if the other side would renounce the Antinomian tenets; but it did not succeed.

1697. Upon all these proceedings, some angry 1698. Clergymen, who had not that share of preferment, that they thought they deserved, began to complain that no Convocation was suffered to sit, to whom the judging, in such points, seemed most properly to belong: Books were writ on this head; it was said, that the law made in King Henry the Eighth's time, that limited the power of that body, so that no new Canons could be attempted or put in use, without the King's licence and consent, did not disable them from sitting: On the contrary, a Convocation was held to be a part of the Parliament, so that it ought always to attend upon it, and to be ready, when advised with, to give their opinions chiefly in matters of Religion. They had also, as these men pretended, a right to prepare Articles and Canons, and to lay them before the King, who might indeed deny his assent to them, as he did to bills, that were offered him by both Houses of Parliament. This led them to strike at the King's Supremacy, and to assert the intrinsic power of the Church, which had been disowned by this Church, ever since the time of the Reformation: And indeed, the King's Supremacy was thought to be carried formerly too high, and that by the same sort of men, who were now studying to lay it as low. It seemed, that some men were for maintaining it, as long as it was in their management, and that it made for them; but resolved to weaken it, all they could, as soon as it went out of their hands, and was no more at their discretion: Such a turn do men's interests and partialities give to their opinions.

This year a process for Simony against Bishop Watson was brought to a sentence and conclusion. He was promoted by King James to the Bishoprick of St. David's; it was believed that he gave money for his advancement, and that, in order to the reimbursing himself, he sold most of the spiritual preferments in his gift: By the law and custom of this Church, the Archbishop is the only judge of a Bishop, but, upon such occasions, he calls for the assistance of some of the Bishops; he called for six in this cause; it was proved, that the Bishop had collated a nephew of his to a great many of the best preferments in his gift, and that, for many years, he had taken the whole profits of these to himself, keeping his nephew very poor, and obliging him to perform no part of his duty: It was also proved, that the Bishop obtained leave to keep a benefice, which he held before his promotion by a Commendam (one of the abuses, which the Popes brought in among us, from which we have not been able hitherto to free our Church) he had sold both the cure and the profits to a Clergyman, for a sum of money, and had obliged himself to resign it upon demand, that is, as soon as the Clergyman could, by another sum, purchase the next presentation of the Patron: These things were fully proved. To these was added a charge of many oppressive fees, which being taken for benefices, that were in his gift, were not only extortion, but a presumptive Simony: All these he had taken himself, without making use of a register or actuary; for, as he would not trust those secrets to any other, so he swallowed up the fees, both of his Chancellor and Register; he had also ordained many persons, without tendering them the oaths enjoined by law; and yet, in their letters for orders, he had certified under his hand and seal, that they had taken those oaths; this was, what the law calls crimen falsi, the certifying that which he knew to be false; no exceptions lay to the witnesses, by whom these things were made out, nor did the Bishop bring any proofs on his side, to contradict their evidence; some affirmed, that he was a sober and regular man, and that he spoke often of Simony with such detestation, that they could not think him capable of committing it: The Bishop of Rockester withdrew from the Court, on the day in which sentence was to be given; he consented to a suspension, but he did not think that a Bishop could be deprived by the Archbishop: When the Court sat to give judgment, the Bishop resumed his privilege of Peerage,

(1) Firmin died in 1698. He was in great esteem for promoting many charitable designs, for looking after the poor of the City, and setting them to work; for raising great sums for schools and hospitals, and indeed, for charities of all sorts, private and public: He had such credit with the richest Citizens, that he had the command of great Wealth, as oft as there was occasion for it; and he laid out his own time chiefly, in advancing all such designs: These things gained him a great reputation; He was called a Socinian, but was really an Arian, which he very freely owned before the Revolution; but he gave no public vent to it till after the Revolution, when he studied to promote his Opinions with much heat.

Peerage, and pleaded it; but he, having waved it in the House of Lords, and having gone on still submitting to the Court, no regard was had to this, since a plea to the jurisdiction of the Court was to be offered in the first instance, but could not be kept up to the last, and then be made use of: The Bishops, that were present, agreed to a sentence of Deprivation. He was a very ill man in all respects, passionate, covetous, and false in the blackest instances, without one good quality to balance his many bad ones. But, as he was advanced by King James, so he stuck firm to that interest; and the party, though ashamed of him, yet were resolved to support him with great zeal. He appealed to a Court of Delegates, and they, about the end of the year, confirmed the Archbishop's sentence.

Another prosecution followed for Simony against Jones, Bishop of St. Asaph, in which, though the presumptions were very great, yet, the evidence was not so clear as in the former case; the Bishops in Wales give almost all the benefices in their Dioceses; so this primitive constitution, that is still preserved among them, was scandalously abused by some wicked men, who set holy things to sale, and thereby increased the prejudices, that are but too easily received, both against Religion and the Church.

The King, during the Queen's life, left the affairs and promotions in the Church wholly in her hands. He found he could not resist importunities, which were not only vexatious to him, but had drawn performances from him, which he came quickly to see were ill bestowed. Wherefore, as this was an article of Government, for which he thought himself unqualified, yet was unwilling to commit to his Ministers, he devolved it upon the Queen, which she managed with strict and religious prudence (1). She consulted chiefly with Archbishop Tillotson, whom she favoured and supported in a most particular manner. The Queen openly declared against preferring those who put in for themselves, and took care to inform herself particularly of the merits of such of the Clergy, as were not so much known at Court, nor using any methods to get themselves recommended. Upon the Queen's death, a Commission was granted to the two Archbishops, and four other Bishops, and renewed in 1700, whereby they, or any three of them, were appointed to recommend to all Bishopsricks, Deaneries, or other vacant preferments in the Church, signifying the same to his Majesty, by writing under their hands. And, during the King's absence beyond sea, they were impowered, of their own authority, to present to all benefices in the gift of the Crown, under the value of one hundred and forty pounds a year (2). It was hoped that this course would produce at length a great change in the Church, and in the temper of the Clergy. This Commission gave great offence to the discontented part of the Clergy, and the new Ministry often pressed the King to dissolve it. Those of the Clergy (who began now to be called the High-Church party, and among whom some great preferments had at first been given, to try if it were possible to soften them, and win them to be hearty to the government) when they saw preferments went in another channel, set up a complaint over all England of the want of Convocations, that they were not allowed to fit or act with a free liberty, to consider of the grievances of the Clergy, and of the danger the Church was in. This was a new pretension, never thought of since the Reformation. Some books were writ to justify it, with great acrimony of stile, and a high strain of insolence, especially a Letter to a Convocation-man, by Mr. Francis Atterbury. This Author (who in the course of this History will often be mentioned) had very good parts, great learning, was an excellent preacher, and had many extraordinary things in him, but was both ambitious and virulent out of measure. He had a singular talent in asserting paradoxes with a great air of assurance, shewing no shame when he was detected in them, though this was done in many instances. Nor did he in such cases, either confess his errors, or pretend to justify himself, but went on still venting new falsehoods, in so barefaced a manner that he seemed to outdo the Jesuits themselves. He thought the Government had so little strength or credit, that any claim against it would be well received. He attacked the Supremacy of the Crown, with relation to Ecclesiastical matters, which had been hitherto maintained by all our Divines with great zeal. But now the hot men of the Clergy did so readily entertain his notions, that in them it appeared, that those who are most earnest in the defence of certain points, when these points seem to be for them, can very suddenly change their minds upon a change of circumstances (3).

Complaints for want of a Convocation to sit and act.

A Con-

(1) There is a particular instance mentioned by Bishop Burnet, of the Queen's care in disposing of Bishopsricks. When Lord Sidney was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, he was so far engaged in the interest of a great family in Ireland, that he was too easily wrought on, to recommend a branch of it to a vacant See. The representation was made with an undue character of the person: So the Queen granted it. But, when she understood, that he lay under a very bad character, she wrote a letter in her own hand to Lord Sidney, letting him know what she had heard, and ordered him, to call for six Irish Bishops whom she named to him, and to require them to certify to her their opinion of that person: They all agreed, that he laboured under an ill fame, and, till that he was examined into, they did not think it proper to promote him; so that matter was let fall.

(2) The four Bishops were Samuel, Worcester, Ely, and Norwich. The last commission was dated May 9, 1700.

(3) An eminent instance of this had appeared in the House of Peers in the last Session, when Dr. Watson, the deprived Bishop of St. David's, complained of the Archbishop of Canterbury: First, for breach of privilege, since sentence was passed upon him, though he had in Court claimed a privilege of Parliament, to which no regard had been paid: But, as he had waved his privilege in the House of Lords, it was carried after a long debate, and by no great Majority, that, in that case, he could not resume his privilege. He excepted next to the Archbishop's jurisdiction, and pretended that he could not judge a Bishop, but in a Synod of Bishops of the Province, according to the Rules of the primitive times: In opposition to this, it was shewn, that from the ninth and tenth century downward, both Popes and Kings had concurred to bring of Convocation

met. Feb. 10.
1700-1.

A Convocation had been summoned with every new Parliament; but after the first Convocation, in 1689, had (as was related) discovered their aversion to the scheme of Comprehension, which was to be laid before them, and expressed their resolution to do nothing in it, the King (according to the practice of King Charles II.) had ordered the Convocation to be regularly prorogued, and never suffered them to sit. This, by degrees, gave a handle of complaint, as if the Clergy were debarred from the rights and liberties of meeting and acting in Convocation. But, upon the King's putting the Government into the hands of the Tories, the new Ministry, when they undertook to serve the King, made it one of their demands, that a Convocation should have leave to sit, which was promised; and accordingly a Convocation was summoned to meet, the 10th of February 1700-1, which was allowed to sit and act. Mr. Aterbury's book, concerning the Rights of a Convocation, was reprinted with great corrections and additions; the first edition was drawn out of some imperfect and disorderly collections, and he himself soon saw, that, notwithstanding the assurance and the virulence with which it was writ, he had made many great mistakes in it; so, to prevent a discovery from other hands, he corrected his book in many important matters; yet he left a great deal to those who answered him, and did it with such a superiority of argument and of knowledge in these matters, that his insolence in despising these answers was as extraordinary, as the parties adhering to him after such manifest discoveries. Dr. Kennet laid him so open, not only in many particulars, but in a thread of ignorance that ran through his whole book, that, if he had not had a measure of confidence peculiar to himself, he must have been much humbled under it. The Clergy hoped to recover many lost privileges by the help of his performances; they fancied they had a right to be a part of the Parliament, so they looked on him as their champion, and on most of the Bishops as the betrayers of the rights of the Church: This was encouraged by the new Ministry; they were displeased with the Bishops for adhering to the old Ministry; and they hoped, by the terror of a Convocation, to have forced them to apply to them for shelter. The Jacobites intended to put us all in such a flame, as they hoped would disorder the Government. The things the Convocation pretended to were first, that they had a right to sit whenever the Parliament sat; so that they could not be prorogued, but when the two Houses were prorogued: Next they advanced, that they had no need of a licence to enter upon debates, and to prepare matters, though it was confessed, that the practice for an hundred years was against them; but they thought the Convocation lay under no farther restraint, than that the Parliament was under; and as they could pass no act without the Royal assent, so they confessed that they could not enact or publish a Canon without the King's licence. Antiently the Clergy granted their own subsidies apart; but, ever since the Reformation, the grant of the Convocation was not thought good, till it was ratified in Parliament; but the rule of subsidies being so high on the Clergy, they had submitted to be taxed by the House of Commons ever since the year 1665, though no memorials were left to inform us, how that matter was consented to so generally, that no opposition of any sort was made to it; the giving of money being yielded up, which was the chief business of Convocations, they had after that nothing to do; so they sat only for form's sake, and were adjourned of course; nor did they ever pretend, notwithstanding all the danger that Religion was in during the former Reigns, to sit and act as at a Synod; but now this was demanded as a right, and they complained of their being so often prorogued, as a violation of their Constitution, for which all the Bishops, but more particularly the Archbishop of Canterbury, was cried out on; they said, that he and the Bishops looked so much to their own interests, that they forgot the interests of the Church, or rather betrayed them: The greater part of the Clergy were in no good temper; they hated the Toleration, and were heavily charged with the taxes, which made them very uneasy; and this disposed them to be soon inflamed by those, who were seeking out all possible methods to disorder our affairs: They hoped to have engaged them against the Supremacy, and reckoned, that, in the feeble state to which the Government was now brought, they might hope either to wrest it quite from the Crown, and then it would fall into the management of the House of Commons; or, if the King should proceed against them according to the Statute, and sue them in a Premunire, this might unite the Clergy into such an opposition to the Government, as would probably throw us into great convulsions: But many aspiring men among them, had no other design, but to force them-bring this power singly into the hands of the Metropolitans; that this was the constant practice in England before the Reformation; that by the provisional clause, in the Act passed in the twenty-fifth of Henry the Eighth, that impowered thirty-two persons to draw a new body of Church-laws, all former laws or Customs were to continue in force, till that new body was prepared: So that the power, the Metropolitan then was possessed of, stood confirmed by that clause: It is true, during the high-commission, all proceedings against Bishops were brought before that Court, which proceeded in a summary way, and against whose Sentence no appeal lay: But, after that Court was taken away, a full declaration was made by an Act of Parliament, for continuing the power that was lodged with the Metropolitan. It was also urged, that, if the Bishop had any exception to the Archbishop's jurisdiction, that ought to have been pleaded in the first instance, and not reserved to the conclusion of all: Nor could the Archbishop erect a new court, or proceed in the trial of a Bishop in any other way, than in that, which was warranted by law or precedent: To all this no answer was made, but the business was kept up, and put off by many delays: It was said, the thing was new, and the House was not yet well apprized of it; and the last time, in which the debate was taken up in the House, it ended in an intimation, that it was hoped the King would not fill that See till the House should be better satisfied, in the point of the Archbishop's authority: So the Bishoprick was not disposed of for some years: And this uncertainty put a great delay to the process of Jones, the other Welsh Bishop, accused of the same crime. Burnet. II. 250.

themselves into preferment, by the opposition they made. In the writ that the Bishops had, summoning them to Parliament, the clause, known by the first word of it Premunientes, was still continued: At first, by virtue of it, the inferior Clergy were required to come to Parliament, and to consent to the aids there given: But, after the Archbishops had the provincial writ, for a Convocation of the Province, the other was no more executed, though it was still kept in the writ, and there did not appear the least shadow of any use that had been made of it, for some hundreds of years; yet now some Bishops were prevailed on, to execute this clause, and to summon the Clergy by virtue of it (1). The Convocation was opened with speeches, full of sharp reflections on the Bishops, which they passed over, being unwilling to begin a dispute.

The Archbishop's power of adjourning disputed.

Dr Hooper, Dean of Canterbury, was chosen Prolocutor, a man of learning and good conduct hitherto; he was reserved, crafty, and ambitious; his Deanery had not softened him, for he thought he deserved to be raised much higher. He was presented on the 21st of February the day appointed, by Dr Fane Dean of Gloucester, and approved and confirmed in the usual manner. The constant method of adjournment had been this: The Archbishop signed a schedule for that purpose, by which the Upper House was immediately adjourned; and the schedule, being sent down to the Prolocutor, did also adjourn the Lower House. The Clergy perceiving, that by this method the Archbishop could adjourn them at pleasure, and either hinder or break off all debates, resolved to begin at disputing this point. In the next Session therefore, February 25, when the Archbishop's schedule was brought down to the Lower House, which was legally to determine the Session, in contempt of it they continued sitting, and proceeded in some debates of no moment. After which, the Prolocutor intimated an adjournment by consent of the House, to meet again in Henry VII's Chapel, instead of the adjournment to meet in the Jerusalem Chamber, as by the schedule, which expressly included the whole body of the Convocation, and left no pretence to separate adjournments in either House. The Archbishop, and a far greater part of his Suffragans, looked on this proceeding of the Lower House as a declaration of setting up a separate interest and power, that would break the union of the provincial Synod, and prevent the good correspondence of both Houses, and so frustrate the common methods of doing any business. In the fourth Session, Feb. 28, the Prolocutor and Clergy did not attend the Archbishop and Bishops in the Synodical place, the Jerusalem Chamber; which was interpreted to be a second contempt of the authority of the President, and the obligation of his instrument, the schedule proroguing and continuing the whole body of Prelates and Clergy.

The Archbishop sent for the Prolocutor, and, with the consent of his brethren, put these two questions to him: 1. Whether the Lower House of Convocation did sit, after they were prorogued by his Grace on the 25th instant? 2. Whether they did meet this morning, without attending in this place, to which they were prorogued?

(1) In the Bishops writs of Summons to Parliament, there is a clause ordering them to summon to Parliament the Dean, Chapter, Archdeacons, and Clergy of their respective Dioceses. As this clause, called the Premunientes clause, was sometimes omitted in the Parliamentary writs, Dr Hady fixes the constant usage of it from the 28th year of Ed. III. 1353. The Bishops, Abbots, and Priors, to whom particular writs are directed, are summoned cum prædictis Prælati magnatibus et proceribus supradictis negotiis tractaturi, vestrumque consilium impensuri. In the first writ now extant, in which the inferior Clergy were summoned, the 23d of Ed. I. they were summoned ad tractandum, ordinandum et faciendum nobiscum, &c. which is the same style that was used in the writs directed at the same time to the Temporal Lords. In the 24th of Ed. I. they are summoned ad ordinandum de quantitate et modo subsidii. In the writ of the 28th of Ed. I. it is, ad faciendum et consentiendum hiis quæ tunc de communi consilio (favente Domino) ordinari contigerit. This form continued to the 20th of Ed. II. and after that to the 10th of Ed. III. The 20th of Ed. II. it begun to be ad consentiendum hiis quæ tunc, &c. Afterwards to the 5th of Rich. II. it was sometimes ad faciendum et consentiendum; sometimes, but more often, ad consentiendum only. From the last Parliament of that year down to these times, it has all along continued so. The clause now is always in these words: Premunientes Decanum et Capitulum Ecclesiæ vestræ Cant. ac Archidiaconos totumque Clerum vestrum Diocæs. quod iidem Decanus et Archidiaconi in propriis personis suis prædictum Capitulum per unum, idemque Clerus per duos procuratores idoneos, plenam et sufficientem potestatem ab ipsis Capitulis et Clero divisiim habentibus, prædictis die et loco personaliter interfuit ad consentiendum hiis quæ tunc ibidem de communi consilio dicti Regni nostri divinâ favente clementia contigerit ordinari. From the inferior Clergy being thus summoned to Parliament, a dispute was now set on foot, whether these Parliamentary Assemblies were all Ecclesiastical Synods. Atterbury asserted, a Convocation is an attendant upon a Parliament of England. The Clergy were brought to Parliament by the Premunientes clause. But in process of time, by a mistake in their politics, they were separated from the Parliament, and yet still continued to attend it in two Provincial Assemblies or Convocations: Which, as they met for the same purpose, and had the same reasons of state inserted into their writs of summons as the Parliament had, so did they keep closely to the forms, and rules, and manner of sitting and acting, practised in Parliament, and they had Parliamentary Wages and Parliamentary Privileges, and attended the Parliament as one of the Three States of the Realm. These Parliamentary Convocations came in the room of Provincial Councils, which from the beginning of Christianity met twice a year, and needed no leave. He farther asserts, the Clergy have not only a right to meet and sit in Convocation as often as a new Parliament sits, but a right also (when met) of treating and debating about such affairs as lie within their sphere, and of coming to fit resolutions about them, without being obliged antecedently to qualify themselves for such acts and debates by a licence under the Broad Seal of England. Though they cannot make a Canon, yet they speak the sense of the whole Clergy of the Kingdom in matters proper for them to intermeddle in: They may petition, advise, address, represent, give their judgment where it may be desired, or their censures either of men or books where it may be needful: And suggest the fittest methods of securing the Christian Faith, and of preventing the revival of old heresies and errors, and the growth of new ones. He also asserts, that the Premunientes in the Bishops writ is not an idle useless clause, inserted only on a particular occasion, and continued by accident, but a real and effectual summons of the Clergy to Parliament; such as they heretofore made formal returns to, as often as it went out, and did expressly obey: and of this he gives prorogued? Upon some discourse the Prolocutor said, That the Lower House was preparing somewhat to lay before his Grace and the Upper House, concerning the methods of prorogation, and some other things of form. The Archbishop answered, That he and his brethren were ready to receive, whatsoever should be offered by them, and would consider of it, and do upon it what should appear to them to be just and right: But, in the mean time, he and his brethren thought fit to continue the usual practice. Accordingly, that the phrase of proroguing in hunc locum might admit of no dispute, it was in the schedule of the day expressly specified, in hunc locum vulgo vocat Jerusalem Chamber: To which the Lower House submitted with a salvo jure; and at the next Session, March 6, the Prolocutor, with several Members, attended the Archbishop and Bishops in the Jerusalem Chamber, according to the last schedule; and being soon dismissed, went to their own House, from whence, in a little time, they carried up a report of a Committee, appointed to search the Convocation books, for directions concerning the prorogations of their House. The report was thus:

Report of the Lower House.

1. We find that the common usage of this House has been to continue sitting, till the Prolocutor did prorogue or adjourn, or intimate the adjournment or prorogation thereof, either personally, or by some Member of this House, thereunto deputed by him: And in both these cases (as we conceive) with the consent of this House. And we also find by some instances, that this House did not always prorogue and adjourn to the same day with the Upper House.

2. We find the like common usage by this

House to have been, that when, in the Upper House, the Convocation was prorogued or adjourned, by the words in hunc locum, this House did meet apart from the same, at the same particular place where it sat last. And when the Convocation was prorogued or adjourned to some other general place, viz. St Paul's and Lambeth, then also this House did assemble in a separate place, distinctly from their Lordships. And farther, we find no footsteps of evidence to conclude, that it was ever the practice of this House to attend their Lordships before this House did meet and sit, pursuant to their former adjournment. But when this House hath first met and sat, it hath been the constant practice to attend their Lordships with business of their own motion, or when they were called up to their Lordships by a special messenger.

This paper was ordered by the Archbishop to be read, though it was intitled, A report of the Committee, and did not run in the name of the House, as it should have done; and then referred the examination of it to a Committee of Bishops. In the mean while, the Archbishop delivered to the Prolocutor the form of an umble address to his Majesty, and propoed to him the content of the Lower House, which was given without amendment, only they propoed it might be Reformed Churches, instead of Reformed Religion: And with the alteration of that word, it was presented to his Majesty, on March 10, by the Archbishop. It contained thanks to his Majesty for his constant protection and favour to the Church of England; an acknowledgment of his pious concern for the Reformed Churches in general, and an assurance of their steadfast fidelity and affection, and readiness instances till the time of Henry VIII: And then undertakes to prove, that the writ to the two Archbishops to convene the Clergy of their Provinces, though it does not expressly mention a Parliament, yet has an immediate reference to it: The original design of it's issuing out, together with the Bishop's writ, being only to secure an obedience to the premonitory clause of it, and to make the Clergy's Parliamentary attendance the more full and certain.

On the contrary, Kennet asserts, Diocesan Synods are more ancient than Provincial. That Presbyters are no authoritative part of Provincial Synods. That Capitular Prebends were summoned to our Convocations, not for counsel or necessary consent in spiritual affairs, but for secular possessions and civil rights, which were often there treated of; and to support the Government with the unreasonable aid and taxes. He distinguishes between true Ecclesiastical Synods, which had no authority in, or dependence on, the Parliament, and Parliamentary Assemblies of the Clergy.

He says, That the lower Clergy for many ages did not come to Provincial Synods, but for a dutiful attendance on the Bishops, and offered only a submissive approbation of their acts: And that their coming to Parliamentary Assemblies, was to give money. And that it was by degrees found expedient, that the same Clergy, as was summoned to the National Parliament, should at the same time be summoned to a Provincial Synod or Assembly, concurrent with that Parliament. But this was by another writ, besides that contained in the Bishop's summons, with the clause Præmunientes: And even by another writ from the King. And he charges Mr Aiterbury with miserable confusion all along, as if he thought every Parliamentary meeting of the Clergy, to be an Ecclesiastical Synod, and every Ecclesiastical Synod, to be a Parliamentary body of the Clergy; than which nothing more false in fact and law. He takes a great deal of pains to rectify the matter of the Præmunientes clause: And then says, That the English Clergy in their own Parliamentary Convocations, taxed their own Body, to the 15 Car. II. 1663; when in a following Session of Parliament in 1664, by measures wisely concerted between the Governors of the Church, and the leading Members of the House of Commons, the Clergy were in silence to recede from the customary right of taxing themselves apart from the Laity: And all their Ecclesiastical Benefices were to be now assessed, (as their Temporal Estates were before) upon the same foot and level with all other English Subjects in the bills beginning in the House of Commons. And thus departing from their ancient practice of taxing themselves, the end of the Præmunientes he says was lost. Rectors and Vicars being now taxed for their glebe and tythes, by the Commons, have a vote in electing Members: And therefore have the less occasion to be now represented by any Members of their own body.

Hody considers a Convocation either in itself, as it is a Synod, and called by the Archbishop's mandate, or as it is a part of the Parliament, and summoned by a Royal writ directed to each particular Bishop. He observes, they that are summoned by the Præmunientes clause, have not sat in Parliament for some hundreds of years. For some ages together, the writ has been seldom executed, or if executed, never effectually obeyed; that is, it has not been so obeyed, as to be returned into the Crown-office, and no one, for some ages, has been so constituted a proxy for any of the inferior Clergy, as to be sent up on that errand. After many remarks upon the Præmunientes clause, he concludes, that it was continued in the writs, after it became a constant custom for the Clergy to meet in a separate body by virtue of the Archbishop's mandate, that thereby our Princes might assert their right of calling the Clergy (if they please) to Parliament; which the Clergy opposed, as an invasion and inroad upon their liberties.

to maintain the Supremacy as settled by law, &c. And they were graciously received by the King. He thanked them for their promises of maintaining his Supremacy according to law; beyond which he assured them he would never extend it.

Books censured.

During these disputes, that the Lower House might express a zeal for matters of Religion, they resolved to proceed against some bad books; they began with one, intitled, Christianity not mysterious, wrote by one Toland, a man of a bold and petulant wit, who passed for a Socinian, but was believed to be a man of no Religion: They drew some propositions out of this book, but did it with little judgment, that they passed over the worst, that were in it, and singled out some, that how ill soever they were meant, yet were capable of a good sense (1): They brought up the censure, that they had passed on this book, to the Bishops, and desired them to agree to their resolutions: This struck so directly at the Episcopal authority, that it seemed strange to see men, who had so long asserted the Divine right of Episcopacy, and that Presbyters were only their assistants and counsel (according to the language of all antiquity) now assume to themselves the most important act of Church Government, the judging in points of doctrine. Hence it appeared, how soon mens interests and passions can run them from one extreme to another. The Bishops saw, that their design was only to gain some credit to themselves, by this shew of zeal for the great articles of Religion; so they took advice of men learned in the law, how far the act of Submission, in the twenty-fifth of Henry the Eighth, did restrain them in this case (2).

There had been the like complaint made in the Convocation 1689. of many ill books then published; and the Bishops had then advised both with Civilians and common Lawyers in this matter: They were answered, that every Bishop might proceed in his own Court, against the authors or spreaders of ill books, within his Diocese: But they did not know of any power the Convocation had to do it: It did not so much as appear, that they could summon any to come before them: And when a book was published, with the Author's name to it, the condemning it, without hearing the Author upon it, seemed contrary to the common rules of justice. It did not seem to be a Court at all, and since no appeal lay from it, it certainly could not be a Court, in the first instance. When this question was now again put to Lawyers, namely, Whether the Convocation's giving an opinion concerning a book that is heretical, impious, and immoral, is contrary to law? Some were afraid, and others were unwilling to answer it: But Sir Edward Northey, afterwards made Attorney-General, thought the condemning books was a thing of great consequence; since the Doctrine of the Church might be altered, by condemning explanations of one sort, and allowing those of another; and since the Convocation had no licence from the King, he thought that, by meddling in that matter, they should incur the pains in the statute: So all further debate of this matter was let fall by the Bishops (3).

When the Bishops had considered the report brought up from the Lower House, they drew a copious answer to it, in which all their precedents

Report of the Lower House answered.

(1) The Positions extracted out of Toland's book were as follow:

"Pos. 1. I conclude, That neither God himself, nor any of his attributes, are mysterious to us, for want of adequate ideas.

"Pos. 2. No doubt on it, as far as any Church allows of mysteries, so far it is Anti-Christian, and may, with a great deal of justice, though little honour, claim kindred with the scarlet whore.

"Pos. 3. To speak freely, contradiction and mystery are but two emphatical ways of saying nothing.

"Pos. 4. It evidently follows, (i. e. from his observations) that faith is so far from being an implicit assent to any thing above reason, that this notion contradicts the ends of Religion, the nature of Man, and the goodness and wisdom of God.

"Pos. 5. Having drawn a parallel of the ancient Heathen, and, as he calls them, new-coined Christians mysteries, he says—

"I could draw out this parallel much larger, but here is enough to shew how Christianity became mysterious, and how to divine an institution did, through the craft and ambition of Priests and Philosophers, derogate into mere Paganism."

(2) By the act of Submission, the Clergy shall not presume to claim, or put in use, any Constitutions or Canons; nor shall exact, promulge, or execute any such Canons or Ordinances in their Convocations (which always shall be assembled by authority of the King's writ) unless the Clergy may have the King's Royal assent and licence so to do. The King shall have power to name thirty two persons, sixteen of the two Houses of Parliament, and sixteen of the Clergy, to revise the old Canons, and to abrogate, confirm, or alter them as they please, the King's assent being obtained. Provided, that till such revision and correction of the Canons is made, all those which are now received shall remain in force, except such as are contrary to the laws and customs of the realm, or are to the damage or hurt of the King's Prerogative. Upon the proviso of this act, all the proceedings of the Commons and other spiritual Courts are founded; for the Canons not being corrected to this day in the manner here expressed, the old ones are in force, with the exceptions before-mentioned; and this proviso is probably the reason why the Canons were not corrected in the following Reigns, for now it lies in the breast of the judges to declare, what Canons are contrary to the laws or rights of the Crown, which is more for the King's Prerogative, than to make a collection of Ecclesiastical laws, which should be fixed and immovable. The penalties of this act are imprisonment and fine at the King's will.

(3) The Archbishop producing a certain Book, Entitled the Balance of Power, &c. in the 40th page of which were these words; Are not a great many of us able to point out to several persons, whom nothing has recommended to places of the highest trust, and often to rich BENEFICES and DIGNITIES, but the open enmity which they have almost from their cradles profest to the Divinity of Christ? It was agreed that a Paper should be fixed over several doors in Westminster-Abbey, intimating that it was desired by the said Archbishop and Bishops, that the Author himself, wherever he was, or any one of the GREAT MANY to whom he refers, would point out to the particular persons, whom he or they knew to be liable to that charge, that they might be proceeded against in a judicial way; which would be esteemed a great service to the Church: Otherwise the above-mentioned Passage must be looked upon as a PUBLIC SCANDAL. It was now become usual for the violent Party to point out the Bishops and Divines best affected to the Government in Church and State, as Socinians, or any other kind

dents were examined and answered, and the matter was so clearly stated, and so fully proved, that it was hoped the dispute was at an end. But the Lower House, after having sat some time about a reply, instead of going on with it, voted, on the 31st of March 1701, their own right to adjourn themselves, and then sent the Prolocutor with a Message to the Upper House, intimating, that they had considered their reply, which did not give them the satisfaction they desired, and therefore they prayed a free Conference upon the subject-matter in debate. Thus they began to affect, in all their proceedings, to follow the methods of the House of Commons. The Bishops resolved not to comply with this, which was wholly new. They had, upon some occasions, called up the Lower House to a conference, in order to the explaining some things to them; but the Clergy had never taken upon them to desire a free Conference with the Bishops before; wherefore they resolved not to admit of it; and the Archbishop said to the Prolocutor, "We received your verbal message, and took the same into consideration. And whereas we sent you two questions in writing, to which you answered in writing; and we gave a large and distinct answer to the same in writing, in which there were several quotations referring to matter of fact; we therefore expect an answer in writing to the same, and we shall then take the matter into farther consideration, and desire no time to be lost." The Prolocutor replying, "That their answer would take up above twenty sheets," his Grace took occasion to declare, "That he did not confine them to length and breadth, but expected their answer in writing." The Lower House resolved not to comply with this, but insisted upon a free Conference, a word that had never before appeared in the acts of any former Convocation. They would send no other written paper but of reasons for not writing; which were presented on the 5th of April. Three days after a paper was delivered to the Prolocutor in answer to their reasons, in which the Bishops tell them, "That their proceedings had been irregular, and without precedent inundry Particulars: That they could not find so much as one instance of any conference desired by the Lower House: That they were indeed once called up ad Colloquium in 1689, but that the consequences of it were such as did by no means encourage the doing of the like at this present time: And that their pretending to make a recess, by their own authority, apart from the Upper House, and without order from the President, was altogether new, and such a violation of his authority, as could not be complied with, nor suffered, without destroying the fundamental Constitution of an English Convocation." After which, the Archbishop made a speech, and prorogued the Convocation to the 8th of May. The Lower House took no notice of the Archbishop's adjournment, but continued to sit as a House some time that day, and then adjourned themselves to the next day. This was an affectation of independance unknown to former Convocations, and never before attempted by any Presbyters in an Episcopal Church. They did indeed observe the rule of adjourning themselves to the day which the Archbishop had appointed in his schedule, but they did it as their own act, and adjourned themselves to intermediate days.

On the 8th of May the Archbishop told the Prolocutor, that, "what had been done in the Lower House, as a House, since the Prorogation, was not only null and without authority, but of very dangerous consequence to the Constitution. And that they could not receive from them, either by word of mouth or in writing, any thing done by the said House, as a House in that interval." At the same time the Prolocutor delivered a paper, as the act of the Lower House this day, which was an answer to what had been sent them about Toland's book. "They therein intimate their apprehension of the little need there was to consult Lawyers about that book; that the Archbishop might easily have obtained a licence; that a bad use would be made of their omitting to express their dislike of so ill a book: And justify their own proceedings, and much complain of grievances they suffered from the Upper House."

A Committee of Bishops prepared a reply to this paper; signifying, "That they thought it safest, and most for the interest of the Church and Religion, that in the matter of Toland's book as well as others, they should govern themselves by precedents of former Convocations: That his Majesty was the properest Judge, when to grant a licence, and when not; though, considering the treatment which the licence granted to the Convocation in 1689 met with, it could not be thought advisable to desire another, till a better spirit had appeared in those of the Lower House than either did then or now: That they would endeavour to procure a law for regulating the press, &c. That the actions of the Lower House did not agree with their profession; for that they had risen to higher degrees of disrespect and invasion of the Metropolitan and Episcopal rights, than ever was attempted by any Lower House of Convocation before, &c. And that they had hereby given the greatest blow to the Church, that had been given it, since the Presbyterian Assembly that sat at Westminster, in the late times of confusion."

The Lower House going on to sit in intermediate days, Dr Sherlock, and many of the most eminent and learned among them, not only refused to sit with them on those days, but thought it was incumbent on them to protest against their proceedings; but the Lower House refusing to suffer this to be entered in their books, they exhibited a complaint in writing to the Archbishop, and subscribed their names to it.

kind of Hereticks. But no proof was made by Dr Davenant, or by any one who suggested this scandal to him. All moderate divines were looked upon by some hot men, with an ill eye, as persons who were cold and indifferent in the matters of the Church: That which flowed from a gentleness, both of temper and principle, was represented as an inclination to favour Dissenters, which passed among many, for a more heinous thing than leaning to Popery itself.

it (1). The party sitting alone in the intermediate days, they entered into such a secrecy, that it could not be known what they fate so close upon. The Archbishop therefore appointed five Bishops to meet a Committee of the Lower House (not exceeding ten) to inspect the acts of each House in this Convocation, and report their judgments. But though this had often been done, yet upon this occasion the Lower House refused to comply with it, or to name a Committee. This was such an unprecedented invasion of the Episcopal Authority, that the Upper House came to a resolution to receive nothing from them, till that irregularity was set right.

Burnet's Exposition of the articles censured.

As the Lower House was highly incensed against the Bishop of Salisbury, they censured his Exposition of the articles of the Church of England, and in imitation of the general impeachments by the House of Commons, they put their censure into three general propositions. I. That it allowed a diversity of opinions, which the articles are framed to avoid. II. That it contained many passages contrary to the true meaning of the articles, and to other received doctrines of the Church. III. That some things in it were of dangerous consequence to the Church of England, as by law established, and derogated from the honour of the Reformation. Bishop Burnet begged that the Archbishop would dispense with the order made against further communication with the Lower House as to this matter. Accordingly the paper against the Bishop was brought up and received. But what the particulars were, to which these general heads referred, could never be learned; this was a secret lodged in confiding hands. For when the Archbishop moved for the particulars of their charge against the book, they would enter into none, unless they might at the same time offer some other matters, which the Upper House would not admit of (2).

On the 20th of June, the Prolocutor appeared in the Upper House, and the Archbishop told him (as before) that he could receive no paper but that containing the particularities of the general charge against the Bishop of Salisbury's Exposition, which at the Bishop's request he was ready to receive. The Prolocutor saying he had two papers, but could not present the one without the other, without the direction of the Lower House, went back for the opinion of the House, but did not return till the Convocation was prorogued to August the 7th, and thence to September the 18th, and so on, till the Parliament was dissolved, and the Convocation with it.

The Convocation dissolved.

In these proceedings the Bishops were unanimous, except the Bishops of London, Rocheſter, and Exeter: The Bishop of London had been twice disappointed of his hopes of being advanced to the See of Canterbury; so for several years he was engaged with the Tory party, and opposed the Court in every thing, but with little force or authority: The Bishop of Rocheſter * had been deeply engaged in the former * Sprat. Reigns, and he stuck firm to the party, to which, by reason of the liberties of his life, he brought no sort of honour. These Bishops gave no great reputation to the proceedings of the Lower House, to which they adhered; they likewise entered their dissent to the resolutions taken in the Upper House. From the fire raised thus in Convocation, a great heat was spread through the whole Clergy of the Kingdom; it alienated them from their Bishops, and raised factions among them every where (3).

Whilst in England the disputes about Schism, Religious Socinianism, and the rights of Convocation were carrying on amongst those of the Established Church, and the contests about doctrinal points, divided the Dissenters; other Kingdoms were no less disjointed in matters of Religion. The Quietists were increasing not only in Italy but in France (4). The persecution in France began at first divisions abroad.

(1) These were, the Deans Sherlock, Wichart, Freeman; the Archdeacons Bull, Stanley, Jeffery, Trimmel, Boucher; the Proctors, Vernoy, Evans, Whitefoot, Pooley, Little.

(2) A committee of Bishops being appointed to declare their judgment of the extraordinary proceedings of the Lower House, upon occasion of the complaint against the Bishop of Salisbury, they declared it their opinion, "That the Lower House had no manner of power, judiciously to censure any book: That they ought not to have entered upon the examination of a book of any Bishop of this Church, without first acquainting the President and Bishops: That their censuring the Bishop of Salisbury's book in general terms, without mentioning the particular passages on which the censure was grounded, was defamatory and scandalous: That that Bishop by his excellent History of the Reformation, approved by both Houses of Parliament, and other writings, had done great service to the Church of England, and deserved the thanks of their House: And, that though private persons may expound the articles of the Church, yet that it could not be proper for the Convocation at this time to approve, and much less to condemn; such private expostitions."

(3) Notwithstanding Atterbury's book had been proved to be false in many instances, yet we find the following remarkable passage concerning it in the History of this Convocation, published in 1702 in 4to.

When on April the 8th, Dr Pinch returned from the Upper House to the Lower, with an account that no message would be received from them for want of the Prolocutor's presence, the Dean of Gloucester * in * Jane: some resentment took occasion to say, that since the Upper House denied this correspondence with them, it was now time for the House to return their thanks to Mr Atterbury, for his learned pains in asserting and vindicating the rights of Convocation. Upon which it was warmly debated, and the form of thanks being proposed to be changed, from learned pains in asserting and vindicating, into his endeavours to assert and vindicate, upon a division of the House, it was carried, as designed, in the affirmative. And then the Prolocutor said, Mr Archdeacon of Totness, I and this House (no Parliamentary phrase says the Author of the History) return you our thanks, &c. Upon which vote a letter was afterwards sent to Oxford, That whereas Mr Francis Atterbury, late of Christ Church, had so happily asserted the rights and privileges of an English Convocation, as to merit the solemn thanks of the Lower House of it, for his learned pains on that subject. — It might be hoped the University would not be less forward in taking some public notice of so great a piece of service to the Church. And that the most proper and seasonable mark of respect to him, would be to confer on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity by diploma, without doing exercise, or paying fees: Which was accordingly done.

(4) The Quietists or Molinists (from Molina the Jesuit) opposed the Doctrine of Grace as explained by St Austin, and were in that point, much the same as the Semi-pelagians; See Note p. 511.

first upon a few Jansenists (1), but afterwards turned to the Protestants, on whom it had been long very heavy and bloody; this put an end to all disputes in those matters, and a new controversy arose, which was managed with great heat, between Bossuet the famous Bishop, first of Condom and afterwards of Meaux, and La Motte Fenelon, who was in high favour with Madam Maintenon, and was by her means made Preceptor to the Dauphin's children, and advanced to the Archbishoprick of Cambray. Fenelon wrote a treatise of spiritual maxims, according to the subtilty to the Mystics. In this treatise, he distinguished between that, which was falsely charged upon them, and that which was truly their doctrine: He put the perfection of a spiritual life, in the loving of God purely for himself, without any regard to ourselves, even to our own salvation: And in our being brought to such a state of indifference, as to have no will nor desire of our own, but to be so perfectly united to the will of God, as to rejoice in the hope of heaven, only because it is the will of God, to bring us thither, without any regard to our own happiness. Bossuet wrote so sharply against him, that one is tempted to think, a rivalry for favour and preferment had as great a share in it, as zeal for the truth. The matter was sent to Rome, Fenelon had so many authorized and canonized writers of his side, that many distinctions must be made use of to separate them from him; but the King was much set against him; he put him from his attendance on the young Princess, and sent him to his Diocese; his disgrace served to raise his character. Madam Maintenon's violent aversion to a man, she so lately raised, was imputed to his not being so tractable as she expected, in persuading the King to own his marriage with her. But this is only conjecture.

At this time also a breach was running thro' the Lutheran Churches. It appeared at first openly at Hamburg, where many were going into stricter methods of piety, who from thence were called Pietists. There is no difference of opinion between them and the rest, who are most rigid to old forms, and are jealous of all new things, especially of a stricter course of devotion beyond what they themselves are inclined to practise. But to return to England.

A new Convocation called. 1701-2. Kennet.
* Burnet.

With the new Parliament the King summoned a new Convocation. Dr Sherlock preached a Latin sermon at the opening, and Dr Woodward (a Civilian grown popular by his opposition to his Diocesan *, to whom he owed his preferments) carried it for Prolocutor against Dr Beveridge, Archdeacon of Colchester. The first act of the two Houses was an address to the King, the 22d of January, on occasion of the French King's proclaiming the Pretender.

They expressed therein the deep resentment every one of them had, at their first hearing of the great indignity which the French King offered to his Majesty and his People, in declaring the pretended Prince of Wales to be King of his Majesty's Realms and Dominions. They renewed their protestations of a firm and unshaken allegiance: And assured his Majesty, they would do their utmost endeavours, in their respective places and stations, to maintain his rightful title, and the Succession in the Protestant line, as by law established, against the said pretended Prince, and all other his Majesty's open and secret enemies, &c. And the King gave them a gracious Answer.

The faction raised in the Lower House, during the last Convocation, had still the majority; several books were writ to show, that by our constitution the power of adjourning was wholly in the Archbishop. The original book of the Convocation, that late in 1661, being happily found, it showed the practice of that Convocation agreed with the Bishops in every particular (2). But though it was communicated to the Lower House, it had no effect upon them; for when parties are once formed, and a resolution is taken upon other considerations, no evidence can convince those, who have beforehand resolved to adhere to their point. Accordingly the dispute about the power of adjourning was revived, and on the 28th of January a Member of the Lower House moved to change the form of entry in the minutes, which being done, the Prolocutor, in his own name, continued and prorogued the House, instead of intimating, that it was continued and prorogued (3).

This was excepted against by several Members, on Feb. 3: But it was carried by a majority, that there should be no alteration, and that the matter should not then be further debated: And when the schedule of prorogation came down from the Upper House, it was laid aside, while the House was proceeding to other business. A Member moved, that the message delivered to the Prolocutor might be communicated to the House, which he thought they had a right to insist on; the majority opposed him, and they went on to appoint a Committee of grievances. And then the Prolocutor adjourned as by the authority of the House, and the dissenting Members protested by word of mouth; and before the next meeting put their verbal protestation into writing. On February 9, a motion was made, that that protestation might be admitted and entered as a standing evidence of their asserting the just rights and authority of the President. This was opposed by a majority. But Dr Beveridge proposed a question, Whether upon supposition that the House may sit upon Synodical business, after the coming down of the schedule, till they think their business over, the House would agree that the schedule should be then executed, and the House prorogued to the day and hour there specified, by virtue of the said schedule,

(1) The Jansenists (from Jansenius Bishop of Ypres, 1635) explained the Doctrine of Grace, according to the notions of St Austin, or the Catholic scheme.

(2) It must be observed, that the acts of the Convocations were recorded in the Archbishops registers, till the death of Archbishop Morton, in 1500. The last Convocation extant in the Archbishops registers, was held 1488; and, in the last of those whose acts are entire, except the Convocation of 1640, published in Nelson's Collections. After Morton's time, the acts of Convocations were recorded not in the great registers, but in distinct volumes: All which perished in the fire of 1666.

(3) Instead of the usual form, Prolocutor intimavit hanc Convocationem esse continuatam, &c. they entered in their minutes the phrase of, Dominus Prolocutor continuavit et prorogavit quoad hanc domum.

and in obedience to the authority whereby the whole Convocation was prorogued. To evade answering this question, it was at last agreed, That a Committee should be appointed to consider of such an expedient about the prorogation of the Lower House, as might tend to the composing of disputes: And eight were fixed on one side, viz. Dr Hooper, Dr Jane, Dr Aldrich, Dr Aterbury, Dr Binckes, Mr Needham, Mr Moor, and Dr Wynne: And eight on the other side, viz. Dr Beveridge, Dr Haley, Dr Willis, Dr Kennet, Dr Trimmel, Dr Prideaux, Dr Green, and Mr Lloyd. And this Committee meeting, Feb. 10, agreed, That no forms of prorogation should be used by the Prolocutor hereafter, that were not used before the last Convocation: That the forms used by the Prolocutor in the Convocations of 1586, and 1588, should hereafter be used by the Prolocutor in the order they lie in the books, beginning with the first till they are gone through: And that they should be pronounced by the Prolocutor, when the House agreed that their business was over. After this, some boasted of the advantage gained on the side of the Lower House, and that the Archbishop's friends had given up his cause, and excluded the schedule from any concern in the adjournment. This was so industriously spread, that the eight Members of the Committee drew up a declaration of their sense, in which they signified, among other things, that they refused an alteration that was offered on the third article of the agreement forementioned, viz. That the form should not be pronounced by the Prolocutor, till the House agreed that their business was over: This they refused, because, though they might generally presume upon the Archbishop's consent for their sitting to dispatch all proper business; yet they could not agree to any thing that should preclude his right to prorogue them immediately, if he found it expedient: And that they used the words pronounced by the Prolocutor, to prevent the putting any question to the House about adjourning themselves; and that the prorogation might be always to the time and place appointed by the schedule.

On Feb. 12, the Prolocutor being indisposed, appointed the Dean of Christ Church to act as his Deputy: And a Deputy so appointed, had been accepted, had application been duly made to the President to approve and confirm him. But no such application being made, the Archbishop sent for the Clergy, and prorogued the Convocation to the 14th, telling them, that an incident had happened of great moment, which he and his brethren must take time to consider of.

On February 13, Dr Woodward the Prolocutor died in his lodgings at Westminster, in very unhappy circumstances. The Archbishop on the 14th told the inferior Clergy he was much surprized at the news of it, and adjourned them to the 19th. The Prolocutor before his last sickness, had complained much of his Bishop, my Lord of Sarum, on account of his breach of privilege in his treatment of him. The case was thus: The Bishop visiting his Clergy, the Clergy paid their attendance: But the Dean of Sarum declined appearing as Rector of Pewsey, without making a reasonable excuse; nay, rather aggravated his absence with contempt. The Bishop ordered a citation in the usual method. When the time of privilege afterwards commenced, he ordered his Chancellor to put a stet upon the cause, and there was no farther proceeding. Upon this a formal complaint was, on February 9, presented to the Upper House, in which this was represented, not only as an unlawful molestation of a Member of the Lower House, but an injury offered to the whole body of the Convocation, in the person of the Prolocutor. The Archbishop and Bishops answered, that the proceedings referred to were begun when there was no privilege, and that upon the opening of the present Convocation, a stet was put upon the cause, nor was there any citation or process decreed since.

The prosecution of this complaint (which is Kennet said to have been carried on with great partiality and prejudice) ceasing upon the Prolocutor's death, and there being no business depending but the Clergy's pretensions of exemption from the Synodical authority of the Upper House, the Archbishop, on the 19th of February, dismissed the Clergy with a speech: In which, taking occasion from their complaint of the Bishop of Sarum, he tells them, "He hopes for the future, they would not be surprized into complaints, but would stay till they were assured they were well grounded both in Right and Fact." He adds, that the choice of a new Prolocutor would not now be so seasonable, for that many Members were absent, attending their respective Cures; and that a war was breaking out, which would turn men's thoughts another way: And that therefore he intended a prorogation. He tells them, their heats had given great offence, even to those that understand not the nature of the controversy, but were concerned that there should be any differences, among such as were, by profession, the Ministers of the Gospel of peace." The prorogation was to the 5th of March. After the Archbishop's speech, with which some were well satisfied, others discovered their great discontent. They met again in Henry VII's Chapel two days after, and resolving themselves into a sort of assembly, chose a Moderator or Chairman. And when the day came to which both Houses had been prorogued, they came up as a house, without a Prolocutor, to the Chamber adjoining to the Jerusalem Chamber, and there meeting the Bishop of Lincoln, who, as the Archbishop's Commissary had now prorogued the Convocation to a farther day, begged him to carry a message to the Archbishop, of their desire to proceed to the choice of a Prolocutor. The Bishop offered, in order to prevent mistakes, to receive their message in writing. Upon which they began to express themselves to this effect: It is the unanimous desire of the Lower House, &c. One present * immediately interposed, and said, that they were not a House, and that many Members did not assent to such a message; and therefore, at most, it could with truth run only in the name of several Members of the Lower House. This raised a new clamour; and those who assumed the name of a House, especially Dr Finch, fell severely on the Member, who thus openly dissented, as a betrayer of their rights and liberties.

The King's death, which happened a day or two after, should have put an end to these disputes, but instead of that, occasioned another question, Whether the Convocation did expire with that?

Whether the Convocation was dissolved by the King's death?

with the King? The Archbishop and Bishops were sensible, that the Convocation, being assembled by the Archbishop's mandate in obedience to the King's writ, could no longer subsist, than while the Royal writ remained in force, since in the late act for empowering the Parliament to sit after the King's death, no provision was made to continue the Convocation. But that part of the Lower House, who had assumed new claims, were taught (as hath been observed) to call themselves a Parliamentary body, and at least to attend upon a Parliament by virtue of the Præmunientes clause, which they had lately got executed in several Dioceses. And therefore they insisted, that they were such a part of the Parliament, as could not be separated from it; and consequently if they were no longer a provincial Synod, they were however a part of the national Clergy summoned by the Præmunientes clause to meet in Parliament. And, indeed, this had been a just inference from them. But when they came to consult the Learned in the law, they soon found, that the act for continuing the Parliament did by no means include the Convocation, which, being called by a different writ, had a different constitution, and must determine with the King's death. When they were under this disappointment, they solicited some friends in the House of Lords to bring in an extraordinary clause to declare the Convocation to be still in being. This was moved by the Earl of Rochester, but the Attorney-General declaring it was against the Queen's Ecclesiastical Supremacy, it was let fall, and they were forced to acquiesce in the dissolution.

Upon the Queen's Accession to the Crown, all these angry men, that had raised this flame in the Church, as they treated the memory of the late King with much indecent contempt, so they seemed very confident, that for the future, all preferments should be distributed among them (the Queen having superseded the Commission for Ecclesiastical preferments) and they thought they were full of merit, and were as full of hopes.

UPON the death of King William, the Crown, pursuant to the act of Succession, devolved to the Princess Anne of Denmark, daughter of King James II. by the Lady Anne Hyde (1.) This Princess was born at St. James's on the 6th of February 1664-5. She was sent to France in 1669, which much alarmed the people, on a surmise, that she was gone thither to be bred a Catholic; the bigotry and superstition of her Father, who had found means to pervert her Mother, being well known. But their fears ceased, when it was found she was sent there on account of her health only, she having at that time a defluxion in her eyes, which the change of air, and the methods there used, soon removed; and she returned to England much improved in her constitution and person.

(1) She was daughter of the Earl of Clarendon. The King, when Duke of York, was contracted to her at Breda, November 24, 1659, and privately married to her at Worcester-House, September 5, 1660, in N^o XXXV. Vol. III. 6 U the 1701-2. son. Dr. Henry Compton, Dean of the Chapel, and afterwards Bishop of London, had the care of her education.

The Duke of York, two years after the death of his first wife, married, in 1673, Mary of Este, the Duke of Modena's daughter, a rigid Papist (1), by which means, all hopes of a Protestant male-heir being lost, a greater value was raised in the people for the Princesses Mary and Anne, from the general expectation of having the Succession continued to them, whom, with joy, they saw educated in the Protestant Religion.

Upon the marriage of the Princess Mary to the Prince of Orange, her Father was very pressing with the King his brother, to leave him the disposal of his other daughter the Princess Anne; but the King thought it more advisable to hearken to the importunities of his Parliament, and marry her also to a Protestant Prince. In the year 1681, the Prince of Hanover (afterwards King George I. of England) came over to make his addresses to her: But he was scarce got hither, when he received orders from his Father not to proceed in that design; for he had agreed a match for him with his brother the Duke of Zell's daughter, which, at that time, was more advantageous to the family. Two years after

Prince George of Denmark, second son of Frederick III. and younger brother of Christian V. Kings of Denmark, came into England, in order to marry the Princess Anne. Accordingly, eleven days after his arrival, they were solemnly married by the Bishop of London, in the Chapel-Royal at St. James's, on the 28th of July 1683. This marriage, at first, did by no means please the Nation: For it was known that the proposition came from France, and therefore it was apprehended, that the English and French Courts reckoned, they were sure he would change his Religion. But these apprehensions were, by experience, found to be entirely groundless. He had now lived, in all respects, the happiest with his Princess that was possible, except in one point. For, though there was a child born almost every year for many years, yet they all died: So that the most fruitful marriage of the age was fatally blasted as to the effect of it (2.)

Upon the Princess's marriage, the Lady Churchill (afterwards Duchess of Marlborough) of the Duchesse of Marl. was, at the Princess's earnest request to her Father, made one of the Ladies of her bed-chamber, and was at length distinguished by so high a place in her favour, as perhaps no person ever arrived at a higher with Queen or Princess. She had an ascendancy over the Princess in every thing:

Prince George of Denmark comes into England, July 19, 1683, and marries the Princess Anne, July 28.

the night by Dr. Joseph Croucher the Duke's Chaplain. Her father solemnly protested, that he knew nothing of the matter, till it broke out in 1662. The Duke thought to have shaken her from claiming her marriage by great promises and as great threatnings. But she, being a woman of a high spirit, said, she was his wife, and would have it known that she was so, let him use her afterwards as he pleased. King Charles II. ordered some Bishops and Judges to peruse the proofs she had to produce, and they reporting the marriage was good, the King, not being then willing to break with the Earl of Clarendon, told his brother he must live with her whom he had made his wife. The Duchess of York was a very extraordinary woman. She had great knowledge and a lively sense of things. She soon understood what belonged to a Princess, and took state on her rather too much. She writ well, and had begun the Duke's Life, of which she shewed Dr. Burnet a Volume. It was all drawn from the Duke's journal; and he intended to have employed Burnet in carrying it on. She was bred to great strictness in Religion, and practised secret confession. Morley was her Confessor. She began at twelve years old, and continued under his direction, till, upon her Father's disgrace, he was put from the Court. She was generous and friendly, but was too severe an enemy. It was supposed she had been prevailed upon to change her Religion, for a paper was published by Maimburg after her death, giving an account of the grounds of her conversion, which paper the Duke of York shewed Burnet all writ with her own hand, but would not let him copy it, though he gave him leave to read it twice. After a long decay of health she died in 1672, very little beloved or lamented. Her haughtiness had raised her many enemies, and her friends, because of the change of her Religion, reckoned her death rather a blessing than a loss at that time. She bore the Duke of York four sons and four daughters, Charles of York, Duke of Cambridge, born the 22d of October, 1660, who died at seven months old; James of York, called also Duke of Cambridge, born the 12th of July 1663, who died in 1667; Charles of York, Duke of Kendal, third son, born the 4th of July, 1666, and who died in May, 1667; Edgar of York, Duke of Cambridge, the fourth son, was born the 14th of September, 1667, and died the 8th of June, 1672. The four daughters were, 1. MARY of York, born the 30th of April, 1662, a Princess of great beauty and eminent virtue, who was married to William Henry of Nassau, Prince of Orange, afterwards King William III. and died on the 28th of December, 1694. 2. ANNE of York, second daughter, born at St. James's on the 6th of February, 1664-5. Henrietta of York, third daughter, born at Whitehall the 13th of January, 1668, and deceased at ten months old; and Katherine of York, fourth daughter, who was born the 9th of February, 1670, and died the 5th of December, 1671.

(1) The new Duchess of York was brought over by the Earl of Peterborough (who had married her by proxy) in the winter of 1673. She was then very young, about sixteen, but of a full growth. She was a graceful person, with a good share of beauty, and so much wit and cunning, that, during all King's Charles's reign, she behaved herself in so obliging a manner, and seemed so innocent and good, that she gained upon all that came near her, and possessed them with such impressions of her, that it was long before her behaviour, after she was Queen, could make them change their thoughts of her. So artificially did this young Italian carry herself, that she deceived even the eldest and most jealous persons, both in the Court and the Country. Only sometimes a satirical temper broke out too much, which was imputed to youth and wit not enough practised to the world. She avoided the appearances of a zealot, or a meddler in business, and gave herself up to innocent cheerfulness, and was universally esteemed and loved as long as she was Duchess. Burnet I. 368.

(2) Their children, besides several miscarriages, were as follow:

The first was a daughter, of whom her Royal Highness was delivered on the 12th of May, 1684; and, being dead, was privately interred. II. Lady Mary, second daughter, born at Whitehall the 2d of June, 1685, who died in February, 1686. III. Lady Anne Sophia, third daughter, born at Windsor the 12th of May, 1686, died the February following. IV. WILLIAM, first son, born at the Royal Palace at Hampton-Court the 24th of July, 1689, was, at his baptism, declared by King William Duke of Gloucester, who died July 24, 1700. V. The Lady Mary, a fourth daughter, was born at St. James's in the month of October, 1690, but died soon after she was baptized. VI. George, another son, was born at St. James's, the 17th day of April, 1692, but died as soon as born.

(1) Sarah

1701-2. thing: She was a woman of little knowledge, but of a clear apprehension, and a true judgment; a warm and hearty friend, violent and sudden in her resolutions, and impetuous in her way of speaking. She was thought proud and insolent on her favour, though she used none of the common arts of a Court to maintain it: For she did not beset the Princess, nor flatter her. She staid much at home, and looked carefully after the education of her children. The beginning of the Princess's kindness for her had a much earlier date than her entrance into her service. They had used to be together, when children, and the Princess even then express'd a particular fondness for her. This inclination increased with their years; and the Princess always distinguished her by the pleasure she took in her conversation and confidence. Hence it was, that, upon her marriage, she was so desirous to have her near her person (1).

After her father King James's Accession to the Throne, the Princess, during his whole reign, kept her Court as private as she could, consistent with her station. When the King's designs were discovered, and Popish councils began to prevail, attempts were made to draw the Princess into them. The King indeed used no harshness with her; he only discovered his wishes, by putting into her hands some books and papers, which he hoped might induce her to a change of Religion (2). Lord Tyrconnel also took some pains with his sister-in-law, the Lady Churchill,

to

(1) Sarah Jennings, daughter and coheirs (with her sister the Countess of Tyrconnel) of Richard Jennings, of Sandridge in Hertfordshire, Esq; by his wife Frances, daughter and heiress of Sir Gifford Thornbury, of Agnes Court in Kent, Baronet, was born on the 29th of May, 1660, the day of King Charles's Restoration, and in 1681 married to John Churchill (then a Colonel of Dragoons, and afterwards Duke of Marlborough). She was at that time in great favour with the Princess Anne, of which she herself gives the following account:

The beginning of the Princess's kindness for me had a much earlier date than my entrance into her service. My promotion to this honour was wholly owing to impressions she had before received to my advantage; we had used to play together, when she was a child, and she even then expressed a particular fondness for me. This inclination increased with our years. I was often at Court, and the Princess always distinguished me by the pleasure she took to honour me, preferably to others, with her conversation and confidence. In all her parties for amusement, I was sure, by her choice, to be one; and so desirous she became of having me always near her, that, upon her marriage with the Prince of Denmark in 1683, it was, at her own earnest request to her Father, I was made one of the Ladies of her bed-chamber.

What conduced to render me the more agreeable to her in this station was, doubtless, the dislike she had conceived to most of the other persons about her, and particularly to her first Lady of the bed-chamber, the Countess of Clarendon; a Lady, whose discourse and manner (though the Princess thought they agreed very well together) could not possibly recommend her to so young a Mistress: for she looked like a mad-woman, and talked like a scholar. Indeed her Highness's Court was throughout so oddly composed, that I think it would be making myself no great compliment, if I should say, her chusing to spend more of her time with me, than with any of her other servants, did no discredit to her taste. Be that as it will, it is certain she at length distinguished me by so high a place in her favour, as perhaps no person ever arrived at a higher with Queen or Princess. And, if from hence I may draw any glory, it is, that I both obtained and held this place without the assistance of flattery; a charm, which in truth her inclination for me, together with my unwearied application to serve and amuse her, rendered needless; but which, had it been otherwise, my temper and turn of mind would never have suffered me to employ.

Young as I was, when I first became this high favourite, I laid it down for a maxim, that flattery was falsehood to my trust, and ingratitude to my greatest friend; and that I did not deserve so much favour, if I could not venture the loss of it by speaking the truth, and by preferring the real interest of my Mistress before the pleasing her fancy, or the sacrificing to her passion. From this rule I never swerved. And, though my temper and my notions in most things were widely different from those of the Princess, yet, during a long course of years, she was so far from being displeased with me for openly speaking my sentiments, that she sometimes protested a desire, and even added her command, that it should be always continued, promising never to be offended at it, but to love me the better for my frankness.

Favour with a Princess upon these terms engaged me to her in the manner that it ought; I mean, by a sentiment which I chuse to call Honour, rather than Gratitude or Duty, because, while it implies all the justice and affection of these, it seems to express a more disinterested principle of action. For I can truly affirm, that I never considered myself on any occasion where her interest or glory was concerned, nor had I any Idea of a misery which I would not have sooner incurred, than the inward shame of being conscious of a failure in this respect. The facts themselves, which I am going to relate, will in a great degree evince the truth of what I say; and that the Princess was perfectly persuaded of it, is, I think, sufficiently manifest both from her letters to me, and from that unreserved intimacy of friendship, in which we for many years lived together.

Kings and Princes, for the most part, imagine they have a dignity peculiar to their birth and station, which ought to raise them above all connexion of friendship with an inferior. Their passion is to be admired and feared, to have subjects awfully obedient, and servants blindly obsequious to their pleasure. Friendship is an offensive word, it imports a kind of equality between the parties; it suggests nothing to the minds of Crowns or Thrones, high titles or immense revenues, fountains of honour or fountains of riches; prerogatives which the possessors would have always uppermost in the thoughts of those who are permitted to approach them.

The Princess had a different taste. A friend was what she most coveted; and for the sake of friendship (a relation which she did not disdain to have with me) she was fond even of that Equality which she thought belonged to it. She grew uneasy to be treated by me with the form and ceremony due to her rank; nor could she bear from me the sound of words which implied in them distance and superiority. It was this turn of mind, which made her one day propose to me, that, whenever I should happen to be absent from her, we might in all our letters write ourselves by feigned names, such as would import nothing of distinction of rank between us. Morley and Freeman were the names her fancy hit upon; and she left me to chuse by which of them I would be called. My frank open temper naturally led me to pitch upon Freeman, and so the Princess took the other; and from this time Mrs. Morley and Mrs. Freeman began to converse as equals, made so by affection and friendship. Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough, p. 9, &c.

(2) The Duchess of Marlborough observes here, that, had the Princess had any inclination to change her Religion, the Chaplains about her were such Divines as could have said but little in defence of their own Religion, or to secure her against the pretences of Popery, recommended to her by a Father and a King. Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough, p. 15.

(1) His

1701-2. to engage her, if possible, to make use, for the same end, of that great favour he knew she enjoyed with the Princess; but all these endeavours proved fruitless, and the Prince and Princess of Denmark remained firm to their Religion.

Though the Queen, after she had declared herself with child, declined giving the Princess of Denmark any satisfaction in that matter, yet it does not appear that she thought it an imposture; nor did she, in her letter to the Queen, when she left the Court, give the least hint of such a suspicion. Upon the landing of the Prince of Orange, in 1688, the King went down to Salisbury to his army, and the Princess of Denmark with him: But the news quickly came from thence, that the Prince of Denmark had deserted the King and joined the Prince of Orange, and that the King was returning to London.

Conduct of the Duchess of Marib.

The Princess was so struck with the apprehensions of the King's displeasure, that she told the Lady Churchill, she could not bear the thoughts of it, and declared, rather than see her Father, she would jump out at the window. The Bishop of London (who, in that critical time, absconded,) was then lodged secretly in Suffolk-Street. The Princess immediately sent the Lady Churchill, (who knew where he was) to concert measures with the Bishop, how she should withdraw from the Court. It was agreed, that he should come about midnight in a hackney-coach near the Cockpit, in order to convey the Princess to some place where she might be private and safe.

The Princess went to bed at the usual time to prevent suspicion. Lady Churchill came to her soon after; and, with her and Lady Fitzharding, and one servant, the Princess, by the back-stairs which went down from her closet, walked to the coach, where they found the Bishop and the Earl of Dorset. They conducted them that night to the Bishop's house in the City, and the next day to the Lord Dorset's at Cockpit-Hall, from whence they went to Nottingham, where the Country gathered about the Princess, and forming themselves into a little army, chose to be commanded by the Bishop of London, which he too easily accepted; but the Princess did not think herself safe, till she was surrounded by the Prince of Orange's friends.

Quickly after this the King fled into France, and, the Throne being declared vacant, was presently filled with the Prince and Princess of Orange. The Parliament thought proper to settle the Crown on King William for life, and 1701-2. the Princess of Denmark gave her consent to it. The Lady Churchill at first took a great deal of pains (which she believed the King and Queen never forgot) to persuade her against it; but, finding that all the principal men, except the Jacobites, were for King William, and Dr. Tillotson (whom she consulted) having convinced her of the expediency of the settlement proposed, she advised the Princess to acquiesce in it, and carried Dr. Tillotson to her to second her advice. Upon what the Doctor said to her, the Princess took care that no disturbance should be made by her pretended friends the Jacobites, who had pressed her earnestly to form an opposition.

Not long after the advancement of King William to the Throne, the misunderstanding between not only the King, but also the Queen and the Princess of Denmark, broke out, of which a large account has been given. Though, after Queen Mary's death, there was (as has been said) a reconciliation, yet it went not much farther than what civility and decency required; and such a coldness had continued between the King and the Princess, that she was not made acquainted with public affairs, or encouraged to recommend any to posts of trust and advantage: Neither had the Ministry orders to inform her how matters went, or to oblige those about her. Only the Earl of Marlborough, after some years of disgrace, had been taken again into favour; and nothing had contented him better, than the command he had the former year of the troops which were sent to the assistance of the States. As he afterwards became the greatest General of the age, it will be proper to give a brief account of his rise and character.

John Churchill, Earl (afterwards Duke) of Marlborough, was second son of Sir Winston Churchill of Wotton Bassett in Wiltshire, by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Drake of Althe in the parish of Musbury in Devonshire (1). He was born at Althe the 24 of June, 1650. He was brought young to Court, and made a Page of honour to the Duke of York, who, upon his discovering a martial inclination, procured him, at the age of sixteen, an Ensign's Commission in the Guards. He went first to Tangier, and afterwards to France with the six thousand English forces sent to the assistance of the French King, under the command of the Duke of Monmouth, who gave him a Captain's Commission in his own regiment. He distinguished himself

(1) His original is traced up to Roger de Courcill, a younger branch of the illustrious house of Leon in France, who attending William the Conqueror into England, received as a reward for his services a considerable estate in land; was grand-father to Sir Bartholomew de Courcill, by corruption called Curricell, and so Churchill, who held the castle of Bristol for King Stephen; and whose descendant, Otho de Churchill, was the founder of a spreading family in Devonshire, Somersetshire, and Wiltshire. Of this last county, and of the town of Wotton Bassett, was Winston Churchill, Esq; who, having had a liberal education at St. John's College, Oxon, asserted, and suffered for the cause of King Charles I. but upon the Restoration was chosen Member of Parliament for Weymouth, admitted fellow of the Royal Society, soon after knighted, and appointed Commissioner of the claims in Ireland, where he began to retrieve his broken fortune; and afterwards, by the favour of the Duke of York, made one of the Clerks Comptrollers of the Green-cloth to the King. By his wife Elizabeth Sir Winston had seven sons and four daughters. I. Winston, who died young. II. John, late Duke of Marlborough. III. George, born at Althe February 20, 1653. He was bred to the sea-service, and was above twenty years Gentleman of the bed-chamber to Prince George of Denmark. He was Member for St. Albans in every Parliament from 1685 to his death in 1710, except the last when he served for Plymouth. He commanded a squadron in 1689, and behaved with great bravery in the battle of La Hogue in 1692, being then Commander of the St. Andrew, a second rate. He was made one of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty in 1699, where he continued till 1702, when the Earl of Pembroke was made High-Admiral. Queen Anne made him Admiral of the Blue, and one of the Council to Prince George, as Lord

John Duke of Marlborough

1701-2. himself in Alsatia under the Marshals de Turenne and de Lorge, and particularly at the siege of Maebricht the next year in the fight of the French Monarch, who did him the honour to thank him for his services, at the head of his army, with an assurance of his recommendation to the King of Great-Britain. Upon his return to England, the fame of his bravery, and his sister's favour, raised him to be a Lieutenant-Colonel, Gentleman of the Bed-chamber, and Master of the Robes to the Duke of York, whom he attended in his banishment to the Netherlands, and in his retreats to Scotland. In 1681, he married Mrs. Sarah Jennings, then in great favour with the Princess Anne, the Duke of York's second daughter, of whom an account has been given. Upon the Duke's return from Scotland, Colonel Churchill was created Baron Churchill of Aymouth in Scotland, the 21st of December, 1682, and Captain of the third troop of Guards. When the Duke of York came to the Crown, the Lord Churchill was made Lieutenant-General, and one of the Gentlemen of the Bed-chamber, and sent Ambassador to France, to notify that Prince's Accession to the Throne. On the 14th of May 1685, he was created a Peer of England, by the title of Baron Churchill, of Sandridge in Hertfordshire. Upon the insurrection in the West, in favour of the Duke of Monmouth, he commanded the first forces that were sent against him, and, by his conduct, greatly contributed to the victory at Sedgemoor. But, afterwards finding King James intirely bent upon introducing Popery and arbitrary Power, he thought himself freed from any ties of former obligations, and joined with the other Lords to invite the Prince of Orange to come over to their assistance. Upon his leaving King James, he was declared Lieutenant-General by the Prince of Orange, who, as soon as he ascended the Throne, made him Gentleman of his Bed-chamber, and, on the 9th of April, 1689, created him Earl of Marlborough. The new Earl commanded the English forces that served the same year in Flanders under Prince Waldeck, and, in 1690, he reduced the towns of Cork and Kingsale with incredible expedition. The next year he made the campaign under

King William in Flanders; but (as hath been largely related) he was soon after suddenly removed from all his employments, nor was he restored to favour till the year 1698, when he was appointed Governor to the Duke of Gloucester, and served as one of the Lords Justices three several times during the absence of the King, by whom he was at last declared Commander in chief of the English forces in Holland, and Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary for the negotiations at the Hague, in which employments he was continued by Queen Anne.

He was a man of a noble and graceful appearance, bred up in the Court with no literature; but he had a solid and clear understanding, with a constant presence of mind. He knew the arts of living in a Court beyond any man in it. He caressed all people with a soft and obliging deportment, and was always ready to do good offices. He had no fortune to set out with, which put him upon all the methods of acquiring one. And that went so far into him, that he did not shake it off, when he was in a much higher elevation: Nor were his expences suited enough to his posts. But, when allowances are made for that, it must be acknowledged, that he was one of the greatest men the age has produced. He was in high favour with King James, and therefore he has been severely censured, as guilty both of ingratitude and treachery to a very kind and liberal Master (1.) But it may be remembered in his behalf, that he never discovered any of that King's secrets, nor did he ever push him on to any violent proceedings; so that he was in no contrivance to ruin or betray him. On the contrary, whenever he spoke to him about his affairs, which was but seldom, because he could not fall in with his notions, he always suggested moderate counsels. The Earl of Galway told Bishop Burnet, that, when he came over to Holland with the first compliments upon King James's Accession to the Crown, he said then to him, that, if King James was ever prevailed with to alter our Religion, he would serve him no longer, but withdraw from him. So early was this resolution fixed in him. And therefore, when he afterwards saw how King James was determined,

He had a great share in the battle of Blenheim; after which he was Governor of Brussels, Colonel of the Coldstream regiment of Guards, and Governor of Guernsey. The other daughter was a Nun. Arabella's three sisters, Dorothy, Mary, and Barbara, died in their infancy. Arabella was married afterwards to Colonel Charles Godfrey, and by him had two daughters; Charlotte, wife of Hugh Boscawen, Lord Viscount Falmouth; and Elizabeth, wife of Edward Dunch, Esq.

(1) It is said, that, when afterwards a scheme was forming by King James's friends in England for his Restoration, and a list was offered to him of those that were to be pardoned, the King, upon seeing Lord Churchill's name in the list, declared he would never forgive him, and, in being pressed upon that head, insisted that he would not pardon him, unless he merited it by some signal service. Such was King James's resentment for his being deserted by a person, whom he thought so much obliged to him for the many favours he had heaped upon him.

1701-2. he could not be contented to see all ruined by him. He was also very doubtful as to the pretended Birth. For these reasons he resolved, when the Prince of Orange came over, to leave King James, but to betray no post, nor do any thing more than the withdrawing himself with such officers, as he could trust with such a secret. This he did with great regret, at a time when it was evidently with hazard to himself, it not being then possible to foresee that King James would so shamefully desert the Kingdom; and when he might have been all that an ambitious man could have hoped for, by assisting that King to settle Popery in England (1).

Queen Anne pre-judiced against the Whigs, and in favour of the Tories. Con. of the Duch. of Marl.

The Princess of Denmark was in this situation above described, when King William's death put an end to it, and placed her on the Throne. She was entered on the thirty-eighth year of her age, and from her infancy had imbibed strong prejudices against the Whigs. She had been taught to look upon them all, not only as Republicans, but as enemies to the Church of England. This aversion to the whole party had been confirmed by the usage she had met with from her sister and King William, which was now to be all charged to the account of the Whigs. And Prince George, who had also been ill treated (as he thought) in the late reign, threw into the scale his resentment. On the other hand, the Tories had the advantage, not only of the Queen's early prepossession in their favour, but of their having assisted her in the affair of her revenue. It was indeed evident, that they had done this, more in opposition to the King, than from any real respect to her. But still they had served her; and, the winter before the King died, they had, in prospect of his death, paid her more than usual attendance. Hence it is, that, as soon as she was seated in the Throne, the Tories (whom she usually called by the agreeable name of the Church-party) became the distinguished objects of her favour, as will presently be seen.

Upon the King's death, the Privy-Council came in a body to wait on the new Queen. She received them with a well-considered speech, expressed in these terms:

My Lords,

I Am extremely sensible of the general misfortune to these Kingdoms, in the unspeakable loss of the King, and the great weight and burden it brings in particular on myself; which nothing could encourage me to undergo, but the great concern I have for the preservation of our Religion, and laws and liberties of my country. All these being as dear to me, as they can be to any person whatsoever, you may depend upon it, that no pains nor diligence shall ever be wanting on my part, to preserve and support them; to maintain the Succession in the Protestant line, and the Government in Church and State as it is by law established. I think it proper, upon this occasion of my first speaking to you, to declare my own opinion of the importance of carrying on all the preparations we are making to oppose the great power of France; and I shall lose no time in giving our Allies all assurances, that nothing shall be wanting on my part, to pursue the true interest of England, together with theirs, for the support of the common cause. In order to these ends, I shall always be ready to ask the advice of my Council, and of both Houses of Parliament, and desirous to countenance and employ all those, who shall heartily concur and join with me, in supporting and maintaining the present Establishment and

(1) A late Historian, in his History of Queen Anne, gives him the following character: The Earl of Marlborough was, by nature, designed for a Favourite; by fortune and personal merit raised to be a GENERAL; and, by his own observation, and long experience of Court-Intrigues, made a Statesman: His person was lofty and well made; his features manly, yet beautiful; his look gracious and open; his mien great; his parts quick; his memory faithful and exact; his penetration deep; his judgment solid; his courage undaunted: He was consummate in all the acts of a Courtier, supple, affable, sedate; reserved, both with friends and enemies; sober, averse to luxury; and though, in a voluptuous Court, he indulged himself in some liberties of life, yet he still preserved a good reputation with all men. He was ambitious, but free from haughtiness and ostentation. His ascent was so gradual, and so long foreseen, that it appeared rather a growth than a flight; and therefore was the less envied, as it seemed the more merited. As a Soldier, he ever was a man of nice honour, punctual, vigilant, indefatigable: Before he was advanced to the degree of a General, he had a courage of the most keen temper, not without some appetite of danger; and in the most perilous encounters he had about him an extraordinary cheerfulness. When raised to the command of an army, he exposed his person, as far as necessity required, with the same unconcernment as he did before: And, in a day of battle, gave his orders with all the clearness and composedness imaginable; leading on his troops without the least hurry or perturbation, and rallying those that were disordered without sharp or fowre reproofs, which rather damp than animate the soldier's courage. He was an excellent discernor and pursuer of advantage upon his enemy; but preserved humanity even amidst the horrors of the field, endeavouring to restrain the slaughter which usually attends victory, in which he took no greater delight, than to spare the lives of the conquered. He was a strict observer of his word and promise; and he gained the affections of the soldiers by his good-nature, and of the officers by his affability. As a Statesman, he managed variety of business, either single, or in concert with the Prime Minister, with great dexterity, ease, and sufficiency. In Council he never was supercilious or assuming, but could bear contradiction without passion, and by cool argumentation bring others over to his own opinion. No man had ever fewer idle words; and, though he was not master of oratory, yet in debates of importance he always expressed himself very pertinently; and, by his temper and reservedness in discourse, he still maintained his reputation of a wise man. He had a particular talent of insinuating himself, and gaining upon the minds of those he dealt with; so that no General ever commanded troops of different nations with more ease, nor was any politician more successful in the most weighty and arduous negotiations; which will appear the more surprizing, because Liberality was not the brightest virtue that entered the composition of this excellent character. To sum it up, King William said of this Great Man, that he had the COOLEST HEAD and the WARMEST HEART he ever knew; which, from so good a judge, might seem the greatest eulogy: Were it not, that, in another respect, what was most true of the Earl of Marlborough, could not be said of any other General, either ancient or modern, That he never fate before a town, which he did not take; nor ever fought a battle, which he did not win.

Queen's speech to the Privy-Council. Pr. H. C. 111. 197.

1701-2. " Constitution against all enemies and opposers
" whatsoever."

The Queen pronounced this, as she did all her other speeches, with great weight and authority, and with a softness of voice, and sweetness in the pronunciation, that added much life to all she spoke; and these, her first expressions, were heard with great and just acknowledgements. After this declaration, she caused all the Lords, and others of the late King's Privy-Council, to take the oaths to her in the same quality, and ordered a Proclamation to be published immediately, signifying her pleasure, that all persons being in office of Authority or Government, at the decease of the late King, should so continue till further directions.

As, by the act made five years before, the Parliament, notwithstanding the King's death, was now continued to sit; both Houses met the same day, and unanimously voted to address the Queen to condole with her on this sad occasion, and to congratulate her happy Accession to the Throne. Then the Lords in a conference acquainted the Commons, that orders were given for proclaiming her Majesty that afternoon; which was accordingly done with the usual solemnity, and the loud acclamations of the People: Though it is remarkable, that this day afforded a visible mixture of sorrow and joy; many being apprehensive, that the death of King William, at so critical a juncture, might be attended with consequences fatal to Europe in general, and to the Protestant Succession of these Kingdoms in particular.

The next day, pursuant to their vote, the Lords in a body attended the Queen with an address, " most heartily congratulating her Majesty's Accession to the Throne, assuring her of their zealous and firm resolution to support her undoubted right and title, and the Succession of the Protestant line, against all her enemies whatsoever; being sensible their great loss was no otherwise to be repaired to themselves and their confederates, but by a most sincere and vigorous adherence to her Majesty and her Allies, in the prosecution of those measures, already entered into, to reduce the exorbitant power of France: And humbly desiring, that, for the encouragement of her Majesty's Allies, no time might be lost in communicating to them her Majesty's resolutions of adhering firmly to the alliances already made, which they should never be wanting, to the utmost of their power, to enable her Majesty to maintain." The Queen told them, " she received these assurances with great satisfaction, and that her endeavours should always be sincere to promote the true interest of England, and to support their common cause."

The same day in the evening the Commons, with their Speaker, attended her Majesty with an address to the same purpose: " They unanimously assured her, that they would to the utmost assist and support her Majesty on that Throne, where God had placed her, against the pretended Prince of Wales and all her enemies. And since nothing could conduce more to the honour and safety of her Majesty and her Kingdoms, than maintaining inviolably such alliances as had been, or should be made, for preserving the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France; they assured her, that they were firmly resolved to enable her to prosecute that glorious design. And, that all her subjects might rest in a full assurance of happiness under her Majesty's reign, they would maintain the Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, according to the limitations in the several acts of settlement, and effectually provide for and make good the public credit of the Nation." The Queen returned them " her hearty thanks for the kind assurances they gave her, which could not be more agreeably confirmed to her, than by their giving dispatch in all their preparations for the public service, and the support of the Allies." And this good harmony between the Queen and her Parliament, together with the resolution of the Commons about public credit, immediately raised the National funds above their former value, which upon King William's death had fallen above fifteen per Cent. The Queen not only answered the addresses of both Houses in this favourable manner, but moreover she received all that came to her so graciously, that they went from her highly satisfied with her goodness and her obliging deportment; for she hearkened with attention to every thing that was said to her.

Two days after the Queen went to the House of Peers with the usual solemnity, and addressed herself to both Houses in the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I cannot too much lament my own unhappiness in succeeding so immediately after the loss of a King, who was the great support, not only of these Kingdoms, but of all Europe. And I am extremely sensible of the weight and difficulty it brings upon me.
" But the true concern I have for our Religion, for the laws and liberties of England, for the maintaining the Succession to the Crown in the Protestant line, and the Government in Church and State, as by law established, encourages me in this great undertaking, which I promise myself will be successful, by the blessing of God, and the continuance of that fidelity and affection, of which you have given me so full assurance.
" The present conjuncture of affairs requires the greatest application and dispatch; and I am very glad to find in your several addresses so unanimous a concurrence in the same opinion with me, that too much cannot be done for the encouragement of our Allies, to reduce the exorbitant power of France.
" I cannot but think it very necessary upon this occasion to desire you to consider of proper methods towards obtaining of an Union between England and Scotland, which has been so lately recommended to you, as a matter, that very nearly concerns the peace and security of both Kingdoms.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

" I need not put you in mind, that the revenue for defraying the expences of the Civil Government is expired.
" I rely intirely upon your affections for the supplying it in such a manner, as shall be most suitable for the honour and dignity of the Crown.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It shall be my constant endeavour to make you the best return for that duty and affection you have expressed to me, by a careful and diligent Administration for the good of all my subjects. And, as I know my own heart to be intirely English, I can very sincerely assure you, there is not any thing you can expect or desire from me, which I shall not be ready to do, for the happiness and prosperity of England; and you shall always find me a strict and religious observer of my word."

Remarks
on the speech.
Burnet.

There were two passages in this speech, which were thought not so well considered; particularly that expression, that her heart was intirely English, which was looked on as a reflection on the late King, and occasioned much discourse, and not a little discontent. The other passage was, that they should always find her a strict and religious observer of her word, there having been an expression of the same kind in her Father's first speech, how little soever it was afterwards remembered by him.

The Lord's
address of thanks
M. Burnet.

The Commons, the next day, returned their thanks for the Queen's speech, by such Members of their House, as were of the Privy-Council; and, the day following, the Lords attended her with an address, importing, "That they could not sufficiently express the great satisfaction they received from her most gracious speech, trusting in God it would have the same effect at home as abroad, equally reviving the hearts of her Allies and Subjects; uniting all people, and encouraging their utmost endeavours in the common cause. That the sincere concern her Majesty had shewed for our Religion, the Government in Church and State, and the Succession to the Crown in the Protestant line; the hazards she had exposed herself to, in concert with his late glorious Majesty, for maintaining our laws and liberties, as well as her most gracious assurances at this time, gave her subjects such a confidence in her promises, such a dutiful affection to her person, such a zeal for her service, as would oblige them to make the utmost efforts to support her Majesty under the weight and difficulties of the present conjuncture. The concern, added their Lordships, your Majesty expresses for your Allies, is a farther obligation laid upon us, who are sensible their preservation is necessary to our own, and who are as desirous as ever to support the character of the Crown of England, in enabling your Majesty to maintain the balance of Europe. We cannot make suitable returns to your Majesty for your most gracious promises of a careful and diligent Administration for the public good, which we think ourselves sufficiently secured of by so solemn an engagement under your sacred word. Your Majesty hath been pleased to assure us of all we could wish, and recommend to us what we ought to desire. And we doubt not your pious intentions will procure a blessing from Heaven. And your Majesty may be assured, that resolutions, so becoming a Queen of England, cannot but make the deepest impression upon all hearts, that are true to the interest of their country." To this the Queen was pleased to answer, "That it was a great satisfaction to her to find, that what she had said had their Lordships concurrence and approbation; and she was willing to repeat to them, that she should always hold very exactly to the assurances she had given them."

The address of condolence and congratulation of the Bishops and Clergy of London having the same day been presented to the Queen by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London being indisposed, her Majesty made answer, Burnet. Boyer.

"That she was very well pleased with the marks of their good-will, and they might be sure she should always have a particular care of the Church." The Dissenters in and about London presented also an address, which was the more remarkable, because all the Non-conformists (except the Quakers) joined in it. The Queen, in her answer, "assured them of her protection, and that she should do nothing to forfeit her interest in their affections." Which words were afterwards remembered, when the Royal assent was given to the Schism and Occasional bills. The city of London, and all the counties, cities, and even the subaltern bodies of cities, came up with addresses. In these, a very great diversity of stile was observed; some mentioned the late King in terms full of respect and gratitude; others named him very coldly; some took no notice of him, nor of his death, and simply congratulated her Accession to the Crown; and some insinuated reflections on his memory, as if the Queen had been ill used by him. Her Majesty received all civilly; to most she said nothing, to others she expressed herself in general words, and some things were given out in her name, which she disowned.

The confection at the Hague for King William's death was exceeding great. Upon the first news of it, the States-General and those of Holland assembled immediately: They looked upon one another as men amazed: They embraced each other, and promised to hold together, and adhere to the interests of their Country: They sat up most part of the night, and sent out all orders that were necessary, upon so extraordinary an emergency, and dispatched letters to the Provinces and to the Cities of Holland, to acquaint them with the news, and to exhort to union, and a perseverance in the alliances and concerted designs. The Imperial, Prussian, and Danish Ministers sent also expresses to their respective Courts on this occasion, and went all to the English Envoy's. Count Goez encouraged them, by assuring them, this accident would not cause the least alteration in the resolutions of the Emperor, and that he had just received the important news from Vienna, that the King of the Romans would in person make the campaign on the Rhine. As the express from England had brought the Queen's speech to her Privy-Council, it was agreed by these Ministers, that it should be translated into French and Dutch, in order to revive the drooping spirits of the people, which had a very good effect. The next day, the States-General met early in the morning, and again in the evening. The States of Holland being likewise assembled, Pensionary Fagel made them a moving, but without an encouraging speech. He imparted to them a letter he had received from the Earl of Marlborough in the Queen's name, with very express assurances of union, assistance, and vigour. Upon this,

1701-2. this, the States of Holland went in a body to the Assembly of the States-General, where, having condoled their irreparable loss, they represented, "That, in this dangerous conjuncture, nothing could prove more effectual for their preservation, than a perfect unity, mutual confidence, and a vigorous resolution for the defence of their Country, and by adhering firmly to those measures already entered into, and such as should be judged farther expedient for the good of the common cause; declaring withal, that they were ready to perform their part, and rather to sacrifice all their blood and treasure, than to see their State, their Liberty, and their Religion destroyed." This representation was highly applauded by the States-General, who returned thanks to the States of Holland for their zealous resolutions in that perilous conjuncture; and assured them of their hearty concurrence for the safety and welfare of the State, and strenuously carrying on the common cause; and they ordered letters to be sent to the other Provinces, to invite them to give the same assurances. The city of Amsterdam, to signalize themselves more particularly on that occasion, signified to the States-General, that they would not only consent to such resolutions, as should be thought necessary at that time, but would advance money to those Provinces, which could not so readily furnish out their quota's that should be granted. The States-General, soon after, published their resolutions at large in print, to the same effect, and concluded, "That they were resolved religiously to maintain their Treaties and Alliances, entered into with their Confederates; steadfastly to pursue the contents thereof; vigorously and cordially to put them in execution; to persevere in the measures already taken, and agree to such other measures as

"should be thought convenient; and that notice should be given of this their true meaning and intention to all their Allies and Confederates."

For a farther encouragement to the States, The Queen sends a letter to the States.
The next post brought a letter in French from Queen Anne, which she had writ pursuant to her declaration in Council, and the Lords desire in their first address. The letter was sent to Mr. Stanhope with new credentials as Envoy extraordinary from England, both which, as he was then ill of the gout, he immediately delivered by the hands of his Secretary to the President of the week (1).

These assurances from the Queen, and the good disposition of both Houses of Parliament expressed in their addresses (which were also come over) were a great comfort to the States in the loss of their Stadtholder; but what revived them most, was the arrival of the Earl of Marlborough, with the character of Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary. The Queen, five days after her accession, had made him and the Duke of Bedford Knights of the Garter; and the next day, having declared the Earl Captain-General of her forces both at home and abroad, she sent him into Holland, to give the States full assurances of her maintaining the Alliances, that had been concluded by the late King, and of doing every thing that the common concerns of Europe required. This the Ambassador delivered, in a speech to the States, which was printed and dispersed for the satisfaction of the people (2). Dyckvelt, the President of the week, answered this speech in the name of the States, "Expressing their great affliction for the death of the late King; their congratulation of her Majesty's Succession to the Throne; their hearty thanks for the assurance of her friendship, and their own resolution

(1) The Queen's letter was as follows:

High and Mighty Lords, our dear Friends, Allies, and Confederates,

"It is not without a sensible grief, that we find ourselves obliged to acquaint you with the afflicting news of the death of the most high and most mighty Prince, William III. King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, our most dear Brother of glorious memory. He was seized on Wednesday last with a fever, which so much increased the following days, that, notwithstanding all the remedies that were made use of, he expired at eight of the clock on Sunday morning. This is certainly a very great loss to all Europe, and in particular to your State, whose interest he always maintained with so much valour, prudence, zeal, and conduct. And as it has pleased God, that we should succeed him in the Throne of these Kingdoms, we shall also succeed him in the same inclination to preserve a constant union and amity with you, and maintain all the Alliances, that have been made with your State, by our said dear Brother, and other our Predecessors; and likewise to concur with you in all the measures, that shall be necessary for the preservation of the common liberty of Europe, and for reducing the power of France within due bounds. This we desire you to be fully assured of, and that we shall always look upon the interests of England, and those of your State, to be inseparable, and united by such ties as cannot be broke, without the greatest prejudice to both Nations. We pray God

High and Mighty Lords,

"It having pleased the Divine Providence to take to himself his Majesty King William of glorious memory, to the great loss of his Kingdoms, the State of your High and Mighty Lordships, and of all Europe; the Queen, my Mistress, who by the same Divine Providence succeeds to the Throne of her Ancestors, as your Lordships have been informed by her Majesty's letter, hath commanded me to declare to your Lordships, that it is her sincere desire and inclination to preserve with you the same union, friendship, and strict correspondence, as hath subsisted during the course of the preceding reign, as being persuaded, that nothing in this world can be more conducive to the safety and welfare of both Nations, whose interests are the same. Her Majesty hath also ordered me to acquaint your High and Mighty Lordships, that she is firmly resolved to contribute all that lies in her power towards the promoting and increasing this union, friendship, and correspondence, and to make that a constant maxim of her Government.

"Her Majesty has further commanded me to assure your High and Mighty Lordships, that she will not only exactly and faithfully observe and execute

To which he added "That his Excellency's person would be highly acceptable to them, not only for the Queen's choice of him, and for the sake of King William, who first invested him with that character, but for his own merit." It was observed, that, when the President mentioned the late King, the tears ran down his cheeks.

Proceeding of France upon King William's death.
Lamberti.
Broderick.

The news of King William's death was received in France with such joy, that the Court and People could hardly contain themselves, without breaking out into the most furious transports; as was done at Rome to such a degree of extravagance, that Cardinal Grimani, the Imperial Minister, complained of it to the Pope as an affront to his Master the Emperor, who was the deceased King's Friend, Ally, and Confederate. But little notice was taken of it. They were so afraid in France that the news would not prove true, that the person who brought it first to Calais, was seized by the Governor's order, and kept in prison till it was confirmed. However, the French King finding that the death of King William would not have that effect, either in England or Holland, as he had promised himself, immediately sent instructions to the Sieur de Barré (who was left at the Hague by Count d'Avaux as Secretary to the embassy) to renew negotiations with the States, in hopes of separating them from their Allies. To give the more weight to what he should propose, credentials were sent to Barré to take upon him the character of Resident. These credentials were produced by Barré, the day before the Earl of Marlborough had his public audience; and it was soon perceived, that this new character was given him for the sake of a memorial, which was presented at the same time. This memorial highly reflected, as well on the late King, as on the past conduct of the Dutch, insinuating, that, as now they would recover their liberty, and be no longer under restraint, they would consult their own interest, and look upon a good intelligence with France as the firmest support of their Republic. The Resident himself printed his memorial, in a belief, that the States, under their consternation for the death of their Stadtholder, would recede from the resolutions they had before taken, and that the people would be influenced by it. He also vainly hoped it would have retarded the Earl of Marlborough's audience. The first thing the States did, was to communicate the memorial to Count de Goetz the Emperor's Envoy. The Earl of Marlborough and the Pensionary (with whom the Earl had daily conferred ever since his arrival) persuaded him to present a memorial to the States upon that of Resident Barré, and to publish the same, which was accordingly done. Among other remarks on Barré, Goetz takes notice of "that reproachful flattery, that their Lordships were now more Masters of themselves, than they were fourteen days ago; which is contrary to the opinion, that all men have of their great wisdom, and is no way consistent with the universal grief over all the Provinces, for the fatal alterations which the French memorial points at." The States likewise, after examining Barré's memorial, published an answer to it, wherein they expressed their resentment at his insinuations, and their veneration for the memory of their late Friend and Supporter, in these terms: "That they are very much surprized to see, that this whole memorial seems founded upon this: That they are now more at liberty to take such resolutions as they think expedient than formerly. Doubtless, this has reference to the death of his Majesty the late King of Great-Britain, of immortal memory. But herein the said Sieur Resident has extremely deceived himself, for want of understanding the constitution of their Government. That he ought to know, that their High and Mighty Lordships have heretofore had as much liberty, as at present, to debate and to take all such resolutions as they judged necessary and useful for the good and preservation of their State. It is true, they cannot enough deplore their misfortune, to see themselves deprived of the direction and conduct of a Prince, whose wisdom, moderation, and valour will be famed as long as the world endures. A Prince, whose heroic actions, and whole merits from this Republic, will never be forgot: And, in a word, whose death is lamented in this Country by all persons whatsoever, from the meanest to the highest. That the Councils of his said Majesty having never had any other aim both in deed and in word, than the preservation of their Liberty and Religion, and their High and Mighty Lordships being intirely convinced of this truth, as having found the benefit thereof; they are resolved to follow the same principles, and not to depart from the alliances contracted during the life of his said Majesty; but to persist in the measures taken pursuant

"the treaties and alliances made between the Kings her Predecessors and your High and Mighty Lordships, but that she is likewise ready to renew and confirm them; as also to concur with you in all measures, which have been taken by the late King of glorious memory, in pursuance of these alliances.

"Her Majesty is likewise disposed to enter into such other stricter alliances and engagements, which shall most conduce to the interests of both Nations, to the preservation of the liberty of Europe, and to the reducing within just bounds the exorbitant power of France.

"In the mean time, her Majesty is ready from this moment, and without any delay, to concur with your High and Mighty Lordships, and the other Allies, to this end, with all her forces, as well by sea as land.

"And her Majesty, to shew her zeal the more, has been pleased to authorize me to concert with your High and Mighty Lordships the necessary operations.

"These motives obliged her Majesty to order me to depart with all speed, to come and give your High and Mighty Lordships all possible assurances, without having any regard to the usual formalities.

"And I deem it a very great happiness, that her Majesty has done me the honour to employ me in this commission, since it gives me the opportunity of expressing to your High and Mighty Lordship the zeal I have for your service." Lamberti, Vol. I. 88.

1702. The Earl of Marlborough's stay in Holland, though it was but a few days, was to very good purpose. He had confirmed the Dutch in their former resolutions, and settled several important affairs with the States, particularly for the opening the campaign, for the siege of Keyserwerdt, (which by his advice was first to be undertaken) and the attack of Cadiz. He had agreed with the States and the Imperial Minister, that war should be proclaimed against France the same day * at Vienna, London, and the Hague. During his stay, the States had entered into such a confidence with the Earl of Marlborough, that he departed as well satisfied with them, as they were with him. He embarked on the 3d of April, and on the 5th arrived in England.

* May 15. N.S.†
The civil list settled.

Mean while, the House of Commons were pursuing the affairs recommended to their consideration from the Throne. The Queen, in her first speech, had put them in mind of the expiration of the civil list revenue. Accordingly, a bill passed both Houses, to continue to her for life the same revenue that was payable to the late King, though many seemed to apprehend, that so great a revenue might be applied to uses, not so profitable to the public, in a reign that was to be frugal, and probably would not be subject to great accidents. When the Queen, on the 30th of March, came to the House of Peers, to give the Royal assent to this bill, she made a speech to both Houses, "Returning thanks to the Commons, in particular, for continuing to her the same revenue they had granted to the late King; and assuring them, That, while her subjects remained under the burden of such great taxes, she would freighten herself in her own expences, rather than not contribute all she could to their ease and relief, with a just regard to the support of the honour and dignity of the Crown: And that, though the revenue might fall very short of what it had formerly produced, she would give directions, that one hundred thousand pounds be applied to the public service in this year, out of the revenue they had so unanimously given her."

This politic generosity was received with great applause, and particular notice was taken of it in all the addresses that came up afterwards.

At the same time, the Queen passed a bill for receiving and examining the public accounts; and, in her speech, she expressed a particular approbation of that bill: A commission to the same effect had been kept up, for six or seven years, during the former Reign, but it had been let fall for some years; since the Commissioners had never been able to make any discovery whatsoever, and so had put the public to a considerable charge, without reaping any sort of fruit from it. Whether this flowed from the weakness or corruption of the Commissioners, or from the integrity or cunning of those, who dealt in the public money, cannot be determined. The party, that had opposed the late King, had made this the chief subject of their complaints all the Nation over, that the public was robbed, and that private men lived high, and yet raised large estates out of the public treasure: This had a great effect over England; for all people naturally hearken to complaints of this kind, and very easily believe them: It was also said, to excuse the fruitlessness of the former commissions, that no discoveries could be made, under a Ministry, that would surely favour their under-workmen, though they were known to be guilty. One visible cause of men's raising great estates, who were concerned in the Administration, was this, that for some years the Parliament laid the taxes upon very remote funds; so that, besides the distance of the term of payment, for which interest was allowed, the danger the Government itself seemed to be often in (upon the continuance of which; the continuance and assignment of these funds was grounded) made that some tallies were sold at a great discount, even of the one half, to those who would employ their money that way, by which great advantages were made. The gain, that † It must be observed, that, from the year 1700, the difference between old and new stile is eleven days; so May 15th N.S. was May 4th O.S. which was the day the war was to be proclaimed in the three places here mentioned. Of all the instances of an obstinate attachment to antient errors, our adherence to Old Stile is one of the most remarkable. For, though this computation is known not only to be erroneous, but to become more so constantly every day, yet we still persist in the error, and call the eleventh day of the month the first. This every one knows was occasioned by making the solar year to consist of three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours, which is about eleven minutes too much. These eleven minutes in every hundred and thirty-two years grow to be a day, and consequently, from the time of the Council of Nice, in the year 325, are now become eleven days and a half. The Fathers of that Council, finding the vernal Equinox to be then on the 21st of March, imagined it would always be so; though, for the reason above, it now falls on the 10th of that month. So likewise they supposed, that, after a revolution of nineteen years, the new and full moons would return exactly to the same point of time; but this they do not by about an hour and half, which has also occasioned an error of about four days and a half between the natural and ecclesiastical moons. For the Nicene Council settled the moveable Feasts, by fixing Easter-day (on which the rest depend) to the Sunday after the first full moon that shall happen next after the 21st of March; and, for finding that full moon, framed a rule, which, depending on the truth of the nineteen years cycle, makes the ecclesiastical moons now to over-run, about four days and a half, the natural ones, as set down in the Almanacks. Thus, in civil affairs, the State suffers the error of eleven days in reckoning the day of the month, whilst the Church persists in fixing her moveable Feasts, by an imaginary, instead of a real full moon, contrary to the intention of the Nicene Council, who framed the rule on supposition that the natural and ecclesiastical moons would always happen together, as they did in their time, and would always have done, had it not been for the error of an hour and half every nineteen years, which the Fathers did not foresee. Hence all Assemblies, civil or ecclesiastical, should learn not to establish, for future generations, any Rule of practice, or Article of belief, without this or the like proviso; namely, "Provided, that, if the said Rule or said Article shall hereafter prove erroneous or repugnant to the truth and reason of things, then the said rule or article shall be, ipso facto, void, any statute, decree, or canon, to the contrary, notwithstanding."

(1) The

1702. that was made, by robbing the coin, in which many goldsmiths were believed to be deeply concerned, contributed not a little to the raising those vast estates, to which some had grown, as suddenly as unaccountably. All these complaints were easily raised, and long kept up, on design to cast the heavier load on the former Ministry: This made that ministry, who were sensible of the mischief the clamour did them, and of their own innocence, promote the bill with much zeal, and put the strongest clauses in it, that could be contrived to make it effectual. The Commissioners named in the bill were the hottest men in the House, who had raised as well as kept up the clamour with the greatest earnestness. One clause put in the act was not very acceptable to the Commissioners; for they were rendered incapable of all employments, during the commission: The act carried a retrospect quite back to the Revolution: It was given out, that great discoveries would be made by them, and the art and industry, with which this was spread over England, had a great effect in the elections to the succeeding Parliament.

The abjuration is refused by few.
Burnet.

On the 24th of March, the Speaker and Members present took the abjuration-oath, directed in the act made this Session, for the further security of her Majesty's person, and the Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, and for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended Prince of Wales, according to the alterations lately agreed to by the House. Before the King's death, it had been generally thought, that some in both Houses, and many more over the Nation, would refuse that oath, since they had opposed it so vehemently; and some indeed went out of town when the day came, in which the Houses resolved to try all their Members. But they soon came to other resolutions, and with them almost the whole party came and took the oath, and professed great zeal for the Queen, and an intire satisfaction in her title. Some suspected this was treachery, on design to get the Government into their hands, that so they might deliver it up, or at least that they might carry a Parliament so to their mind, that the act might be repealed; and they might think, that then the oath would fall with it. Distinctions were set about among them, which heightened these suspicions; for, though in the oath they declared, that the pretended Prince of Wales had not any right whatsoever to the Crown, yet in a paper, which Bishop Burnet saw, and which was handed about among them, it was said that Right was a term of law, which had only relation to legal Rights, but not to a divine Right, or to Birthright; so, since that right was condemned by law, they, by abjuring it, did not renounce the divine Right, that he had by his birth. They also supposed, that this abjuration could only bind, during the present state of things, but not in case of another Revolution, or of a Conquest. But this was too dark an affair to be inquired after, or seen into, in the situation, in which matters then were.

A Ministry formed.
Burnet.
Cond. of the Duch. of Marl.

The Queen being settled in the Throne, began to think of forming her Ministry, wherein she plainly discovered her partiality to the Tories, 1702. in favour of whom she had been all along prepossessed, as thinking them better affected to the Church than the Whigs. In vain did the Countess of Marlborough, who was appointed Groom of the Stole, and Keeper of the Privy Purse (1), use her endeavours to moderate her zeal for the Tories, and engage her to a better opinion of the opposite party. Her influence over the Queen, how great soever in other respects, was in this case but of little effect; and the Lords Marlborough and Godolphin themselves would not have had so great a share of her favour and confidence, if they had not been reckoned in the number of the Tories. The truth is, both these Lords had been educated in the persuasion, that the Tory party were the best friends to the Constitution both of Church and State; nor were they perfectly undeceived, but by experience.

Dr. John Sharp, Archbishop of York, was pitched upon by the Queen herself to preach the sermon at her Coronation (which was performed on St. George's day, April 23, which was to be her chief Counsellor in Church-matters. The late King had sent a message to the Earl of Rochester, some weeks before his death, to let him know, that he had put an end to his Commission of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; but that was not executed in form; so the Commission still subsisted in his person, and he was now declared Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The Lord Godolphin was, on the 6th of May, declared Lord High-Treasurer. This was very uneasy to himself, for he resisted the motion long; but the Earl of Marlborough, whose eldest daughter was married to that Lord's eldest son, pressed it in so positive a manner, that he said he could not go beyond sea to command the armies, unless the Treasury was put into his hands, for then he was sure, that remittances would be punctually made to him. The Earl was declared Captain-General; and the Prince of Denmark, on the 17th of April, had the title of Generalissimo of all the Queen's forces by sea and land; and it was for some time given out, that he intended to go beyond sea, to command the armies of the alliance; but this report soon fell, it being said, that the Dutch were not willing to trust their armies to the command of a Prince, who might think it below him to be limited by their instructions, or to be bound to obey their orders. The late King had dissolved the Commission for executing the office of Lord High-Admiral, and had committed that great Trust to the Earl of Pembroke. The secrets of that Board had been so ill kept, and there was such a faction in it, that the King resolved to vest it in a single person. The Earl of Pembroke was not easily brought to submit to it; he saw it would draw a heavy load upon him, and, was sensible, that, by his ignorance of sea affairs, he might fall into errors. To avoid which, he made use of good officers to assist him, and, resolving to command the fleet in person, took great pains to put things in such order, that it might be soon ready.

(1) The Ladies of the bed-chamber were, the Duchesses of Ormond and Queensbury; the Countesses of Scarborough, Burlington and Abington; the Marchioness of Huntingdon; the Ladies Hyde, Spencer, Fretcheville, Charlotte Beverwert, and Harriet Godolphin; and the Duchess of Hamilton.

1702. ready. A land-army was designed to go with the fleet, to the command of which the Duke of Ormond had been named. But, upon new measures, the Earl of Pembroke was first ordered not to go to sea in person, and soon after dismissed from his post, with the offer of a great pension, which he generously refused, though the state of his affairs and family seemed to require it. Prince George, on the 21st of May, was made Lord High-Admiral, and appointed Sir George Rooke, Sir David Mitchell, George Churchill, Admiral of the blue Squadron, and Richard Hill, Esq; to be his Council; though the legality of such a Council was much questioned, as it was a new Court, which could not be authorized to act but by an act of Parliament; yet, out of respect to the Queen, no public question was made of it, and the objection to it never went beyond a secret murmur. On the 14th of April, the Duke of Devonshire was appointed Lord Steward, the Earl of Jersey Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Bradford Treasurer, and Peregrine Bertie Vice-Chamberlain, and Sir Edward Seymour Comptroller of the Household, who, three days after, was likewise sworn of the Privy-Council; and the Earl of Abingdon, Viscount Weymouth, Lord Dartmouth, Mulgrave, Grenville, How, Gower, Harcourt, with several others who had, during the last reign, expressed the most violent and unrelenting aversion to the whole Administration, were now brought to the Council-board, whilst the names of the Lords Sommers and Halifax, and of several others firmly attached to the Revolution-principles, were left out of the list. The Privy Seal, to the admiration of all men, was given to the Marquis of Normanby (1), and to Sir John Levison Gower the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster. On the 2d of May, the Earl of Nottingham and Sir Charles Hedges were appointed Secretaries of State, in the room of the Earl of Manchester and Mr. Vernon, the latter of whom was however made one of the Tellers of the Exchequer. The Tories would trust none but the Earl of Nottingham, and he would serve with none but Sir Charles Hedges; and the maxim laid down at Court was, to put the direction of affairs in the hands of that party, who promised to carry on the war, and to maintain the Alliances. If they failed in this, it was said, the Queen would put her affairs into other hands, which at that time few could believe (2).

The Queen continued all the Judges in their posts, except Mr. Justice Turtton and Mr. Baron Hatfield; and most of the Lord-Lieutenants of Counties; nor did she make any change in the foreign Ministers. It was generally believed, that the Earl of Rochester and his party were for severe methods, and for a more intire change quite through all subaltern employments; but the Lords Godolphin and the Earl of Marlborough were for more moderate proceedings; so that, though no Whigs were put into any posts, yet many were kept in those, which they had enjoyed during the former Reign.

But, though the principal preferments were thus given to persons of the same party, there soon appeared a division among them, occasioned by a rivalry between the Earls of Rochester and Marlborough, in which, notwithstanding the near relation of the former to her Majesty, the latter soon gained the ascendant. It having been moved in Council, on the 2d of May, to declare war against France and Spain, the Earl of Rochester and some other Members represented the inconveniencies, that might attend such a step, urging, that it was safer for the English to act only as Auxiliaries. But the Earl of Marlborough maintained, on the contrary, that it not only became the honour of the Crown and Nation to make good the late King's engagements, but that France could never be reduced within due bounds, unless the English entered as Principals in the quarrel. This opinion being supported by the Dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, the Earl of Pembroke, and some others, the majority of the Council declared for it, and the Queen ordered a declaration of war to be drawn up. However, the Queen being willing to have the advice of her Commons upon this important affair, Sir Edward Seymour, by her command, laid before them, the same day, a Convention between her Majesty, the Emperor, and the States-General, about declaring war against France and Spain; after the reading of which, the Commons unanimously resolved to address the Queen, "To return her thanks for her communicating to them her intentions of declaring war, in conjunction with her Allies, against the French King and his Grandson; and to assure her, that they would, to the utmost, assist and support her in carrying it on."

Upon this occasion a motion was made for an Debate address, "That no person be an Officer in En. about Foreigners gland or Ireland in her Majesty's new raised forces, but such as were born in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the Dominions thereto belonging, or of English parents, unless they were before in half-pay." This motion tending to exclude the French Protestant Officers (though naturalized) who had served in the late war, Colonel Mordaunt strenuously opposed it, urging, "That he had some French Officers in his regiment, upon whose fidelity and courage he entirely depended, and who kept their companies in as good order, and as compliant as any native." The Marquis of Huntington spoke likewise in behalf of the French Refugees, urging, "What a reflection it would be on the English Nation, to abandon people, who, upon so many occasions, had ventured their lives for its safety and defence." Another Member desired those, who had made the motion, to explain themselves; for, said he, if thereby we mean to exclude all Foreigners, what will become, not only of Duke Schonberg, on whose Father this House has thought fit to bestow a gratuity of one hundred thousand pounds, for his eminent services in the Revolution, but also of his Royal Highness's Prince George

(1) It is said, that the Marquis (when Earl of Mulgrave) made his addresses to the Queen (then Princess Anne) some years before her marriage with the Prince of Denmark; and, though his addresses were checked as soon as discovered, yet she always retained a great regard for him.

War proclaimed

Barnet.

Two days after, May the 4th, the declaration of war against France and Spain was solemnly proclaimed (1) before the gate of St. James's Palace, and other usual places, as it was the same day by the Emperor and the States-General (2). The French Court was not a little surprized at these three declarations of war; and, immediately upon the receiving of them, the Marquiss

(1) The Declaration was in these terms :

Anne R.

"Whereas it hath pleased Almighty God to call us to the Government of these Realms, at a time, when our late dear Brother William III, of glorious memory, had, in pursuance of the repeated advices of the Parliament of this Kingdom, entered into solemn treaties of alliance with the Emperor of Germany, the States-General of the United Provinces, and other Princes and Potentates, for preserving the liberty and balance of Europe; and for reducing the exorbitant power of France; which treaties are grounded upon the unjust usurpations and incroachments of the French King, who had taken, and still keeps possession of a great part of the Spanish Dominions, exercising an absolute authority over all that Monarchy, having seized Milan and the Spanish Low-Countries by his armies, and made himself Master of Cadiz, of the entrance into the Mediterranean, and of the ports in the Spanish West-Indies by his fleets; every where designing to invade the liberties of Europe, and obstruct the freedom of navigation and commerce. And it being provided by the third and fourth articles of the forementioned alliance, that if, in the space of two months (which are some time since expired) the injuries complained of were not remedied, the parties concerned should mutually assist each other with their whole strength: And whereas, instead of giving the satisfaction that ought justly to be expected, the French King has not only proceeded to farther violence, but has added thereunto a great affront and indignity to Us and our Kingdoms, in taking upon him to declare the pretended Prince of Wales King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and has also influenced Spain to concur in the same affront and indignity, as well as in his other oppressions: We find ourselves obliged, for maintaining the public faith, for vindicating the honour of our Crown, and for preventing the mischiefs which all Europe is threatened with, to declare, and we do hereby accordingly declare war against France and Spain; and placing our intire confidence in the help of Almighty God, and so just and necessary an undertaking, we will (in conjunction with our Allies) vigorously prosecute the same by sea and land, being assured of the ready concurrence and assistance of our subjects, in a cause they have so openly and heartily espoused. And we do hereby will and require our Lord High-Admiral of England, our General of our forces, our Lieutenants of our several counties, Governors of our forts and garrisons, and all other officers and soldiers under them by sea and land, to do and execute all acts of hostility in the prosecution of this war against France and Spain, their vassals, and subjects, and to oppose their attempts; willing and requiring all our subjects to take notice of the same, whom we henceforth strictly forbid to hold any correspondence or communication with France or Spain, or their subjects. But, because there are remaining in our Kingdoms many of the subjects of France and Spain, we do declare our Royal intention to be, that all the subjects of France and Spain, who shall demean themselves dutifully towards us, shall be safe in their persons and estates."

Given at our Court at St. James's, the fourth day of May, 1702, in the first year of our Reign.

(2) The Emperor's Declaration was as follows:

"We Leopold, by the Grace of God, elected Emperor of the Romans in Germany, ever august King

"of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Slavonia, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, and Wirtemberg, Earl of Tyrol, &c. do make known, that although since the conclusion of a general peace, not many years ago at Ryswick in Holland, the Crown of France hath, as well by refusing for a long time to restore the fortresses of Brissac, as by the injuries and damages done to the House of Monbelaard, together with other violations, made it abundantly evident, that they did not intend to observe this solemn treaty better than any of the former: However, being in hopes, that we might pass the remainder of our troublesome Reign in peace, and after having suffered so many vexations to maintain the Holy Roman Empire, and our Kingdoms, and Hereditary Dominions in the enjoyment of the present peace, and for the future prevent the effusion of so much innocent Christian blood; we have chosen rather patiently to endure their insults, and to endeavour to find out means of amicably composing the differences, than to enter into a fresh quarrel upon that account, and thereupon begin a destructive war. But whereas, immediately after the death of Charles the Second, King of Spain and Duke of Austria, under the colour of a will, supposed to have been made by that Prince (which however is really null and of no validity) and notwithstanding all the marriage-contracts, renunciations, cessions, treaties of peace, and former oaths, the King of France has made himself master of all the Kingdoms and Countries of his said Majesty, among which there are some, that did belong to our Archducal House, before they came under the power of the Crown of Spain, besides those, that are feudatory and dependent on the Empire, and has by intrusion put his grandson, the Duke of Anjou, into the same; and moreover taken by force the Dukedom of Mantua, and other fiefs of the Empire, although they never belonged to the Monarchy of Spain, and has also caused a great number of troops to enter into the Diocese of Cologne and Liege, hath seized and put garrisons into all their towns and strong places, hath added new fortifications to them, and every where erected magazines, and, contrary to our lawful ordinances, and the execution thereof, according to the laws of the Empire, committed to the Princes of the Circles, hath supported by force of arms, and strengthened the Elector of Cologne in his disobedience; and on the other side hath caused the faithful subjects of the Empire to be imprisoned, and particularly the Baron de Moon, Dion of Liege, and hath seized and carried away several others from off the lands of the Empire, and hath attacked, in an hostile manner, and ill-treated the Princes of the Circles, who, according to their duty, endeavoured to put in execution our lawful Imperial mandates. And furthermore his grandson, the Duke of Anjou, hath taken to himself the titles, that belong to none but our Archducal House, and hath caused himself to be called the Duke of Austria, Count of Habsburgh, and of Tyrol. We look upon it as a thing inexcusable any longer to pass by in silence such hostilities, infractions, and violences, committed both against our Archducal House and our high Imperial dignity: On the contrary we find ourselves obliged, in consequence and by virtue of the laws of Nature and of Nations, and of the Holy Roman Empire, and particularly in consequence of the capitulation we swore to at the time we were elected Emperor, and of our Imperial, Archducal, and Patrimonial dignity, to hinder them with all our force and power (since 1702. quils de Torcy went into a great hall, where the King was walking, and read them over to him. He did not exprefs so much uneasiness at the complaint of the Emperor, but made a great many reflections upon that of the Queen, which so particularly respected the indignity done to the English Nation, by acknowledging the pretended Prince of Wales King of Great Britain. But "the endeavours of other Potentates have had as little success with the said Crown of France, as the offers we have made of coming to an amicable agreement) and that so much the more, inasmuch as it is a matter unquestionable, that the said will, which at present serves for a colour of the said hostilities of France, was contrived by some bribed Spanish Counsellors, according to the directions of the French King; and that it was offered to his late Catholic Majesty, when he was sunk to such a weakness of body and mind, as not to be able to read or understand, much less to weigh and examine, as was necessary, the large contents of the said will. And moreover, as it is altogether contrary to the intention of the said late King, which he had so often signified to us; and as the said will is full of fallacies, and of incomprehensible and contradictory matters; and lastly, as it gives as little satisfaction to our just demand, as the King of France could receive from it, not to mention, that as yet it hath not been duly executed by them, but hath already been broken in many points, and more particularly, so far as it is evident, that the said arbitrary enterprizes, as well by Himself, as in the name of his Grandson, as the pretended Lord of the Circle of Burgundy, and consequently a declared enemy to Us and the Empire, do tend to the overthrow and destruction of the Imperial dignity, the authority, and rights, which were intrusted to us by a lawful election.

"Supported therefore by the justice of our cause, and trusting in the assistance of Almighty God, we declare and publish by these presents, that we hold for our enemies the French King and the Duke of Angjou, with their subjects and adherents; and that, to prevent the public violence and injury, which are done by them unto Us, the Empire, and the loyal States of the Empire, and to defend our Imperial and other rights, we are obliged to take up arms, and to cause our troops to march against our said enemies. We command by these presents the faithful subjects of Us and the Empire, by the duty wherein they stand engaged to us and the Empire, and under pain of deprivation of life and goods, and we seriously injoin them by these presents, that none of them do engage in the service of the said Crown of France, of the Duke of Angjou, or of his adherents; and that none of them do undertake in the least to do any service, or give them any assistance, or to maintain with them, directly or indirectly, any commerce, partnership, or correspondence, but that from this moment they do wholly break off and abstain from the same, and do assist us with all their power, to pursue and attack our said enemies, and those which belong to them. We have also this intire confidence in the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire, that they will all in general, and every one in his own particular, from this time forward, at such time as we shall consult with them, according to the exigence of affairs, concerning what may be fit to be done in a matter that does not respect us alone, but likewise relates to the welfare and security of the other principal members of the Empire in particular, and consequently that of the whole Roman Empire, will aid and assist us in our lawful and just undertaking, with their faithful and wise advice, and with the sincere, and unanimous, and firm conjunction of all the force, which God and the Empire has given them, to free themselves and other injured States from oppression: That they will contribute towards removing all those calamities, and that they will not suffer themselves to be drawn away in any

"wife; let every one therefore regulate himself, and take care accordingly."

In witness whereof we have caused these presents to be sealed with our Imperial seal. Lamberti, Vol. II.

The Manifesto of the States-General, containing the reasons of their proclaiming war against France and Spain, was in these terms.

"The States-General of the United-Netherlands, to all, to whom these presents shall come, greeting. Know ye, that the King of France having, for a long time since, cast his eyes upon these Provinces, to seize upon the same, if possible, or intirely to destroy or ruin them, has, in order to compass his design, twice attacked this Republic; viz. in the years 1672 and 1688, by a most unjust and violent war, though we had done our utmost to avoid the same, and preserve the continuation of peace and tranquility. That nothing is more evidently known, than that, if that King had succeeded in his design, and possessed himself of these Provinces, he would have thereby made his way to the Universal Monarchy. And, if he had but only weakened them, and forced them to fit still, and separate themselves from their Allies, it is no less notorious, that he might have attained his aim, by subduing other Princes and Powers; whereby this Republic had been in a manifest danger of being reduced, as well as other States, and losing her Liberty and Religion, which are the two precious advantages, for which the subjects of this State have formerly suffered so many cruel persecutions, and which they could never fully and intirely enjoy, till they had bravely and heartily sacrificed their fortunes and blood, with every thing else that was dear to them, and maintained a war of eighty years standing against the then powerful Kings of Spain.

"That, notwithstanding, it hath pleased God to punish these Provinces by the two last wars, because of their sins, yet he has not permitted, that the French King should put in execution his ambitious designs; but, on the contrary, has so favoured the arms of the Republic and their Allies, that they obtained in the years 1678 and 1697, a general peace; whereby France was obliged to restore large Provinces, Lordships, and important places to the Emperor, the Empire, and the King of Spain, which she had possessed, partly by a violent force, and partly by craft and artifice, under the specious name of re union, and other pretences, against the treaty of Nimeguen.

"That, the treaty of peace of Ryswick, and that of Commerce, being so solemnly concluded in the year 1697, we had all the reason in the world to flatter ourselves, that the same would be bona fide executed in all its points. But we have found, on the contrary, by experience, that they did not design on the part of France, to observe them, but only to induce Us and our Allies to lay down our arms, disband our forces, and separate us one from another, in order to weaken us; and, in particular, to enervate and ruin our subjects in ruining their commerce, that they might the more easily obtain the aim here abovementioned. This is so notorious, that the treaties aforesaid of Peace and Commerce were hardly ratified, but they began manifestly to inereach upon the trade of these Provinces (which is the sinew of this State) by their openly refusing to grant us the Tariff promised unto us by the treaty aforesaid, putting thereby the Subjects and Merchants of this Republic to innumerable troubles upon that account: Which obliges us,

"after

1702. But what most exasperated him, was the Declaration of the States-General. For, as soon as the Marquis de Torcy had done reading it, the King took it, and in a transport of anger threw it upon

“ after a long, tedious, and expensive negotiation, to accept a Tariff (though disadvantageous to us) contrary to the tenor of the said treaty, in order to prevent a greater mischief.

“ That, notwithstanding it was stipulated by the fifth article of the said treaty of Commerce, that such of our subjects, who shall settle in France for carrying on their trades, shall be free and exempted from the duties and tax laid upon foreigners; yet excessive duties have been laid upon them, and we have been forced to see and bear the same.

“ That, in the mean while, the King of France omitted nothing to persuade us, by all imaginable protestations, that he had no other design than the preservation of the peace, and the removing of all obstacles, that might interrupt the same. And, whereas the weak constitution of the King of Spain could not promise a long life, and that his death was like to cause great wars and differences, this occasioned a treaty, whereby on one side, it was provided, that the French King should not have that exorbitant power, which otherwise he would have had by the accession or union of the Spanish Monarchy to his crown, and by these means prevented the ill consequences all Europe was afraid of; and, on the other hand, satisfaction was given to others, who claimed the said Succession, in order to preserve the general peace.

“ That, upon this foundation, the King of France having concluded, on the third and twenty-fifth day of March, 1700, a solemn treaty with the King of England and this State, we were in hopes to preserve the general peace. But that treaty was no sooner concluded and ratified, but it most evidently appeared, that it was not the intention of the French King to stand by it and observe it, but on the contrary, that they used all manner of artifices in the Court of Spain, not only to render the Emperor odious to the Spaniards, but also to oblige the King to dispose of his Succession by a testament in favour of France.

“ That, the King of Spain having some time after departed this life, they produced a testament, whereby the Duke of Anjou, grandson to the King of France, was declared heir of all the Kingdoms and Dominions of the deceased King.

“ That, the said will being made public, the French King did immediately give proofs of his secret intentions of making use of all imaginable means to gratify his vast ambition: And in order thereunto, (without any respect or regard to a treaty so solemnly and newly concluded, and the repeated protestations he had made never to depart from it) he accepted the said will, breaking and violating the treaty aforesaid, without giving any previous communication of his intentions to those, with whom he made it; notifying the same without any disguise to the Republic, and alledging for the principal motive thereof, that the spirit and sense of the said treaty, and not the letter, were only to be regarded; and explaining that spirit and sense in his own way, as he thought fit, not omitting at the same time to threaten us, and representing the dangers and misfortunes, which we might expect, if we did not conform ourselves to that spirit. Which proceeding is a breach of faith as uncommon and unheard of, as ever was, and a dangerous instance, which tends for the future to undermine and ruin the faith of all public treaties.

“ That, by virtue of the testament aforesaid, that King did not content himself to cause the Duke of Anjou to be proclaimed King of Spain, but he possessed himself in his name of all the Kingdoms and Dominions of the Spanish Monarchy, without any regard to the pretensions of the Emperor, which were so fully owned in the treaty aforesaid, that they were not only laid as the foundation of the “ said treaty, but also so far acknowledged for just and lawful on all sides, that the greatest part of the Spanish Monarchy was yielded to the Archduke of Austria.

“ That the said King being unwilling to stop there, caused his own troops to take possession of the Spanish Netherlands, notwithstanding our own were in garrison therein, by the permission and consent of the late King of Spain, for the defence and security of the said Country, and with a great deal of difficulty was at last persuaded to let our said troops return home, after they were very much weakened. That by these means the Republic was at once deprived of her rampart and barrier, for which we had already maintained two bloody wars, and which the King of France himself had assigned in the conditions of the peace concluded in the year 1678, and contrary to what was particularly stipulated in the treaty of Partition, and insisted upon on the part of the Republic, viz. That the said Spanish Netherlands should belong to the Archduke of Austria.

“ That the said King of France immediately began to govern arbitrarily the Kingdoms and Dominions of Spain, under the name of his grandson, as well in civil as in military affairs, and has so united those States to his own, as if the same were but one and the same Kingdom and Government; which can never more evidently appear, than in the case of the Spanish Netherlands, the barrier of this State, where it appears (as indeed they write it from Spain) that the said Provinces have been absolutely yielded and made over to the King of France; and that he exercises an absolute authority over them, both in civil and military affairs, as likewise in matters of finances.

“ That the French King having carried his exorbitant power to the degree, which the Christian world had so long apprehended, and laid suitable foundations for obtaining the universal Monarchy, he did not delay it long to put these projects in execution, sending a formidable army into Italy, to make himself intirely master thereof, having already sent a great number of troops into the Spanish Netherlands to fight us, and oblige us, if possible, to a separate treaty without our Allies.

“ That these artifices, (though never so well concerted) falling short of the desired effect, the French King made use of all other imaginable ways to compel us thereunto by force, and to that end seized the city and citadel of Lige, without the consent and knowledge of the Emperor and the Empire, and caused the Dean of the said Chapter to be by violence seized and carried away into the Spanish Dominions, that he might not oppose his design, and in order to strike a terror into the said Chapter.

“ That, being not satisfied with having thus seized upon Lige, and in order to frighten us more and more, he possessed himself, contrary to the will of the Chapter of Cologne, of the most considerable places of that Archbishoprick, and particularly of the fortresses of Bonn, Keserswaart, and Rhimberguen (his design upon the city of Cologne having happily miscarried by their good conduct) to put himself in a condition to invade this Republic, as he had done in the year 1672. And, that nothing might be wanting to make himself sure of it, and in order to block us up on all sides, he caused a considerable number of troops to be raised at his own charges in the country of Wesembattle, that they might invade on that side, sending, at the same time, all sorts of ammunition and artillery to the Rhine, through foreign countries, the better to invade these Provinces.

“ That the said King, being not satisfied with having frightened us in that manner by land, proceeded further; and by possessing himself (in the name of the King of Spain) of all the harbours in Spain, Naples, 1702. upon the table, saying, " That Messieurs the " Dutch Merchants (meaning the States-General)

" should one day repent of their boldness in " declaring war against so great a Monarch."
But

" Naples, Sicily, and other islands in the Mediterranean, as also the Spanish Netherlands and the Indies, he made himself intire Master of the commerce of Europe, and obtained the power to exclude us and all other nations from it. And lastly, that we might have no room or place left to us for trade, he endeavoured to persuade the King of Portugal to forbid us his harbours, and sent, at the same time, a squadron into the West-Indies, on purpose to seize the silver fleet, in which our subjects, and those of other Princes and Potentates, are so considerably concerned.

" That, affairs being in that intricate and dangerous condition, we, as the nearest and most exposed to the fire, having, in the first place, invoked God Almighty to our assistance, thought it necessary to put ourselves in a posture of defence, and so arm ourselves, as well as we could, by sea and land, against that exorbitant power, and the dangers we were threatened with; and, at the same time, to defend our Neighbours and Allies the succours they had promised us by treaties, in case we were molested and disturbed: Which they having granted us with the same readiness as we desired, we put ourselves in that condition, that, refusing to hearken to any private treaty with France, we had time to confederate ourselves with his Imperial Majesty, the King of England, the King of Prussia, and other Princes and Potentates, for the common defence of our and their respective Dominions, the preservation of the liberty of Europe, and for recovering the general peace and tranquillity.

" That, every one beginning to open their eyes, and to think of their natural defence, the Emperor sent a considerable army into Italy, to oppose the French King.

" That his Imperial Majesty, having thought fit to dislodge the French out of the Electorate of Cologne, and used all imaginable ways for it, did, together with the Directors of the Circles concerned therein, desire our assistance, which we (conformable to our engagements, our own defence, and the strict alliance we were entered into) could not refuse; but, on the contrary, thought it necessary, that our forces there and elsewhere should act as Auxiliaries by way of diversion.

" That these proceedings of the French have, to our great sorrow, kindled a war in several parts of the world, which is actually begun, and carried on with a great deal of violence.

" That, as we had not given the least pretence thereunto, but, on the contrary, made our utmost efforts for the preservation of the general peace, we were very glad to see a Minister, that the French King had sent into these parts, and neglected nothing to engage him to make some proposals for maintaining the peace. But, seeing we could not succeed therein, we made ourselves some demands, which we thought necessary for recovering a general tranquillity and our private security; but there has been no manner of answer, nor the least offer made thereupon.

" That indeed some outward protestations of peace have been made on that side, but as, at the same time, they continued their warlike preparations, to seize the lands of their neighbours, and to confederate themselves with several Princes and Potentates; they have clearly manifested, that their protestations would come to nothing, unless we were resolved to treat separately from our Allies; and this they have still more evidently discovered, by recalling successively two Ministers.

" Finally, the King has upon that foot caused his Resolent to declare unto us in a memorial, that his armies were in a condition to act against us, if we " came to no resolution about the things contained therein.

" And, as there is nothing more evidently known, than that the designs of the present King of Spain against the liberty of our State and Commerce are the same as those of the King of France; nay, as all the world must be convinced by the whole directions and management of affairs, that the King of France and the present King of Spain are one and the same in effect; and that the King of Spain can do, nor will do nothing, but what the King of France pleases, and will have him to do; even that the Kingdoms of France and Spain are united into one: It follows from thence, that whatever the King of France has done against Us and our Allies, in the name of the King of Spain, must be taken and understood to be made by the King of Spain himself, or at least by both of them. That by these means the King of France (above what has been already said) has made use of the Spanish troops in the name of the King of Spain to carry on his design against us. That in that name he has erected a fort within the reach of the cannon of a fortress belonging to the States, contrary to the treaty concluded with the King of Spain in the year 1648, and contrary to the laws of Nations and those of war.

" That the King of Spain has not only suffered those proceedings of the King his grandfather, but absolutely approved the same, and the actual seizing the whole Monarchy of Spain, and in particular of the Spanish Netherlands, that necessary barrier for our State.

" That all divine and human laws dictating to us, that, being thus straitened, blocked up on all sides, and actually attacked by the Kings of France and Spain, and threatened by them with so many dangers, we may, and are bound to make use against them of all the means God and Nature have put into our hands for our defence, protecting our subjects, and for preserving their Religion and Liberty; and to that end to take up arms against the said King of France and Spain, who have together conspired our ruin and destruction, and declare war against them, as we do by these presents, trusting, that God Almighty will bless the justice of our cause, and the means we shall make use of; desiring, that all Kings, Princes, and Republics, and States, who love their own preservation and liberty, together with that of Europe, that they will regard this our Declaration, as an effect of an urgent and pressing necessity for defending ourselves, and protecting our subjects, and consequently all Europe: And that they will (in conjunction with us) oppose the ill designs of the Kings of France and Spain, and their exorbitant power, whereby they intend to make themselves masters of all Christendom, and to that end to give us aid and assistance.

" Lastly, we command and require all our subjects and inhabitants of these Provinces, Commanders, Officers, Soldiers, and others, of what quality soever they be, to own and regard the said Kings of France and Spain as enemies of this State; to invade their country, and fall upon their subjects and vassals both by sea and land; to repel their violence, and do every thing else they are obliged to do for the defence of our country, and the damage of our enemies.

" And, that no body may pretend to be ignorant thereof, we require and command the Lords States, Counsellors, Deputy-States of these respective Provinces, and all other Officers and Magistrates of this country, to cause these presents to be proclaimed, published, and posted up, on the 15th day of this instant, in all the places, where publications of 1702. But he did not publish his declaration of war till the 3d of July (1)

On the 5th of May, the Commons resolved to present an address to her Majesty, "returning the thanks of their House for her great zeal for the Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, expressed in her late order in Council, directing the Princess Sophia to be prayed for." As the night, that recommended that Princess, was in her own blood, she was designated by her Christian name, and not by her title. It came to be known, that this had been opposed in Council by the Marquis of Normandy, but was promoted by the Lord Godolphin. The Lords returned their thanks to the Queen upon the same account, as also "for laying before them the Convention made with the Emperor and the States-General, in order to a concurrent declaration of war."

A bill about the union of the two Kingdoms.
Burnet.

As the Queen, in her first speech to the Parliament, had renewed the motion made by the late King, for the union of England and Scotland, a bill was brought in for that purpose. Many of those, who seemed now to have the greatest share of her favour and confidence, opposed this bill with much heat, and not without indecent reflections on the Scotch Nation; yet it was carried by a great majority, that the Queen should be empowered to name Commissioners for treating of an union. It was so visibly the interest of England, and of the present Government, to shut that back-door against the practices of France, and the attempts of the pretended Prince of Wales, that the opposition to this first step towards an union, and the indecent scorn with which Seymour and others treated the Scots; were clear indications, that the pofts, they were brought into, had not changed their tempers: But that, instead of healing matters, they intended to irritate them farther by reproachful speeches; the bill went through both Houses, notwithstanding the rough treatment it met with at first, and on the 6th of May received the Royal assent (2).

The intire harmony, between the Queen and both Houses of Parliament, greatly disappointed the disaffected, who expected nothing but confusion upon the late King's death, and who, to shew their joy at an accident, that had caused a general concern in most parts of Europe, vilified the deceased King with libels, verses, and healths, so very indecent and scandalous, that, instead of wit, they served only to demonstrate their implacable malice (3). Not content with these insults, they endeavoured to blast the King's memory, and to render his friends obnoxious, by charging upon him a design of excluding the Princess Anne from the Succession. For he had no sooner expired, than a report was spread, That some papers were found in his strong box, whereby it appeared, that he had laid a scheme to get the Elector of Hanover declared his immediate Successor:

A false report of designs against the Queen.
Burnet.

"this nature are usually made; commanding likewise, that the same be published and affixed in the usual places of the district of the generality."

Done and concluded in the Assembly of the Lords States-General at the Hague, May the 8th, 1702. Signed W. de Nassau, and underneath F. Fagel; and sealed with the seal of the States-General in red wax. Lamberti, Vol. II.

(1) It was in the following terms:

By the King,

"Although the treaty concluded at Ryswick at a time, when the King, by the superiority of his forces, was in a condition to have given laws to the neighbouring Princes, that were jealous of his power, was a certain proof of the sincere desire, that his Majesty had always to give peace to his subjects, and to restore peace to Europe: His Majesty nevertheless finds, that the Emperor, without any lawful right to the Spanish Monarchy, hath put himself in a condition by the augmentation of his troops, by treaties and alliances with several Princes, and particularly with England and the States-General of the United-Provinces, to trouble the repose of Europe by a new war, as unjust as it is ill grounded. They have begun hostilities on all sides, against and contrary to the treaties so solemnly sworn to. All Europe is witness of his Majesty's moderation. He hath seen places attacked, advantageous posts seized, convoys stopped, and prisoners taken, before any declaration of war, and at a time when his Majesty was endeavouring by his Ambassadors and Envoys to preserve the peace. All these steps being so contrary to sincere dealing and their own interests; and the manifestoes and declarations of war of the Emperor, England, and the States-General having been published, his Majesty finds himself under an indispensable necessity (in order to preserve his own, and the King his Grandson's Dominions) to arm on his side, and to make his levies sufficient to oppose the undertakings of the common enemies. And, for that end, his Majesty is resolved to "employ all his forces by sea and land, and (by the help of the divine protection, which he implores on the justice of his cause) to declare war against the Emperor, England, the States-General of the United-Provinces, and the Princes their Allies. His Majesty orders and commands all his subjects, vassals, and servants, to cruise upon the subjects of the Emperor, England, and Holland, and on the subjects of their Allies; and strictly forbids his subjects to have henceforth any communication, commerce, or intelligence with them on pain of death. And therefore his Majesty hath revoked, and by these presents revokes all permissions, pass-ports, safe-guards, and safe-conducts, which may have been granted by him, his Lieutenant-Generals, and other his Officers, contrary to these presents; and hath declared, and does declare them to be void, and of none effect and force, forbidding all persons whatsoever to have any regard unto them. His Majesty orders and commands the Admiral, Marshals of France, Governors and Lieutenant-Generals for his Majesty in his Provinces and Armies, Marshals de Camp, Colonels, Camp-masters, Captains, Chiefs, and Leaders of his Majesty's soldiers, both horse and foot, French and Strangers, and all his other Officers, to whom it may pertain, what is herein contained, to cause and execute, each in his office, within their towns and jurisdictions. For such is his Majesty's will and pleasure, that these presents be published in all the maritime and other towns, and in all the ports, havens, and other places of the Kingdom and Lands under his obedience, where need shall be, to the end that none may pretend ignorance."

Given at Marli, June 3, 1702.

(2) At the same time the Queen gave her assent to an act for laying a duty upon land. To another for encouragement of the Greenland trade; and to a third, for making good the deficiencies, and the public credit.

1702. Successor: That, in order to effect this, the troops of Hanover and Zell were to file off towards the sea-coast of Holland: That, soon after the King's return from thence, a pretended insurrection was to be raised either in Scotland or Ireland, to give the King a colourable pretence for inviting over the Hanoverian troops, with their Prince to command them; and that several Peers, privy to this design, were to be made Lord-Lieutenants of Counties, in order to influence the elections for Members of a new Parliament. This, many of those, who were now in posts, had talked of in so public a manner, that it appeared they intended to possess the whole Nation with a belief of it; hoping thereby, to alienate the People from those who had been in the late King's confidence, and disgrace all the Whigs, in order to the carrying all elections of Parliament for men of their own party. And indeed, the report had gained so far upon the belief of some people, that the city of Norwich, in their address to the Queen, printed in the Gazette on the 30th of April, "congratulated her Majesty's most happy and peaceable Accession to the Throne, notwithstanding all the malicious designs and contrivances used to defeat her Majesty of her undoubted right."

The Dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, and the Earls of Marlborough, Jersey, and Abemarle, had been ordered by the Queen to visit the late King's papers, and bring her such of them, as related to the Alliances, or other affairs of the Crown. Several Peers, who retained a great veneration for the late King, perceiving the design which was driven at by those false reports, made a motion in the House of Lords (1), that an enquiry should be made into the truth of that report, and of all other stories of that kind, that so, if there was any truth in them, such, as had been concerned in those wicked designs, might be punished; and if they were found to be false, that those, who spread them about, might be chastised. Upon this, the House desired that those Lords, who had visited the late King's papers, would let them know, if they had met with any among them, relating to the Queen's Succession, or to the Succession of the House of Hanover. Four of them were then in the House, only the Earl of Marlborough was ill that day; so the four who were present said, they had found nothing, that did in any sort relate to that matter; and this was confirmed by the Earl of Marlborough to some Peers, who were sent by the House, to ask him the same question. Upon which the House came to a resolution, "That the Lords, who were appointed by her Majesty to inspect the late King's papers, having severally declared, that they did not see or find amongst them any paper, in the least tending to the prejudice of her Majesty, or her Succession to the Crown, or which might give any ground or colour for such a report; the said report was groundless, false, villainous, and scandalous, to the dishonour of the late King's memory, and highly tending to the disservice of her present Majesty." And they ordered, "That the matter of fact aforesaid, and the resolution of the House thereupon, be laid before her Majesty by the Duke of Bolton, the Earl Marshal, the Earls of Radnor, Stamford, and Scarborough, and the Lord Ferrers; and that they do humbly desire her Majesty to order Mr. Attorney-General to prosecute, with the utmost severity of the law, the authors or publishers of such scandalous reports." The Lords named in this order having waited on the Queen on the 5th of May, her Majesty told them, "That she was very ready to do any thing of that kind, and would give directions to Mr. Attorney-General effectually to prosecute the authors and publishers of such false reports."

Some books had been published, particularly Libellous pamphlets by Dr. Drake and Dr. Davenant, charging the late Ministry and the whole Whig party with the like designs of excluding the Queen. These books were censured, and the authors of them were ordered to be prosecuted; though both the Marquiss of Normanby, and the Earl of Nottingham, did all they could to excuse those writers (2).

As the horse had belonged to Sir John Fenwick, it was insinuated as a Judgment upon the King in the following epigram, which they made on the occasion:

Quæ te felicem felicia Præta tulerunt?

* Of Sir John Fenwick's.

(1) The motion was made by the Earl of Carlisle, and seconded by the Lords Wharton, Hallifax, and others.

(2) The particulars of this affair were as follow:

On the 4th of May, a complaint was made to the House of Peers of a passage in the Preface to a book, intitled, The History of the last Parliament begun at Westminster, the tenth day of February, 1700; which though it did not directly reflect on the late King's memory, yet manifestly tended to cast an indelible odium upon his friends, being couched in these words: "And perhaps there was a thing in prospect of deeper reach than all these, which was, that, should it have pleased God to have snatched from us the King on a sudden, by chance of war, or other fatal accident, during the tumult of arms abroad, and the civil disorders they had raised among us at home, and a numerous, corrupt, licentious party throughout the Nation, from which the House of Commons was sometimes not free, they might entertain hopes from the advantage of being at the helm, and the assistance of their rabble, to have put in practice their own schemes, and have given us a new model of Government of their own projection, and so to have procured to themselves a lasting impunity, and to have mounted their own beast, the rabble, and driven the sober part of the Nation, like cattle, before them. That this is no groundless conjecture will readily appear to any considering person, from the treatment her Royal Highness the Princess of Denmark, the Heir apparent to the Crown, met all along from them and all their party. They were not contented to shew her a constant neglect and slight themselves, but their whole party were instructed to treat her, not only with disrespect, but with spite. They were busy to traduce her with false and scandalous aspersions; and so far they carried 1702. When the falshood of those calumnies was apparent, then it was given out, with an unusual confidence, that no such report had ever been spread; though the contrary was evident, and the thing was boldly asserted in those books. And therefore a peculiar measure of assurance was necessary to face down a thing, which they had taken such pains to infuse into the minds of the credulous vulgar all England over.

The Earl of Nottingham, to divert this enquiry, moved, that another might be made into those books, in which the murder of King Charles the First was justified; though the provocation, given to some of these, was, by a sermon preached by Dr. Banks before the Convocation, on the 30th of January, in which he drew a parallel between King Charles's sufferings and those of our Saviour: And, in some very indecent expressions, gave the preference to the former (1).

The war being now declared, both Houses joined in an address to the Queen, wherein they represented, "That nothing would more contribute to the effectual carrying it on, and reducing her enemies to the greatest streights, than an intire prohibition of all correspondence with France and Spain on the part of "the Allies; and therefore they humbly advised her Majesty to engage the Emperor, the States-General, and her other Allies, to join with her Majesty in prohibiting all intercourse between the subjects of her Majesty and her Allies, and the subjects of France and Spain; and also to concert such methods with the States-General, as might most effectually secure the trade of her subjects and her Allies." This address her Majesty readily promised to comply with, adding, "That she was too much concerned for the public welfare, to omit any necessary precautions for the protection of the trade."

On the other hand, the Lords having made some amendments to a bill from the Commons, for the Encouragement of Privateers, to which the Commons refused their concurrence; their Lordships, in an address, represented to the Queen, "That the sea preparations of her Majesty's enemies being such as seemed not to be intended for encountering and fighting her Royal navy, but rather for making a pyrratical war, to the interruption of commerce, it was, in their opinion, highly requisite for the public service, that her Majesty would give all possible encouragement to her subjects to arm and

"the affront, as to make her at one time almost the common subject of the title tattle of almost every Coffee-house and Drawing-room, which they promoted with as much zeal, application, and venom, as if a bill of exclusion had then been on the anvil, and these were the introductory ceremonies." After reading this passage, the Lords ordered the Book-seller for whom the book was printed, to attend the House on the next Saturday; but, before that day came, Dr. James Drake, the Physician, having owned himself to be Author of the book in question, he was on the 9th of May, examined by the Lord Keeper, who asked him what he had to say concerning the said book? The Doctor answered, "That he thought he had just reason to write what he had writ, he having heard her Highness talked of disrespectfully in every Coffee-house." And then he withdrew. After some debate, he was called in again, and the Lord Keeper told him, that the House was not satisfied with what he had said, but thought he trifled, and required him to acquaint the House with the grounds of his writing the paragraph abovementioned. He answered, "That he found it mentioned in divers anonymous pamphlets published at that time, and hoped it was no hurt to answer those pamphlets; and desired time to recollect what these pamphlets were;" and then withdrew. After some time he was called in again, and asked whether he could charge any person in the Kingdom with the matters asserted by him in that paragraph? And whether he had heard any persons say, that they could charge any persons whatsoever with the matters contained in that paragraph? To these questions he answered, He did not know of any such person; and being further asked, if he had any grounds besides the pamphlets, and what the pamphlets were? He said, "He had no other grounds besides the several pamphlets following, viz. The two Legion Letters, the black Lists, Jura Populi Anglicani, and Toland's Reasons for writing over the Princess of Hannover." Lastly, he was asked, Whether in any one of these pamphlets there was any thing said about setting aside the present Queen? To which the Doctor having answered, He did not remember there was; and, being withdrawn, the Lords took the said paragraph into consideration, and resolved, "That there were in it several expressions, which were groundless, false, and scandalous, tending to create jealousies in her Majesty of her People, and to cause great misunderstandings, fears, and disputes among the Queen's

"subjects, and to disturb the peace and quiet of the Kingdom." Ordering at the same time, "That her Majesty's Attorney-General should forthwith effectually prosecute Dr. Drake for having writ the said paragraph."

Three days after, May 12, the Lords took into consideration two paragraphs of a book, intitled, Tom Double returned out of the country: Or, The true picture of a modern Whig, set forth in a second Dialogue between Mr. Whiglove and Mr. Double, supposed to be written by Dr. Davenant; which in the 89th and 90th pages contained the following expressions:

"Whiglove. "I find we have miscarried in one great design: The train would not take; we were very hot upon it just before the Parliament met: All the Whig Coffee-houses rung, how necessary it was to break into the Acts of Settlement, and to exclude—Double. "Mum, Whiglove, talk no more upon that subject, I beseech you. Fresh orders are issued out, and, since we are not strong enough to make it go, and that, on the contrary, it has alarmed and provoked all sorts of men, we are now directed to say, that never any such thing was intended by our party, though, God knows, it was the discourse of all our clubs. Under the rose this was one of those embryo's, that proved abortive upon the 30th of December last; but, though it be not seasonable to stir in it now, never fear our abandoning a wicked design: We never quite lay aside any mischief. However, since it has really opened the eyes of a great many, and weakened our interest among several of our own side, whom we cannot work up to be guilty of so much injustice, let us take all Occasions of declaring, that we will not violate any of the acts upon any account whatsoever; which we may the more safely do, because you know it is our principle, not to think that we are bound by any protestations we make, either in private or in public; and it is one of the great advantages we have over the rest of our fellow-subjects, that we can fetter the consciences of others, while our own are at perfect liberty." The Lords, after some debate, passed the same censure upon this book, as they had upon part of the Preface of Dr. Drake's History. Pr. H. L. II. 37, &c.

(1) On the 16th of May, a pamphlet intitled, Animadversions upon the two last 30th of January sermons, one preached to the Honourable House of Commons, the other to the House of Convocation: In a letter, after reading

Drake's is a prosecution of conversation since with France May 23 1702.

"set out private men of war. And whereas, by the sixth article of the treaty concluded at the Hague between his late Majesty, the Emperor, and the States-General, her Majesty was at liberty to take and seize lands and cities belonging to the Spanish Dominions in the Indies, and retain the same as her own; their Lordships advised her Majesty to grant Commissions or Charters to all persons, bodies politic or corporate, who should make such acquisitions in the Indies, subject to such terms and conditions, as her Majesty should judge most expedient for the good of her Kingdoms." To which the Queen answered,

"That she would take all the care in it she could." But, in the course of the war, this advice was greatly neglected.

The business of the Session being all done, the Queen went in state to the House of Peers, and, having given the Royal assent to several public and private bills (1), dismissed both Houses with the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I cannot conclude this Session, without repeating my hearty thanks to you all, for your great care of the public, and the many marks

reading and examining several paragraphs and passages of which, it was resolved by their Lordships, That the said pamphlet was "a malicious, villainous libel, containing very many reflections on King Charles I. of ever blessed memory, and tending to the subversion of Monarchy," and thereupon ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. Then their Lordships took into consideration a printed sermon preached on the 30th of January, 1701, in King Henry VII's Chapel, before the Reverend Clergy of the Lower House of Convocation, by William Binckes, D. D. Proctor for the Diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, wherein the Preacher seemed to make the sin of the Jews, in crucifying our Saviour, much less than that of the English rebels, in putting to death King Charles I. As, says he, to the near resemblance between the parties concerned, as well the actors as the sufferers, comparing those in the text with those of the day. And here one would imagine, the latter were resolved to take St. Paul's expression in the most literal sense the words will bear, and crucify to themselves the Lord afresh, and in the nearest likeness, that could be, put him to an open shame. If, with respect to the dignity of the person, to have been King of the Jews, was what ought to have secured our Saviour from violence; here is also one, not only born to a Crown, but actually possessed of it. He was not only called King by some, and at the same time derided by others for being so called, but he was acknowledged by all to be a King: He was not just dressed up for an hour or two in purple robes, and saluted with a Hail King, but the usual ornaments of Majesty were his customary apparel; his subjects owned him to be their King; and yet they brought him before a tribunal, they judged him, they condemned him; and, that they might not be wanting in any thing to set him at naught, they spit upon him, and treated him with the utmost contempt. Our Saviour's declaring, that his Kingdom was not of this world, might look like a sort of renunciation of his temporal sovereignty, for the present desiring only to reign in the hearts of men. But here was nothing in this case before us: Here was indisputable right of Sovereignty, both by the laws of God and Man: He was the reigning Prince, and the Lord's Anointed; and yet, in despite of all law, both human and divine, he was by direct force of arms, and the most daring methods of a flagrant rebellion and violence, deprived at once of his Imperial Crown and Life. The fact of this day was such a vying with the first Arch-rebel, the apostate Angel, Lucifer; it was such a going beyond the old Serpent in his own way of insolence and pride, that it was no wonder, if he began to raise his head, and set up his dominion in this world, when, thus warned and invilened by a fiery zeal in some, and rage in others, to the degree of drunkenness, thirsting after, and satiating themselves in Royal blood; and, in which respect only, heated to the degree of phrenzy and madness, the plea in my text may seem to have some hold of them, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." After some debate the Lords resolved, "That in the said sermon there are several expressions, that N° 36. Vol. III.

"give just scandal and offence to all Christian people." Then, it being moved to order that sermon to be burnt, it was carried in the negative, but at the same time it was ordered, that the abovementioned resolution should be communicated to the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, Dr. Binckes's Ordinary, whom they left to censure him, according to the rules of ecclesiastical Courts.

Complaint was likewise made to the Lords, of two passages in a pamphlet, intitled, Reasons for addressing his Majesty to invite into England their Highnesses the Electress Dowager and the Electoral Prince of Hanover; and for attaining and abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales, and all others pretending any claim, right, or title from the late King James and Queen Mary, wherein it was asserted, "That it appears from History, that all free people have set aside the children of Tyrants for reasons of eternal and universal force, as inheriting the principles and designs of their parents, bearing an affection to their friends, and owing a revenge to their enemies; as more likely to grasp at a greater power than even their parents, the better to secure themselves from their disgrace, and being under extraordinary obligations to these foreign Potentates, who protected or restored them: And that, whether the Abjuration be penal or voluntary, it should be tendered to all manner of persons, not excepting the King's Majesty, or the Princesses of Denmark: For all the securities we give to them, said the Author, they owe their security to us; not that I doubt either of them, but they both of them very well know, what stories and surmises our enemies have been actually spreading to amuse and intimidate the people: They have whispered horrible things of blind and clancular bargains. But Caesar's wife ought to be unsuspected as well as innocent." After examination of this pamphlet, the Lords resolved, "That there were in it assertions and insinuations scandalous and dangerous, tending to alienate the affections of the subjects of this Kingdom from her Majesty, and to disturb the peace and quiet of the Kingdom."

(1) Among these bills were,

1. An Act to oblige the Jews to maintain and provide for their Protestant children. By which if any Jewish parent, in order to the compelling his Protestant child to change his Religion, shall refuse to allow such child a fitting maintenance suitable to the ability of the parent, and the age and education of the child, upon complaint it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor to make such order for the maintenance of such Protestant child as he shall think fit.

2. An Act for continuing the imprisonment of Counter and other Conspirators against King William.

3. An Act for the relief of Protestant Purchasers of the forfeited estates in Ireland.

4. An Act for enlarging the time for taking the oath of abjuration, in which was this clause:

"That if any person or persons, at any time after the first day of March, 1702, shall endeavour to deprive or hinder any person, who shall be the next in Succession to the Crown for the time being, according to the limitations in the Act, intitled, An Act

"marks you have given of your duty and affection to me.

"And I must thank you, Gentlemen of the Houle of Commons in particular, both for the supplies you have given to support me in this necessary war, and the provisions you have made for the debts contracted in the former. Your great justice, in making good those deficiencies, will be a lasting honour and credit to the Nation. I wish the difficulties, they have brought upon us, may be a warning to prevent such inconveniences for the future.

"I must recommend to you all, in your several counties, the preservation of the public peace, and a due execution of the laws. I shall always wish, that no differences of opinion among those, that are equally affected to my service, may be the occasion of heats and animosities among themselves. I shall be very careful to preserve and maintain the act of Toleration, and to set the minds of all my people at quiet. My own principles must always keep me intirely firm to the Interest and Religion of the Church of England, and will incline me to countenance those, who have the truest zeal to support it."

Then the Lord-Keeper, by her Majesty's command, prorogued the Parliament to the 7th of July following.

Naval preparations in England and Holland. Hist. of Europe, Vol. xiii.

The naval preparations in England and Holland were now carried on with all possible speed; and, as they raised the spirits of the Confederates, so they gave no small alarms to France, Spain, and even Portugal; the design of the expedition having been kept so secret, that it was uncertain, which of those three Kingdoms was most threatened. France, having sent a strong squadron of men of war into the West-Indies, both to attack the English plantations, and to bring home the Spanish galleons, had no sufficient number of ships left to defend her own coasts, much less to protect those of Spain, whose King, in the beginning of the spring, was gone into Italy, both to appease the tumults in the Kingdom of Naples, and to share with the Duke of Vendosme the expected honour of forcing Prince Eugene to repass the mountains of Tirol.

And though the King of Portugal gave fair words to the Imperial Ministers, and to Mr. Metuen, the English Envoy, yet he began to be apprehensive, that the Allies, having a formidable power at sea, would use more prevailing means than a negotiation to make him break his late engagements with France. On the 30th of May, Sir George Rooke, Admiral of the English fleet, having hoisted the Union flag on board the Royal Sovereign, came to Spithead, with Sir Cloudesly Shovel, on board the Queen, and the great ships, that lay at the Nore: And, at the same time, Rear-Admiral Fairborne arrived there from Ireland with a squadron of men of war, having on board four regiments of foot, that were to be part of the land-forces, to be commanded by the Duke of Ormond, who, on the first of June, arrived at Portsmouth, accompanied by Sir Henry Bellasis, who was to serve under him, and by Admiral Churchill; and, the next day, Prince George likewise set out for that sea-port.

The same day, the Queen went from St. James's to Windsor, having appointed Simon Harcourt, Esq; to be her Solicitor-General, and conferred the honour of Knighthood both upon him and on Edward Northey, Esq; the Attorney-General. The day before, out of a just regard to the law of Nations, the Queen, by proclamation, ordered all ships, stopped before the declaration of war, to be discharged, and caused another proclamation to be published for the encouragement of her ships of war and privateers. And at the same time her Majesty renewed the Commission for the management of the Customs; and upon her return from Windsor, appointed the Lord-Lieutenants, the Commissioners of trade, for prizes, stamp and salt-duties, and Generals of her land-forces; gave audience to several foreign Ministers, and disposed of many places and employments; and, among the rest, the Earl of Marlborough was made Master of the Ordnance, the Honourable John Granville, Lieutenant-General, William Bridges Master Surveyor, Christopher Musgrave Clerk of the same, and Edward Southwell was appointed Secretary of State in Ireland, on the resignation of his father Sir Robert Southwell.

The affairs of Scotland began now to be a little embroiled. By an act made soon after the Revolution, it was provided, that all Princes, succeeding to the Crown, should take the Coronation-oath before they entered upon their Regal dignity; but no direction was given concerning those, who should tender it, or the manner in which it should be taken; so that, this being left undetermined, the Queen had called together all the late King's Ministers for that Kingdom, and, in the presence of about twelve of them, she took the Coronation-oath (1). But those, who were disposed to censure every thing, said, that

"for declaring the rights and liberties of the subjects, and settling the Succession of the Crown; and according to one other Act, intitled, An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subjects, from succeeding after the decease of her Majesty to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging, according to the limitations in the beforementioned Acts; that is to say, such issue of her Majesty's body, as shall from time to time be next in Succession to the Crown, if it shall please God Almighty to bless her Majesty with issue; and, during the time her Majesty shall have no issue, the Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, and, after the decease of the said Princess Sophia, the next in Succession to the Crown for the time being, according to the limitation of the said Acts; and the same, maliciously, advisedly, and directly, shall attempt by any overt-act or deed; every such offence shall be adjudged High-treason, and the offender or offenders therein, their assessors, procurers, and comforters, knowing the said offence to be done, being thereof convicted or attainted, according to the laws and statutes of this Realm, shall be deemed and adjudged Traytors, and shall suffer pains of death, and all losses and forfeitures as in cases of High-treason."

(1) Of this the Queen sent an account in a letter to the Privy-Council of Scotland, as soon as she was proclaimed, acquainting them, "That it having pleased Almighty God to call out of this life her Royal and most Dearly-beloved Brother King William, whereby the undoubted right to the Imperial Crown of the Kingdom of Scotland, conform to the Act of Settlement, Affairs of Scotland. Burnet. Lockhart's Memoirs.

"men,

1702. that this ought not to be done, except in the presence of some deputed for that purpose, either by the Parliament, or at least by the Privy-Council of that Kingdom.

At the time of King William's decease, the Government there was lodged in the hands of persons intirely of Revolution principles; for the Earl of Marbmont was Lord Chancellor; the Earl of Melvil Lord President of the Council; the Duke of Queensberry Lord Privy-Seal; the Earls of Seafeld and Hyndford Secretaries of State; the Earl of Selkirk Lord Register; Adam Cockburn of Ormiston Treasurer-Depute; Sir John Maxwell of Pollock Justice-Clerk; Sir James Stuart Advocate; and all the Lords of the Treasury, except the Lord Montgomery, were of the same principles. But though the Anti-Revolutioners were, in effect, as much enemies to the Queen's right to the Crown, as to that of King William; yet they were greatly elated at her Accession, and flattered themselves with a better title to her favour, on account of their zeal for Episcopacy, than the Revolutioners could pretend to, because most part of the latter were for Presbytery, and the rest so indifferent for Episcopacy, that they did not think it ought to come in competition with the peace of the Nation. The first struggle between these two parties was about the Parliament, the sitting of which, in the summer, was absolutely necessary, by reason that the funds allotted to support the army were near expired on King William's demise. Upon the discovery of the assassination-plot, an act had passed in Scotland for continuing the Parliament, that should be then in being six months after the death of the King, with two special clauses in it. The first was, that it should meet twenty days after the death of the King. But the Queen did, by several adjournments, continue the Parliament almost three months after the King's death, before it was opened. Some said, that the Parliament was by this dissolved, since it did not meet upon the day limited by the act to continue it. But there was another proviso in the act, that secured to the Crown the full prerogative of adjourning or dissolving it within that time. Yet, in opposition to this, it was acknowledged, that, as to all subsequent days of meeting, the prerogative was intire; but the day that was limited, that is, the twenty-first after the King's death, seemed to be fixed for the first opening of the Session. The second clause was a limitation of the power of the Parliament, during their sitting, that it should not extend to the repealing of laws: They were empowered only to maintain the Protestant Religion, and the public peace of the country. It was therefore said, that the Queen was peaceably obeyed, and the country now in full quiet; so that there was no need of assembling the Parliament. The end of the law being attained, it was said, the law fell of itself, and therefore it was necessary to call a new Parliament; for the old one, if assembled, could have no authority, but to see to the preservation of Religion, and the peace of the Country; their power being limited to these two heads by the act, that authorized their sitting. In opposition to this, it was urged, that the act, which gave them authority to sit as a Parliament for six months, gave them the full authority of a Parliament: That the directing them, to take care of some more important matters, did not hinder their meddling with other matters, since no Parliament can limit a subsequent one. It was likewise said, that, since the Queen was now engaged in a war, the publick peace could not be secured without such a force, and such taxes to maintain it, as the present state of affairs required. The Duke of Queensberry, and his party were for continuing the Parliament. But the Duke of Hamilton, and the others, who had opposed that Duke in the last Parliament, complained highly of this way of proceeding. They said, that they could not acknowledge this to be a legal Parliament, nor submit to it, but must protest against it.

This was ominous; a Reign was to be begun with a Parliament liable to a dispute; and from such a breach it was easy to foresee a train of mischief likely to follow. The Duke of Hamilton, the Marquis of Tweeddale, the Earl of Marefibal, the Earl of Rothes, and a great many of the Nobility and Gentry went up to London, and represented to the Queen, and those in favour with her, their exceptions to all that was intended to be done. Every thing, which they said, was heard calmly; but the Queen was a stranger to their laws, and could not take it upon her to judge of them; and therefore it was determined by the advice of the Privy-Council of that Kingdom. The Lords, who came up to oppose the Duke of Queensberry, continued to press for a new Parliament, in which they promised to give the Queen all that she could ask of them, and to consent to an Act of Indemnity for all that was passed in the former Reign. But it was thought, that the Nation was in too great a ferment to venture upon that; and some more time was necessary to prepare matters, as well as men's minds, before a new Parliament should be summoned. Both parties returned to Scotland, and, both being sensible, that the Presbyterian interest would with its weight turn that scale, into which it should fall, great pains were taken by both sides to gain that party. On the one hand, they were made to apprehend what a madness it would be for them to provoke the Queen in the beginning of her Reign, who might be enough disposed to entertain prejudices against them; which would be much heightened, if in a point, in which Conscience could not be pretended, they

"ment, was devolved upon her: And having (according to the petition of right and grievances) taken and signed the Coronation-oath, in presence of several of her Privy-Council; she thought fit to authorize them to continue to meet, and act as her Privy-Council of that her ancient Kingdom, until she should send them a new Commission for that effect. Moreover, her Majesty authorized and required them to publish an inclosed proclamation, ordaining all Officers of State, Counsellors, Magi-

"strates, and all other Officers, civil and military, to act in all things, conform to the Commissions and Instructions they had from his late Majesty, until new Commissions could be prepared and sent down. And her Majesty on this occasion, at her first Accession to the Crown, gave them, and all her good people, full assurance of her firm resolution, during the whole course of her Reign, to protect them in their Religion, Laws, and Liberties, and in the established Government of the Church."

they should engage in a faction against her, especially when they could not say, that any cause of jealousy was given; but, on the contrary, the Queen had, in all her public letters, promised to maintain Presbytery; and, though that had given great offence in the late King's time, when those public letters were printed, yet now this passed without censure. The other party was as busy to inflame them. They told them the Queen was certainly in her heart against them: All those, who were now in her confidence, and particularly the Earls of Rochester and Nottingham, were enemies to the Presbyterian Government. Good words were now given them, in order to separate them from a national interest, knowing well, that, if they went off from that, and so lost the hearts of the Nation, they would lose that in which their chief strength lay: The party, that now governed, as soon as they should have carried the present point by their help, and rendered them odious by their concurrence in it, would strengthen themselves at Court by entering into the Episcopal interest, and trying to introduce Episcopacy into Scotland; which would soon be brought about, if the Presbyterians should once lose their popularity. Those were the methods and reasonings that were used on both sides.

A session of Parliament in Scotland.
Lockhart's
Hist. of Europe,
Vol. vii.
Burnet.

The Parliament met at Edinburgh, according to the Queen's last adjournment, on the 9th of June, the Duke of Queenberry being appointed High-Commissioner. At the opening of it, Duke Hamilton demanded to be heard; and, though desired by the Lord Chancellor to sit still, till the Queen's Commission was read, and the House constituted, yet he persisted, and said, both in his own name, and in behalf of the other Members, who adhered to him, "That they were all heartily glad at her Majesty's happy Accession to the Throne of that Kingdom, not merely on the account that it was her undoubted right by descent, but likewise because of the many personal virtues and Royal qualities her Majesty was endowed with, which gave them grounds to hope, that they should enjoy, under her auspicious Reign, all the blessings, that could attend a Nation, which had a gracious and loving Sovereign united with a dutiful and obedient People. That they were resolved to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in defence of her Majesty's right against all her enemies whatever, and had all the deference and respect for her Majesty's Government and Authority, that was due from loyal Subjects to their rightful and lawful Sovereigns. But, that at the same time, that they acknowledged their submission to her Majesty's authority, they thought themselves bound in duty, by virtue of the obedience they owe to the standing laws of the Nation, and because of the regard they ought to have for the rights and liberties of their fellow-subjects, to declare their opinion as to the legality of this meeting. That they did not think themselves warranted by law to sit and act any longer as a Parliament; and that, by so doing, they should incur the hazard of losing their lives and fortunes, if their proceedings should come to be questioned by subsequent Parliaments." He then read a paper, which contained the reasons of their dissenting from the proceedings of the other Members, who thought themselves impowered to sit and act as a Parliament, and was as follows: "Forasmuch as, by the fundamental laws and constitution of this Kingdom, all Parliaments do dissolve by the death of the King or Queen, except in so far as innovated by the 17th act of the 6th session of King William's Parliament last in being, at his decease to meet and act what should be needful for the defence of the true Protestant Religion, as now by law established, and maintaining the Succession to the Crown, as settled by the claim of right, and for preserving and securing the peace and safety of the Kingdom; and, seeing that the said ends are fully satisfied by her Majesty's Succession to the Throne, whereby the Religion and Peace of the Kingdom are secured, we conceive ourselves not now warranted by the law to meet, sit, or act, and therefore do dissent from any thing, that shall be done or acted." Then the Duke and seventy-nine of the Members, having taken instruments, withdrew out of the House, and left the others, who were an hundred and twelve, to sit and act by themselves; and, as they all passed from the Parliament-House to the Cross-Keys-Tavern near the Cross, they were applauded by the loud acclamations of an infinite number of people of all ranks and degrees.

Notwithstanding the secession of so many Members, the Duke of Queenberry's Commission to be High-Commissioner was read, as was also the Queen's letter to the Parliament, dated May the 15th, declaring, in the first place, the reason of this meeting, and her Majesty's firm resolution to maintain and protect her subjects in the full possession of their Religion, Laws, and Liberties, and of the Presbyterian Government of the Church. Then acquainting them with "the just causes of declaring war against the French King, and earnestly recommending to them, both the providing competent supplies for maintaining such a number of forces, as might be necessary for disappointing the enemy's designs, and preserving the present happy settlement: And the consideration of an Union between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, which was recommended by them to the late King." The several points of this letter were enforced by the speeches of the Duke of Queenberry, and of the Earl of Marchmont; and, the Parliament being met again on the 11th of June, they proceeded to appoint Committees for security of the Kingdom, for controverted elections, for drawing up an answer to her Majesty's letter, and for revising the minutes. Then overtures were read for the following acts, viz. An act recognizing her Majesty's Royal authority (1): An act for adjourning the Court

(1) In this act, besides the oath of Allegiance, was this of Assurance:

I A. B. do, in the sincerity of my heart, assert, acknowledge, and declare, that her Majesty Queen ANNE is the only lawful, undoubted Sovereign of this Realm, as well de Jure, that is, of Right, as de Facto, that is, in the possession and exercise of the Government. And there-1702. Court of Judicature, called the Session: An act, declaring this present meeting of Parliament to be a lawful and free meeting of Parliament, and discharging any person to disown, quarrel, or impugn the dignity and authority thereof, under the penalty of High-Treason: And an act for securing the true Protestant Religion and Presbyterian Church Government: Which were read the first time, and the next day passed, and touched with the scepter. Six days after the Parliament's answer to the Queen's letter was read and approved, being conformable to all her Majesty's desires, and assuring her, that groundless secession of some of their members should increase and strengthen their care and zeal for her Majesty's service.

On the other hand, the dissenting Members, of whom Duke Hamilton was the chief, having prepared an address to the Queen, to justify their proceedings, and sent up the same by the Lord Blantyre, the Queen positively refused to receive it, though she was pleased to allow his Lordship's access to her. Having well weighed this affair, she resolved to adhere to the Parliament convened by her authority, and in a letter to them, dated at St. James's, June 17, and read to the House on the 23d, resolved to own and maintain this present Session of Parliament, and the dignity and authority of the same, and of her High-Commissioner, against all opposers. In the mean time, the Parliament proceeded, and, on the 19th of June, an act for a supply of ten months cess upon all land-rents received the Royal assent; but, when this tax came afterwards to be levied, near one half of the Scots Nation refused to pay the same; so that, in many places, the Government was obliged to use forcible methods to raise it. It is also remarkable, that some days before Sir Alexander Bruce was expelled the House, on account of a speech made on the 11th of June, wherein, among other things, he affirmed, that "Presbytery was inconsistent with Monarchy; that it maintained a constant opposition to the rightful Sovereign; and, like vice and hypocrisy, and the other pests of mankind, it spread and flourished most in turbulent times of anarchy and rebellion; and that he did not wonder, that their predecessors, in cold blood, and taught by woful experience, preferred order and decency, in the House of God, to the pride and infallibility of a Pope in every parish." And, the Dean and Faculty of Advocates having passed a vote among themselves in favour of the protestation and address of the dissenting Members, declaring, that they were founded upon, and in the terms of the laws of this Kingdom, they were upon that account, charged and prosecuted by the Lord Advocate before the Parliament, where, after long debates upon the matter, they were severely reprimanded; but the Nation was enraged to see that society attacked, for declaring their opinion in a point of law, relating to the foundation and constitution of Parliament, and consequently the liberty and right of the Subject.

On the 25th of June, the Royal assent was given to an act, for enabling her Majesty to appoint Commissioners for an Union between the two Kingdoms; though some Members dissented from it, because they could not get a clause inserted in it about the Presbyterian Church-Government.

The Succession to the Crown having been settled in England by two acts of Parliament on the House of Hanover, after her Majesty and her issue, in the Protestant line, and nothing of this nature having been done in Scotland, the Earl of Marchmont thought it proper to propose it at this time, and, contrary to the advice of his friends, and even the commands of the High-Commissioner, presented an act for abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales. But, tho' such as continued in the House were unanimous enough in other points, yet they could not agree in this (1); and, the party, who opposed the settling of the Succession at this time (which they alledged would be an obstacle rather than an encouragement to the designed Union) attempting to admit the dissenting Members into the House to their assistance, the High-Commissioner, fearing the ill consequences of this procedure, thought fit, on the 30th of June, to adjourn the Parliament to the 18th of August, having returned them thanks for their cheerfulness and unanimity in their proceedings. And, as soon as the Parliament was adjourned, the leading men of the different parties hastened to London, to make their several Representations of things to the Queen and her Ministers.

The Queen, pursuant to the power given her by acts of Parliament of both Kingdoms, appointed Commissioners for treating about an Union between England and Scotland (2). The fore I do sincerely and faithfully promise and engage, that I will with heart and hand, maintain and defend her Majesty's Title and Government, against the pretended Prince of Wales, and his adherents, and all other enemies, who, either by open or secret attempts, shall disturb or disquiet her Majesty in the possession and exercise thereof.

(1) Mr. Lockhart, in his Memoirs, page 16, tells us, "That it may be thought strange, that this act did not pass currently in such a strangely made up meeting, and when such eminently famous and zealous Revolutioners were at the helm of affairs, and acted without any to controul them. And I presume the reasons were: First, The Commissioners had no instructions concerning it. Secondly, The Uncertainty how affairs would go in England. The Queen was but newly come to the Crown, and not well fixed in the Throne; and they foresaw they might expect little thanks, if the afterwards should favour the interest of the distressed Royal Family. And I have reason to believe, that the Queen and

No. 36. Vol. III.

"her English Ministry were then inclined to keep the Succession in Scotland open, as a check and awaband upon the Whigs and Family of Hanover. And, lastly (as they pretended afterwards in England) that Parliament's title to act was controverted, and had so little authority in the Nation, as it was not fit to venture upon it, there being reason to believe few would have complied with it, and every body almost been highly disgusted. For these and the like reasons, it is possible, I say, the Commissioners and other Courtiers resolved to wave entering upon the matter."

1702. Commissioners met, for the first time, on the 22d of October, at the Cock-pit, where, after reading both Commissions, Lord-Keeper Wright made a short speech on the occasion of their meeting, and was answered by the Duke of Queensberry.

As there was not a Quorum of the Scots Commissioners arrived in town, their meeting was adjourned by a letter from the Queen to the 10th of November; but, about the 20th of the same month, they met again; and, notwithstanding some previous objections made by the Lord-Keeper to the validity of the Scots Commission, they fully adjusted the preliminaries, of which this was one of the most considerable, "That nothing agreed on amongst themselves should be binding, except it be ratified by her Majesty, and the respective Parliaments of both Nations; and that, except all the heads proposed for the treaty were agreed to, no particular thing agreed on should be binding." The Lord-Keeper then proposed on the part of the English, "That the two Kingdoms should be inseparably united into one Monarchy under her Majesty and her heirs and successors, and under the same limitations, according to the acts of Settlement." And the Duke of Queensberry proposed on the part of the Scots, "That both Nations should be united in one Monarchy, and one Parliament, with a mutual communication of trade and privileges." The proposal of the English was readily agreed to; and the Queen, to quicken matters, came, on the 14th of December, and made a speech to them. The Scots Commissioners had given in six proposals, on which some considerations, as a subject-matter of debate, were delivered by the English Commissioners (1). But, when the Scots Commissioners gave in their proposals for preserving the rights and privileges of their Company trading to Africa and the Indies, such difficulties arose, as put a stop to all farther progress, and nothing more was done upon this Commission, which was annulled by the new Scottish Parliament called by the Queen, as will hereafter be seen.

Affairs of Ireland.

Ireland was now put under Lords Justices, named by the Earl of Rochester. The Earl of Mount-Alexander, Major-General Erle, and Thomas Knibbly, were appointed Lords Justices, in the room of the Archbishop of Dublin and the Earl of Drogheda, whom the Lord Rochester had left in the Government of that Kingdom. Mean time, the Trustees for the forfeited estates continued still in their former authority.

While affairs were in this situation at home, the first step that was made beyond sea, was by the House of Hanover. It had been concerted with the late King before his sickness, and was set on foot the week he died. The design was well laid, and the execution managed with great secrecy. The old Duke of Zell, and his nephew the Elector of Brunswick, marched in person with an army, that was rather inferior in strength to that of the Duke of Wolfenbuttle. They entered their country, while their troops were dispersed in their quarters. They surprized some regiments of horse, and invested both Wolfenbuttle and Brunswick at once, and cut off all communication between them. Having them at this disadvantage, they required them to concur in the common Councils of the Empire; to furnish their quota for its defence, and to keep up no more troops than were consistent with the safety of their neighbours. For it was well known, that the greatest part of their men were subsisted with French pay, and that they had engaged themselves to declare for France, as soon as it should be required. Duke Rudolph, the elder Brother, was a learned and pious Prince; but, as he was never married, so he had transferred the Government to the care of his Brother Duke Anthony, who was of a temper very different from his Brother's. He could not bear the advancement of the House of Hanover, and therefore, in opposition to them, entered into the interests of France. But, being thus surprized, he went away in discontent, and his Brother broke through all those measures, in which he had involved himself. In conjunction with Duke Anthony, the Duke of Saxe-Gotha had entered into the same engagements with France, but was now forced to fall into the common interests of the Empire.

(1) The substance of the six proposals given in by the Scots Commissioners was as follows: 1. That there should be a free trade betwixt the two Kingdoms without distinction. 2. That both should be liable to an equal imposition for export and import; and that a book of rates should be adjusted for both. 3. That the Subjects and shipping of both Kingdoms have an equal freedom as to the Plantation-trade, and be under the same regulation. 4. That the act of navigation, and all others in both Kingdoms, inconsistent with the said proposals, be repealed. 5. That neither of the Kingdoms be burthened with the debts contracted by the other before the Union; and that the equality of imposition in the second proposal be understood with an exception of the impositions laid on and appropriated by the Parliament of England for payment of their debts; or, if an equality of imposition on trade be thought necessary, that there be allowed to Scotland an equivalent. 6. That the former proposals were made without prejudice to the companies or manufactures of either Kingdom, which are referred to the further consideration and progress of this treaty. The considerations on these proposals delivered by English Commissioners were these: As to the first article, the Lord Commissioners for England agreed, That there should be "a free trade for the native commodities"

The war
in Poland.
Ibid.

Thus all the North of Germany was united, and ready to declare against France: Only the war of Poland was so near them, that they were obliged to continue armed, and see the issue of that war. The King of Sweden was engaged in it, with such a determined opposition to King Augustus, that there was no hope of treating a peace, though it was endeavoured both by England and the States-General. His Swedish Majesty seemed to have accustom'd himself to fatigue and danger; so that he grew to love both; and though the Muscovites had fallen upon the frontiers of Sweden, where they had gained some advantages; yet even that could not divert him from carrying on the war in Poland. A dyet was summoned in that Kingdom, but it broke up in confusion, without coming to any conclusion; only they sent Ambassadors to the King of Sweden to treat of a peace. The King of Prussia was very apprehensive of the consequences of this war, which was now in the neighbourhood of Prussia; and the King of Sweden threatened to invade Saxony with the troops, that he had in Pomerania, which could not be done but through his territories. The King of Sweden delayed giving audience to the Ambassadors of Poland, and marched on to Warsaw; upon which the King of Poland retired to Cracow, and summoned those Palatines, who adhered to him, to attend him. When the King of Sweden came to Warsaw, he sent to the Cardinal Primate to summon a dyet for choosing a new King; which was going further than the resentments of the Poles yet carried them. But the progress of this affair will appear in its proper place.

A treaty with the House of Bavaria.
Burnet.

All Germany was now united, except the two Brothers of Bavaria. The Court of Vienna entered into several negotiations with the Elector of Bavaria, but without any effect; for that Elector seemed only to hearken to their propositions, that he might make the better terms with France. The Elector of Cologne put Liege, and all the places he had on the Rhine, into the hands of the French, except Bonne; which, it was said, he kept with the view of being able to make peace with the Emperor, by putting that in his possession, though he was prevailed on afterwards to deliver that likewise to the French. In this conduct the Elector acted against the advice of all his Council; and, as the Dean of Liege was making some opposition to him, he was seized on, and carried away prisoner in a barbarous manner. The Elector, to excuse his admitting the French into his country, pretended, that he only desired the assistance of some of the troops of the Circle of Burgundy, to secure his dominions; for, as France was not ashamed of the slightest pretences, so she taught her Allies to make excuses unbecoming the dignity of Princes.

Thus the Confederates seemed to begin the war against France under many and great disadvantages: Besides, that the Electors of Bavaria and Cologne had declared for France, and the Elector of Saxony King of Poland, on account of his war with Sweden, was hindered from sending his full proportion of troops, a Prince of the House of Bourbon was now on the Throne of Spain (which had formerly acted in concert with England and Holland) a French army had over-run the State of Milan; and, to this army, the Duke of Savoy (engaged to France by the double marriage of his two daughters) had joined his forces. The Emperor had sent his veteran troops under the command of Prince Eugene, to keep the French at a bay in Italy; and all the Spanish towns on the frontiers of Holland were garrisoned by French soldiers. But notwithstanding all these visible disadvantages, by the wife and steady counsels of England, the prudent management of the public Treasury, the just measures concerted by the Earl of Marlborough with foreign powers, the bravery and resolution of the Confederate troops, and the experience and good conduct of their Commanders, it was soon concluded by all, who were judges of such matters, that the Allies would, in the end, prove an over match for France.

Negotiations were still carried on in several Courts. Mr. Melbuen was sent to try the Court of Portugal; and he quickly returned with full assurances of a neutrality and a freedom of trade in the ports of that Kingdom; and, as insinuations were given of a disposition to go further upon a better prospect and better terms, he was immediately sent back to urge that matter as far as it would go. The Pope pretended he would keep the neutrality of a common Father, but his partiality to the French appeared on many occasions; yet the Court of Vienna had that veneration for the Holy See, that they contented themselves with expostulating, without carrying their resentments farther. "dities of the growth, product, and manufacture of both, with an exception as to wool and sheep-fells, and with equal duties on home-consumptions respectively; and that the masters, mariners, and goods of Scotland be under the same penalties as those of England." To the second they desired there might be added, "That the same imposition and prohibition should be the same in both as to the import and export." To the third their Lordships said, "That the Plantation-trade was the property of England, and of such consequence as not to be communicated, till the other particulars, which should be thought necessary to the Union, were adjusted; and that in this article there should be provision made, that Scots-men be liable to be pressed in time of war for her Majesty's service." To the fourth they agreed, "That the act of navigation be accommodated to the Union." To the fifth, they thought it contradicted what was agreed in the second; and said, "There was no duty on trade, except

"some of the funds of the civil Government, but what was appropriated to pay private debts; and though those debts were contracted by a long war, entered into more particularly for the preservation of England and the dominions thereto belonging; yet Scotland had tasted the benefit of the preservation of the opposition made to the growth and power of France; and that Scotland would be abundantly compensated for that burden by a complete Union, which could not be established with equality, unless there were the same duty in both Kingdoms on Foreign and Home-consumption: But how the money arising from thence in Scotland should be applied, or what equivalent should be allowed the Scots for it, might be settled, when their Lordships came to propose what proportion Scotland should bear of the public burden for the support of the Government in peace and war. For the sixth proposal, they desired it might be further explained." Hist. of Europe, vii. 461.

The siege of Keyserwaert.
Hist. of Europe,
Vol. vii.
Burnet
Broderick.

The first step of the war was to be made in the name of the Elector Palatine in the siege of Keyserwaert (1), which had been put into the hands of the French by the Elector of Cologne, and which, whilst in their hands, exposed both the Circle of Westphalia and the Dominions of the States; for their places on the Wall, being in no good condition, lay open to the excursions of that garrison. The trenches had been opened before this town on the 18th of April; and the care of the siege committed to the Prince of Nassau Saarlbrugh (declared the Emperor's Marshall de Camp) under whom the Dutch served as Auxiliaries to the Emperor, the States not having declared war against France. Another army of the Dutch was formed under the Earl of Aiblone, and lay in the Duchy of Cleve to cover the siege; and a third commanded by General Coborn broke into Flanders, forced and demolished the lines between the two forts of St. Donat and Isabella, which the enemy had been many months raising with great labour and expence, and laid the greatest part of the Châtelanie of Bruges under contribution. However, after these successes, upon the approach of the Marquis de Bedmar and the Count de la Motte with the French troops under their command, which were superior in number to him, Coborn was forced to retire under the walls of Sluys; but, to prevent the enemy's taking fort Donat, he first laid the country under water, and forced the Spaniards to retire towards Ghent.

Motions of
army.

Marshall de Boufflers, having drawn his troops together, and laid up great magazines in Ruremond and Venlo, passed the Maeſe with his whole army, and, the Duke of Burgundy coming post from Paris to command it, the States were apprehensive, that so great a Prince would, at his first appearance, undertake something worthy of himself, and, believing the design might be upon Maestricht, threw twelve thousand men into that place.

The sending away so large a detachment, the auxiliary troops from Germany not coming so soon as expected, and contrary winds having stopped a great part of our army, were the occasions, that the Earl of Aiblone was not strong enough to enter into action with the Marshall de Boufflers. He encamped therefore at Clarenbeck, between Nimeguen and Cleve, to watch his motions; and, while Boufflers lay at Zanſen near Cleve, the Earl, having detached Major-General Dampre with a thousand horse towards the enemy, he happened to meet a party of about six hundred French horse, whom he attacked and totally defeated, killing two hundred on the spot, and taking as many prisoners, with the loss only of about thirty troops and dragoons.

The siege of Keyserwaert went on but slowly. The trenches had been opened on the 18th of April with little loss; and on the 20th, the besiegers did great execution by the bombs, which they threw into the town. But the enemy made a vigorous sally, with design to ruin the works of the besiegers. The Dutch repulsed them twice with great bravery; but, not being succoured in time, and being inferior to the enemy, they were forced to quit their post, and make a retreating fight, till at length, the cavalry, designed for their relief, coming up, the enemy were, in their turn, constrained to retire with great precipitation. On the 21st and 22d the enemy made two sallies more, but with much the same success, and in the latter were pursued to the counterſcarp, leaving a great number of dead and wounded men upon the spot; and at the same time the Brigadier, who commanded them, was taken prisoner. On the 23d, in the morning, twelve hundred Prussians attacked an Island in the Rhine about six hundred paces broad, a little below the town, in which two hundred French were posted, who had built several works and fortifications, and had two several batteries there. Upon the approach of our men, they fired very briskly; but the Prince of Anbault Desſaus, who commanded, managed the affair with that prudence and valour, that the French, after a whole day's resistance, being summoned to yield, or run the hazard of being put to the sword, mutinied against their Officers, and, throwing down their arms, surrendered at discretion. The Commander in chief was so enraged at this, that he laid violent hands upon himself; and the rest of the Officers, attempting to make their escape in a little boat, were all killed, except a Captain and a Lieutenant. The next day, April 24, the besiegers carried their trenches within two hundred paces of the town, and had four batteries continually firing, with which they had made considerable breaches in the rampart, so that they intended to make an attack upon the counterſcarp; for which purpose a good number of fascines and wool-packs were prepared, it being thought, that by those proceedings the town would soon surrender. However, the Confederates were very much mistaken in their calculation; for, though they proposed at first to be masters of that place in three weeks, they found it held out near two months, and had like to have proved a bad beginning of a new war. For Count Tallard, having posted himself with his flying camp, on the other side of the Rhine, fired from thence with so much success, that the besiegers, notwithstanding their intrenchments, were very much incommoded, and had, besides, the mortification to see the besieged succoured from that camp with troops, ammunition, and all necessary

(1) Keyserwaert is a town below Dusseldorp, on the Rhine, mean, but well fortified; and did belong to the Elector of Cologne. It had a broad ditch, very regular fortifications, and high walls faced with brick: As also the counterſcarp, which was in a very good condition. It is seated on the North of the Rhine, six German miles between Cologne to the North-West, and the same distance from Gulick (or Juliers) to the North. The French possessed themselves of it for Cardinal Furstemburg in 1688, but the late Elector of Brandenburg retook it in the year 1689, and delivered it to the Elector of Cologne, who in 1701 received a French garrison into it, which continued there till it was taken by the army of the Allies. It is now subject to the Duke of Neuburg.

However, all this while, the Besiegers cannonaded the town, and battered the outward fortifications with forty-eight great guns, and thirty mortars; so that it was almost reduced to ashes, when they resolved to make a general attack on the counterscarp and ravelin. This they executed with unparalleled bravery. The conflict was obstinate and bloody, for nothing was to be seen for two hours, but flame and smoke: But at length the Besieged were constrained to give ground, and leave the Besiegers masters both of the ravelin and the counterscarp, upon which they immediately lodged themselves. The Prince of Nassau Saarburch performed prodigies of valour, giving his orders with great contempt of the danger and admirable presence of mind; and all the other Officers and Soldiers behaved themselves in this action beyond expectation. This advantage, however, cost the Confederates very dear (1); for they had six hundred and eighty men killed, and one thousand nine hundred and two wounded in the action; but it likewise so much weakened the garrison, that they were forced to capitulate, and obtained honourable terms. The fortifications were razed according to agreement.

Jan. 15.

Upon the taking of the counterscarp, Count Tallard, finding that he could be of no farther service to the besieged, joined the grand army under the command of the Duke of Burgundy, which, by the calling in of all their other detachments, and particularly of the French King's household-troops, became greatly superior to that of the Confederates under the Earl of Athlone; and they were so sensible of it, that they resolved to put in execution, without delay, the following design, of which they had for some time before boasted.

An attempt upon Nime-guen.
Broderick.
Burnet.

On the 10th of June, N. S. the Marshal de Boufflers decamped from Zanten, and directed his march, without sound of trumpet or beat of drum, through the plains of Goch towards Mooken-Hyde close by Nimeguen, with a view to get between the Confederate army and that city, and so to cut them off from their provisions, ammunition, and forage. Upon this the Earl of Athlone, having early information of the enemy's motion, and discovering their design, called a Council of General Officers, wherein it was unanimously resolved, that the Confederates should begin their march that evening. The baggage was accordingly sent to Nimeguen, and, after several marches and regulations, the Earl about break of day received particular intelligence of the strength of the enemy, and caused the cavalry to be drawn up in order of battle to cover the march of the infantry. About eleven in the morning, the French horse advanced in great numbers, with the household-troops at the head, and pressed upon the Earl, who behaved himself with great resolution. However, as the Confederate squadrons were wheeling, the French troops pushed them upon the foot, and put two or three battalions into confusion; but, by the conduct of the General Officers, the enemy was soon repulsed. On the other side there happened an encounter between some of the squadrons of the French King's household, some Danish squadrons, and some of the Earl of Athlone's carabineers, who so remarkably distinguished themselves upon this occasion, that the French were repulsed, though with considerable loss on both sides. By this time, the Confederates were got under the cannon of Nimeguen, which, soon after, began to play upon the enemy, and the Burghers signalized themselves on this occasion in an extraordinary manner; for, though they had not a Gunner in the town, they managed their artillery with great success. The English, who had the honour to close the retreat, maintained their post in excellent order, being assisted by the Prince of Wurtemberg, who put a stop to the household-troops, which were advanced very near them, and preparing to charge them towards the end of their march. Twenty battalions of foot were posted in the outworks of Nimeguen, and the whole army was under arms all that night, as was the enemy likewise. The next morning, a great body of French horse and foot advanced towards the Allies, as if they intended to attack them; but this they did only to cover the march of their own army, which filed off towards Cleve, venting their rage at their disappointment upon the defenceless Country, which they rifled and laid waste, destroying the park of Cleve, and all the delicious walks and avenues of that charming place. Thus was Marshal Boufflers disappointed in his design upon Nimeguen, which, if taken, must have been followed with very fatal consequences, for the French would have penetrated into the very heart of the United-Provinces: It was but indifferently provided for an attack, and the scheme was well laid against it, and wanted but little of being punctually executed, the enemy missing but half an hour of arriving in the outworks before the Confederates. The Earl of Athlone's conduct on this occasion raised his credit, as much as it sunk Marshal Boufflers, who, though he had a superior army, animated by the presence of so great a Prince as the Duke of Burgundy, was able to do nothing, but was unsuccessful in every thing that he designed; and his parties, that at any time were engaged with those of the Earl, were defeated in almost every action.

The unsuccessful attempt upon Nimeguen, and the reduction of Keyserwaert, were not the only mortifications, which the French suffered; for, their army in Germany being but weak, and drawing together but slowly under the command of Marshal de Catinat, the Germans had an opportunity of laying siege to Landau (2). This strong and important place was invested

(1) Father Daniel, in his Historical Journal of the Reign of Lewis XIV. asserts that this place cost the Allies more men than they would have lost in a pitched battle, to the number of seven or eight thousand.

of the Rhine; once Imperial, but yielded to the French by the treaty of Munster. This Town was the great Magazine, where the French, after they had plundered most of the Towns of the Palatinate in 1688, laid up the booty, all which was burnt by an accidental fire in May 1689. It was now taken from the French by 1702. on the 16th of June, N. S. by Prince Lewis of Baden, who spent the rest of the month in raising batteries, and making his approaches; and, on the 27th of July, the King of the Romans arrived in the Confederate camp, in order to have the honour of taking the city: His train was so large, and his equipage so splendid, that the expense of it put all the Emperor's affairs in great disorder; the most necessary things being neglected, while a needless piece of pomp consumed so great a part of their treasure. The siege was stopped for some weeks for want of ammunition; but at last the citadel was taken by storm on the 9th of September, and, on the 12th, the City surrendered.

The Earl of Marlborough sets out to command the army. Burnett. Frederick.

This was the state of the campaign, before the Earl of Marlborough left England, from whence he set out on the 12th of May, and, upon his arrival at the Hague, having the character of Ambassador as well as Captain-General, he had several Conferences with the States, in which he gave them all possible assurances of the Queen's affection and resolution to support them in all emergencies. The Earl of Aiblone was set on by the other Dutch Generals, to insist on his quality of Velt-Marshall, and to have the command with the Earl of Marlborough by turns. But, though he was now in high reputation by his late conduct, the States obliged him to yield this point to the Earl of Marlborough, whom they declared Generalissimo of all their forces, and sent orders to all their Generals and other Officers to obey him. The Earl, on his part, made so modest and becoming a use of the power put into his hands, as soon gained him the hearts of all the General Officers under him; and, to the Earl of Aiblone in particular, he behaved in so obliging a manner, that the command seemed to be equal between them.

The army drawn together.

All things being now regulated with the Deputies of the States, the Earl left the Hague on the 30th of June, N. S. and went to Breda, from whence he sent what detachments could be spared from that place and other garrisons, to the camp at Nimeguen. He followed thither himself on the 2d of July, where, the next day, the Earl of Aiblone, Lieutenant-General Dopff, and the other General Officers, made him a visit; and, at an interview with them, he gave the necessary orders for drawing the army together. Nineteen battalions of the troops, which had been employed at the siege of Keyserwaert; the troops of Hesse and Lunenburg; the English forces from Breda under Major-General Lumley, and other troops, having joined the army, a camp was formed at Duckenberg and Budweick, consisting of seventy-six battalions of foot, and one hundred and twenty squadrons of horse and dragoons, amounting together to about sixty thousand men, with sixty-two cannon, eight mortars and hawbitz, and four and twenty pontoons. Thither the Earl went likewise, and, on the 8th, called a Council of war of all the General Officers, to concert the further operations of the campaign.

The Earl of Aiblone was always inclined to cautious and sure, but withal feeble counsels;

but the Earl of Marlborough, when the army was thus brought together, finding his force superior to the Duke of Burgundy, on the 16th, passed the Maese, and encamped at Over-Affelt near Grave, within two leagues and a half of the enemy, who had intrenched themselves between Geck and Gennep. On the 26th, the Confederate army repassed the Maese below the Grave; and, on the 28th, encamped at Geldorp, upon which motion the French passed the same river about Venlo. Two days after, the Allies removed from Geldorp to Grownbroeck, where finding a French garrison in the castle, seated in a morass, and surrounded by a double ditch and good palliades; a detachment, under the command of the Lord Cutts, briskly attacked it, and, with the assistance of four cannon and two hawbitz, after a short resistance obliged the garrison, consisting of a Captain and an hundred men, to surrender at discretion. The same day, the British artillery arrived in the camp from Holland, under convoy of two English regiments of horse, and two of foot, which had left England in the beginning of June. On the 2d of August, N. S. they advanced to Petit-Brugel, following the French, who retreated as they advanced, so close, that they were obliged to abandon the Spanish Guelderland, which was left to the discretion of the Confederates. The Earl of Marlborough was for venturing upon a decisive action, for which end, the whole army was ordered to their arms the next morning early. But the Dutch were afraid to put things to such an hazard, and would not consent to it. Penfionary Fagel, and those who had the Administration of affairs at the Hague, proceeded with the more caution, because, upon the late King's death, those, who had always opposed him, began to form parties in several of their towns, and were designing a change of Government; so that any public misfortune, in their conduct, would have given great advantages to these, who lay upon the watch for them. The Penfionary was more particularly aimed at; and that made him the more unwilling to run any risque. Those, who pretended to be judges, thought, that, if the Earl of Marlborough's advice had been followed, matters might have been brought to a happy decision; and the rather, as it afterwards appeared, that the French army was not above half got to their camp, greatly fatigued by an almost continual march of two days and two nights, and in the greatest consternation. But, as the Earl was prudent in his conduct of the army, so was he careful not to take too much upon himself.

The Duke of Burgundy finding himself obliged to retreat, as the Confederate army advanced, thought this was not suitable to his dignity; and therefore left Marshal Boufflers to command, ending his first campaign very ingloriously; and it appears, that the French King was dissatisfied with the conduct of the Marshal, for he never after repoted any confidence in him.

The Dutch, who were so lately in the deepest consternation upon the retreat of their army under the cannon of Nimeguen, before the

the Germans, but they retook it in 1703, as will be seen in the History of the next campaign. In 1704, the Imperialists reduced it again after the battle of Blenheim. It stands on the Queich, eight miles South of Neustadt, and sixteen South-West of Spire.

(1) The

1702. Earl of Marlborough's arrival, had now the pleasure to see the French fly in their turn; and thus were the United Provinces preserved by the Earl's prudence and vigilance, whilst the Duke of Burgundy, who came to the army to be taught how to fight, learned nothing but how to avoid an engagement.

The Earl of Marlborough went on, taking several places, which made little or no resistance; and finding at length, that the French were not to be brought to an engagement on equal terms, and the Deputies of the States-General, who followed the army, having represented to him, that it was much more for the advantage of Holland to dispossess the enemy of the places they held in the Spanish Guelderland, whereby the free navigation of the Maese was interrupted, and the important town of Maestricht in a manner blocked up, he therefore disposed all things for the siege of Venlo. In the mean time, General Schultz was ordered to reduce the town and castle of Wertz, which capitulated after a short resistance.

On the 7th of September, the trenches were opened on both sides the Maese, and the town of Venlo surrendered on the 25th of the same month, after fort St. Michael had been stormed and taken by the English under the command of the Lord Cutts, who, with several other Officers of the same Nation, particularly the young Earl of Huntington (1), shewed an incredible bravery on that hazardous occasion.

The Earl proceeded with the army under his command to sit down before Ruremond, the second City of Guelders, standing upon the Maese, at the confluence of that river and the Roer; which, after a very vigorous siege, beat a parly on the 6th of October, and the next day surrendered upon articles. The same time Stevenswaert, a fortified place seated on the Maese, about five miles from Ruremond to the South, capitulated likewise. Upon the successes of the Confederates, Marshal Boufflers thought it high time to provide for the security of Liege (2), which he justly apprehended to be in no small danger. Being accompanied therefore with the Duke of Mayne, and taking with him some Engineers, he went to view the fortifications of the citadel, and, after that, the most considerable posts between that City and Maestricht, as if he intended to incamp there; but, finding it impracticable by the approach of the Confederates, who were marching towards Liege, he retreated to Tongeren with great precipitation, and went towards Brabant, to defend such places, as at that time were not intended to be attacked.

When the Confederate army came before Liege, they found the Suburbs of St. Wandrille set on fire by the French garrison, who were retired, part into the citadel, and part into the Chartruse, after which the City was delivered up to the Besiegers, by a treaty between the Earl of Marlborough, the Deputies of the State-General, and Commissioners from the Chapter and Magistracy. Six days after, the trenches were opened against the great citadel, which was taken by storm, notwithstanding the resistance of the Governor, five days before upon a summons to surrender, that the Earl of Marlborough said, "That it would be time enough to think of that six weeks hence." The Assaults having exerted an amazing courage in this attack, and put most of the garrison to the sword, gained a considerable booty, besides honour; for, in the cash of treasure alone, there were three hundred thousand florins in gold and silver, and more for one million two hundred thousand florins upon substantial Mortgages at Liege, which were all accepted and turned into ready money (3). This victory was not yet completed by the surrender of the City, the garrison of which place, having capitulated, were conducted to Amberg.

Thus ended the campaign with great success, many places having been taken with little resistance, and an inconsiderable loss either of time or of men. The Earl of Marlborough's conduct gained him the hearts of the army, and the States-General were highly furnished with every thing he did; and the Earl of Arbonne did him the justice to own, that he had differed in opinion from him in every thing that was done, and that therefore the honour of their success was entirely owing to him.

Upon the breaking up of the army in November, an accident happened that had like to have lost all the advantages and honour gained in this glorious campaign. The Earl of Marlborough, the day the army separated, went to Maestricht; and he thought the easiest and quickest, as well as safest, way of returning to the Hague, was by some of those great boats that pass on the Maese. He had twenty-five soldiers, commanded by a Lieutenant, in the boat with him to serve as a guard. The next morning he came to Ruremond, where he joined Monsieur Coborn; and, having dined with the Prince

(1) The young Earl shewed, upon this and many other occasions, an extraordinary heat of courage. He called to the soldiers who had got over the palisades to help him over, promising them all the money he had about him; which promise he generously performed, and led them on with much bravery and success. Burnet II. 325.

(2) Liege is a very considerable City, situated in a pleasant valley, environed with hills, the river entering it in two branches, accompanied with lesser streams, which make many delightful islands. On the brow of a hill which hangs over it, stands the citadel (or castle) of great strength, built to command the town; without which, it would be but of small consequence. Here is a famous University, endowed with large Ecclesiastical Revenues: There are also eight Collegiate, and thirty-two Parochial Churches. It was taken this year by the Confederates, and invested in 1705.

by the French; who broke up the siege, and retired behind their lines, upon the news of the Duke of Marlborough's speedy return with his army from the Moselle. It was restored to the Elector of Cologne in 1714.

(3) 'Tis said an English Grenadier got a thousand Louis Dor's in a bag for his share. The extraordinary bravery of the hereditary Prince of Hesse Cassel deserves the highest encomium; who went Volunter to the attack at the head of the Grenadiers, and, mounting the breach the very first, took the colours from a French Officer. Mr. Wentworth (Brother to the Lord Raby) who likewise went Volunter in the said attack, was killed. Monsieur de Violaine (Governor of the citadel) and the Duke of Charost, were taken prisoners upon the breach, and brought to the Earl of Marlborough's quarters.

(1) This

1702. Prince of Holstein-Beck, Governor of that place, they continued their voyage together, having sixty men in a larger boat, which was to be before them. There were likewise fifty horse ordered to ride along the banks of the river. About seven that evening they came to Venlo, where the party of horse being relieved by a like number out of that garrison, they pursued their way down the river. The great boat, in which General Coborn was, out-failed the other, and the troopers on shore mistook their way in the night. The French had yet the town of Guelthers in their hands, which was indeed the only place they had left in Spanish Guelderland. A party of five and thirty men from thence was lurking on the banks of the river near three leagues below Venlo, waiting for an adventure; and, the Company being all asleep, they seized by surprize, between eleven and twelve at night, the rope by which the boat was drawn, and hauled it on shore. They immediately made a discharge of their small arms, and threw several grenades into the boat, by which some of the soldiers were wounded.

This done, they entered and seized the boat, with all who were in it, before they could get in any order to make opposition. With the Earl were Monsieur Opdam, one of the Dutch Generals, and Monsieur Gueltermalsen, one of the Deputies of the States. They did not know the Earl, but they knew the other two, who both had passes, according to a civility usually practised by the Generals on both sides. The Earl of Marlborough's Brother had one, but, his ill state of health having made him leave the campaign, it remained in the hands of his Secretary, and now was made use of by the Earl. The date indeed was out; but the presence of mind, with which he produced it, and their hurry in the night, prevented that from being considered. They therefore only rifled the boat, searched the trunks and baggage, emptied them of what plate and things of value they found, and took presents from those, whom they believed to be protected by their passes; and then, after having stopped them several hours, and taken the Earl's guard of foot prisoners, they let them go. The Governor of Venlo, having notice that the Earl was taken, but not being informed of the circumstances which followed, presumed that he was carried prisoner to Guelthers, and therefore marched out immediately with his whole garrison to invest that place. The news of it, likewise coming to the Hague in the same imperfect manner, put the States under no small consternation. They immediately assembled, and resolved to send orders to all their forces to march immediately to Guelthers, to threaten the garrison with the utmost extremities, unless they should deliver the prisoners, and never leave the place, till either they had taken it, or the Generals were set free. But, before these orders could be dispatched, the Earl of Marlborough came to the Hague, where he was received with inexpressible joy, not only by the States, but by all the inhabitants, for he was beloved there to a high degree. He was complimented upon his escape by Pensionary Heinsius, in the name of the States. 1702.

The necessity of the French King's affairs had forced him, before the loss of Landau, to grant the Elector of Bavaria all his demands; Ulm, but he had not agreed to what the Elector asked, till that City was given for lost; and then, seeing that the Prince of Baden might overrun all the Hondruck, and carry his winter-quarters into the neighbourhood of France, it was necessary to gain this Elector on any terms. If this agreement had been made sooner, probably, the siege of Landau, how far soever it was advanced, must have been raised. The Elector made his declaration in favour of France, when he possessed himself of Ulm, a rich free town of the Empire, in the Circle of Swabia. It was taken, on the 8th of September, by a stratagem, that, however successful it proved to the Elector, was fatal to him, who conducted it; for he was killed by an accident, after he was possessed of the town (1).

The dyet of the Empire was so incensed at the treachery of the Elector of Bavaria in seizing Ulm, that, after a warm debate, it was resolved by a plurality of voices, to declare war against the French King and the Duke of Arjou; and a memorial was ordered to be drawn up, requesting his Imperial Majesty to proceed against the Elector, according to the Constitutions of the Empire. The Ministers of the Electors of Bavaria and Cologne were forbid to appear any more in the general dyet; notwithstanding which, the Elector of Bavaria protested against these proceedings, and particularly against the declaration of war, alledging, "That an offensive war, like this, ought to be resolved on by common consent, and not by plurality of voices." To which it was answered, "That the King of France had attacked the Empire, by invading, not only in his own name, but in the name of the Duke of Arjou, his grandson, several fiefs of the Empire in Italy, the Archbishoprick of Cologne, and the Diocese of Liege; as also by disturbing the trade of the Rhine, and committing several other hostilities, which rendered this war defensive, and not offensive, on the side of the Empire." But no regard was had to his protest; and the Empire's declaration of war was published and notified to the Cardinal of Lamberg, the Emperor's Commissioner, on the 30th of September, N. S. by the Elector of Mentz, in the name of the dyet of Ratisbon.

The taking of Ulm had given so great an alarm to the neighbouring Circles and Princes, that they called away their troops from the Prince of Baden to their own defence; by which means his army was much diminished; but, with the troops, that were left him, he studied to cut off the communication between Straßburg and Ulm. After the taking of Ulm, the French made themselves masters of the little town of Newburg, on the Rhine, and in the circle of Swabia. This gave great uneasiness to Prince Lewis of Baden, who particularly with a Cathedral extolled beyond any in Germany. It stands on the Danube and Iller, thirty-eight miles West of Augsburg.

(1) This project was executed by Monsieur Pekken Lieutenant Colonel of the Elector's Guards. Ulm is a strong and populous City in the Circle of Swabia, free and imperial, adorned with many stately edifices;

1702. who made a motion with part of his army, to retake it, and to cover Brissac; but he was so much weakened by the detachments, that had been sent to Swabia, in order to hinder the conjunction of the Bavarians and French, that he had not above eight thousand men in his camp near Fridlinguen. The enemy, having intelligence of this, thought there could not be a more seasonable opportunity to attack him; for which purpose, the French, who were divided in two bodies (one commanded by the Marquis de Villars, and the other by Count de Guiscard) passed the Rhine with the infantry, which, the next day, were followed by the cavalry. The Prince of Baden, upon this, decamped from Fridlinguen, for fear of being inclosed by the two bodies of the French; and, whilst he was upon the march, Count Merci, who brought up the rear with four hundred horse, sent him word, that Villars was advancing towards him with thirty battalions and forty squadrons, in order of battle. Hereupon the Prince caused his army to face about, which being not above fifteen hundred paces from the enemy, both sides made a halt, and the Prince began the engagement, by cannonading the French. The Imperialists, being then attacked, pushed the enemy with great vigour; and, coming down into the plain, charged so briskly the right wing of the French army, that there was scarce ever seen a more obstinate and bloody battle, which continued for near two hours. But, the Imperialists being much weaker than the French, and the Count de Guiscard coming up with succours, the second line of the Imperial cavalry was, on a sudden, put into such disorder, that all the horse quitted the field in great confusion. The Prince now thought it high time to make the best retreat he could with his infantry; but they, contrary to his expectation, fell in with the French foot with such undaunted bravery, that they broke their ranks, and drove them from their ground into a wood adjoining, thence which they pursued them almost to Hunningen. The French horse all this while stood still, and seemed to be only spectators of the defeat of their infantry; but, observing their foot to be intirely routed, they likewise made their retreat.

The Prince, having thus obtained the victory, continued about five hours in the field of battle, and then directed his march towards Stauffen. Notwithstanding these disadvantages of the enemy, the French King ordered Te Deum to be sung, as if his troops had been victorious (1); and, to support the reputation of it, asserted, they took Fridlinguen the next day, and, upon this occasion, raised the Marquis de Villars to the dignity of Marshal of France. But, Prince Lewis of Baden being willing to let all the world know the contrary, and that this action had no ways disconcerted his measures, he made three detachments from his army; one towards the Black Forest, to block up the passage into Bavaria; another, to attack Newburg; and a third, to reinforce the Prince of Saxe Meiningen, who was observing the motions of Count Tallard and the Marquis de Lomaria. But, before this, he assembled all his troops, and being reinforced by General Tungen with fifteen hundred men, he formed so considerable an army, that he desired nothing more than a second engagement with Villars; and for that purpose advanced with his army, intending to attack him. But the Marshal, not thinking fit to wait his approach, repassed the Rhine, and so was disappointed by this action of joining the Elector of Bavaria.

The latter end of October, Count Tallard and Treves and Traerbach taken by the Marquis de Lomaria, with a body of eighteen thousand men, made themselves masters of Treves; and, there advancing towards Traerbach, the French they took that place after a very stout resistance. Brodriek.

On

(1) Father Daniel affirms, that Marshal Villars defeated the Imperial army in this battle; and that the latter left three thousand dead upon the place; and that nine hundred were taken prisoners, besides eleven pieces of cannon, thirty-five standards, four pair of kettle-drums, and five hundred waggons laden with ammunition; whereas the French lost only one thousand or eleven hundred men. The Marquis de Feuquieres's account of this battle is as follows: "The action, says he, at Fridlinguen has been dignified with the name of a battle, though it was properly no more than a great engagement of foot and horse, since both those bodies fought separately. The particulars are these: Marshal de Villars, having been detached with a body of troops from the King's main army in Alsatia to defend a work raised for the security of the bridge of Hunningen, which the enemy seemed disposed to attack, formed his camp on this side of Hunningen, and near enough to protect the outworks, and with a view to improve the enemy's decampment to the best advantage in his power, should that incident happen. The enemy's forces were incamped in a plain, that extended between the Rhine and a mountain opposite to the work, that covered the bridge. Their left was near the territory of Basel, and their right was stretched out towards the village of Fridlinguen, in the front of which was a large redoubt built since the war began, to secure the country against the incursions of the garrison of Hunningen. In this disposition of our troops and those of the enemy, M. de Villars was attentive to the manner in which the latter would decamp, when they should be preparing for their winter-quarters. The enemy neglected the necessary precautions, when they decamped, through a persuasion, that they might form that motion, without any apprehensions of being pursued in their retreat; and that they should soon be at a secure distance from an army, which must pass the Rhine on a single bridge, in order to be vigilant enough to incommode their rear-guard. They likewise proposed to march their foot on the rising ground behind their camp, and the horse were to advance on their right, and pass through the defile of Fridlinguen, which was fronted by the redoubt abovementioned. When the enemy began to form their motion in the view of M. de Villars, this General gave orders for his army to pass the Rhine; which they accordingly did with all possible expedition: After which he divided them in the same manner as he had seen the enemy's forces disposed, when they began their retreat. The foot marched under the command of M. Desbordes to the eminence, on which the enemy's foot were in motion; and, as these did not wheel about to oppose our forces, who ascended the rising ground with great difficulty, they soon beheld their rear-guard approached by our foot, who marched with such immoderate vivacity, that they were obliged to halt, till they could recover breath. Had the enemy advanced to our battalions, while they were thus incapable of defending themselves, they, in all probability, would have been victorious. But M. de Villars, who had entertained just apprehensions of this inconvenience, marched thither in person, and gave the foot sufficient time to form themselves in order. The two bodies, however, did not charge in a line: Our foot advanced very near those of the enemy in 7 E "their 1702.

On the other side, the hereditary Prince of Hesse Cassel, marching from the grand army at Leige with nine thousand Hessians, and finding that the French had possessed themselves of Zinck, Lintz, Brisac, and Andernach, retook those places. The garrison of Zinck surrendered themselves prisoners of war; those of Brisac quitted the place upon the Prince's approach. But Andernach, being defended by a garrison of four hundred men, a good wall, rampart, and mole, made a longer resistance. However, the Hessians having raised a battery, and possessed themselves in the night of an advantageous post near one of the gates, in order to storm the place the next morning, the enemy beat a parley, and the Prince gave them leave to march out with their arms and baggage, but refused them the honour of any articles. He then marched away with two thousand men to attack Lintz, but the French immediately quitted the place, and retired to Bonne.

The war
in Italy.
Burnet.

In Italy, the Duke of Vendôme began with the relief of Mantua, which was reduced to great extremities by the long blockade, which Prince Eugene had kept about it, who had so fortified the Oglio, that the Duke, apprehending the difficulty of forcing his posts, marched through the Venetian territories, notwithstanding the protestations of the Republic against it, and came to Gais with a great convoy for Mantua. Prince Eugene drew his army all along the Mantuan Fossa, down to Borghesfortes. He was forced to abandon a great many places; but, apprehending that Bersello might be besieged, and considering the importance of that place, he put a strong garrison into it. He complained much, that the Court of Vienna seemed to forget him, and did not send him the reinforcements they had promised. And it was thought, that his enemies at that Court, under colour of supporting the King of the Romans in his first campaign, were willing to neglect every thing, that related to him; by which means the best army, that the Emperor ever had, was left to moulder away to nothing.

King Philip of Spain took a very extraordinary resolution of going over to Italy, to possess himself of the Kingdom of Naples, and to put an end to the war in Lombardy. He arrived at Naples in April, and was received there with outward splendor, but made little progress in quieting the minds of that turbulent Kingdom. Neither did he obtain the investiture of it from the Pope, though his Holiness had sent to him a Cardinal Legate with a high compliment. This the Germans thought was too much, while the French considered it as not enough; however, upon it the Emperor's Ambassador left Rome. King Philip was conducted from Naples to Final by the French fleet, that had carried him from Barcelona to Naples. As he was going to command the Duke of Vendôme's army, he was met by the Duke of Savoy, of whom there was some jealousy, that having married his two daughters so greatly, he began now to discern his own distinct interest, which called upon him to hinder the French from being masters of the Milanese. King Philip wrote to the Duke of Vendôme not to fight Prince Eugene, till he could join him. He seemed jealous, lest that Prince should be driven out of Italy, before he could come to share in the honour of it; yet, when he came, he could do nothing, though the Prince was miserably abandoned by the Court of Vienna. Count Manfield, President of the Council of war, was much suspected of being corrupted by the

“ their retreat, but could not bring them to engage in “ front; and therefore it cannot be said, that they “ were defeated. The engagement between the horse “ was much more decisive, partly through the neglect “ of the Officer, who commanded the enemy's troops,
“ and partly through the prudence and capacity of M.
“ de Magnac, who commanded the King's forces in “ this action. As the conduct of this General Officer “ appears to me to have been very judicious and well “ concerted on this occasion, I shall be as exact as possi“ ble in relating the particulars. I have already de“ clared, that the plain, where the enemy had in-“ camped, extended to the village of Fridlinguen, the “ avenue to which formed a considerable defile fronted “ by a redoubt, where the enemy had planted cannon,
“ and posted a body of foot. The General Officer,
“ who commanded the enemy's horse, imagined,
“ when he began his march, that his troops would “ have sufficient time to pass the defile, before they “ could be overtaken by ours, who at that time had “ not completed their passage over the Rhine. But “ he was deceived in his expectation by the vigour of “ our march, which was so extraordinary, that the “ enemy was obliged to recall those of their troops, “ who had entered the defile, and to form themselves “ in order of battle, to receive our horse, who were “ advancing to charge them. This body of the ene“ my's horse might have been disposed in such a man“ ner, as to have had their right covered by the re“ doubt, and their left might have been supported by “ an inclosed country, that was impracticable for the “ horse, who were at the bottom of the eminence,
“ on which the enemy's foot pursued their march.
“ The enemy by this disposition might have formed “ three or four lines of battle, and have sustained the “ charge of our horse, whose left would have been “ exposed to the fire of the foot and cannon of the “ redoubt, before they could be capable of engaging.

“ M. de Magnac, by a motion peculiar to the genius
“ of an experienced Officer, effectually disconcerted
“ the disposition, into which the enemy might have “ formed themselves, and made them lose all the ad“ vantages, that would have resulted from it. When “ the troops were on the point of action, he discovered
“ a seeming fear to engage, and caused the first line “ to file off behind the second, as if he intended to “ retreat with the greatest precaution. The enemy, “ elated at their superior force, were persuaded that “ this motion of M. de Magnac proceeded from his “ fear to begin an engagement with an army, whom “ he only intended to incommode in their retreat,
“ when he found their front engaged in the defile;
“ and upon this presumption they lost the advantage “ of their disposition. Our General then advanced,
“ and at the same time formed an opening, to give his “ troops an opportunity of doubling the first and se“ cond line. This motion could not be accomplished “ without considerable danger so near an enemy, who “ discovered such impatience to engage. But M. de “ Magnac very judiciously improved this warmth of “ theirs to his own advantage. The moment the ene“ my had disconcerted their order of battle, and, by “ extending their right, lost the advantage of being “ protected by the fire from the redoubt, he charged “ them so opportunely, that he pushed their first line “ upon the others, that were not intirely formed,
“ and drove them into the defile in the utmost confu“ sion, without any apprehensions of the fire from the “ redoubt, which could not then be directed against “ us, because it would have been equally fatal to their “ own troops, who were intermixed with ours.”

The battle of Luzzara.
Aug. 15.

Hist. of Europe,
Vol. vii.
Burnet.

1702. the Court of France: The supplies promised were not sent to Italy: The apprehensions they were under of the Elector of Bavaria's declaring, some time before he did it, gave a colour to those who were jealous of Prince Eugene's glory, to detain the recruits and troops that had been promised him, for the Emperor's own defence. But, though he was thus forsaken, the Prince managed the force he had with great skill and conduct; and when he saw that Luzzara, a castle near the Po, in the Duchy of Guastalla, was in danger, he marched with twenty-five thousand men against the French and Spanish army, which consisted of about forty thousand, commanded by King Philip and the Duke of Vendosme. He gave the signal of battle about five in the evening, on the 15th of August, and then the artillery began to play upon the enemy. About half an hour after, the right wing of the Imperialists charged the left of the French, and attacked them in their post, which extended itself along the banks of the Po; but without success; for the Prince of Commercy, who was extremely beloved, being killed on the spot, struck the troops commanded by him with such a consternation, that three battalions and as many squadrons were put into disorder by the enemy's small shot, and the furious onset of the cavalry, which charged the flank of the Imperial horse. But this confusion was soon over; for the battalions and squadrons, that gave ground, rallied again; and, several regiments advancing to their relief, they charged the enemy so vigorously, that they were driven from their post. And though the French King's Gens d'Armes made a very stout resistance, and rallied four times in their retreat; yet they were chased above a thousand paces, from one intrenchment to another. The left wing fought with as great resolution and intrepidity as the right; for General Guido de Staremberg, who commanded the infantry, began the attack with the Grenadiers; and, though the enemy endeavoured to penetrate their flank with their carabineers, the Imperialists stood their charge with such extraordinary courage and firmness, and afterwards fell upon them with so much bravery, that they could no longer stand it, but were forced to retreat. Sometimes they rallied by favour of the ground, and the superiority of their numbers; but, being repulsed three or four times, they were quite driven out of their posts; and night put an end to the engagement. All the Imperial Officers and Troops acquitted themselves of their duty to admiration. The French pretended to the honour of the action from the consequence of it, having, the next day, made themselves masters of Luzzara, and in the remaining part of the campaign dislodged the Germans from several small posts (1). But it must be owned by the Impartial, that the Imperialists gained the advantage of the day, having driven the enemy above a thousand paces from the field of battle, and actually incamped upon it. They likewise made themselves masters of their ammunition and provision, a great number of their tents, and of all their pioneering instruments. Besides, the enemy's loss was not computed to be less than eight thousand men; whereas, the number of the Imperialists was not more than two thousand six hundred and seventy-two killed and wounded. The event of this action also put the French to such a stop, that all they could do, after this, was only to take a few inconsiderable places; while Prince Eugene still kept his posts; and King Philip, at the end of so inglorious a campaign, returned into Spain, where the Graudes were extremely disgusted to see themselves so much despised, and their affairs wholly conducted by French counsels.

The

(1) Father Daniel tells us, that Prince Eugene claimed the victory without any other reason, than that his army was not put to flight; and that he had five or six thousand killed or wounded; whereas, on the French side, there were only between two and three thousand killed or wounded. He observes likewise, that scarce any but the foot were engaged, by reason of the disposition of the ground. The Marquis de Feuquieres gives the following account of this battle: "After the action at the Croscola, the King's army marched to Luzzara, and the bridges, which the enemy had on the Po, with an intention to cut off all their communication with Mirandola and the Modense. As they had several rivers and artificial canals to pass, they began their march with all proper precaution, and in as many columns, as they could possibly form. A body of horse was ordered to advance before the army, to give intelligence of what they discovered. We had not received any information, that Prince Eugene was in motion; and we believed him to be then in Seraglio, as he was when we approached him from Mantua. But this Prince had passed the Po with the greatest part of his army, and was then posted between this river and the Zera, and so well covered by the dike of Zera, that we had no suspicion of his being so near us with his army, because, when our march was almost completed, the Officer, who commanded the body of horse, that advanced before the army, had not the curiosity to ascend this dike of Zera, behind which the Emperor's whole army was drawn up. This negligence was too great in such a conjuncture, and should serve as a warning for the prevention of the like inconvenience. When

"the King's forces, who continued their march, and consequently were still in columns, were preparing to enter their camp at Luzzara, they immediately beheld themselves under the fire of the enemy's foot, who had been regularly drawn up below the reverse of the dike, and only waited to ascend it, in order to fire. We were obliged therefore, upon our arrival at our camp, to form ourselves in order of battle, and engage the enemy. Several hedges rose between the front of the army and the dike, so that it was impossible for the lines to charge in front. The enemy, however, attempted, in several places, to advance up to our battalions, but without any success. The horse to our right had an open country before them, and they had some encounters, though with very little effect, because the enemy saw, that the attack in front would not be so successful as they could wish, and that the horse of our right, who, in their march, had advanced a little too far beyond the columns of foot, had at that time recovered their ground, and formed a line to the right of the foot. This battle therefore was fought without any apparent advantage on either side. Our army, however, incamped within cannon-shot of the enemy, without perceiving them, because they were posted behind the dike, and we intrenched our camp with an intention to make ourselves masters of Luzzara and Guastalla, which lay in the rear of our left; and we accordingly took those places, and consequently decided the advantage in our favour, since the enemy continued for several days in their post, without making any attempt to preserve Guastalla. This project was framed by Prince Eugene, and would have

French
try to engage the Turks in a war with the Emperor.
Affairs in Poland.
Ibid.

The French tried this summer by all possible means to engage the Turks in a new war with the Emperor; and it was believed, that the Grand Vizir was intirely gained, though the Musli, and all who had any credit in that Court, were against it. But, the Grand Vizir being strangled, the design was prevented.

The Court of France was engaged likewise in another intrigue in Poland, where they made use of the Cardinal Primate to keep that Kingdom still imbroiled. The King of Sweden marched on to Cracow, which was much censured as a desperate attempt, since a defeat there must have destroyed him and his army intirely, being so far from home. He attacked the King of Poland, and gave him such an overthrow, that, though the army escaped, he made himself master both of their camp and artillery. He possessed himself of Cracow, where he stayed some months, till he had raised all the money they could produce; and, though the Muscovites with the Lithuanians destroyed Livonia, and broke into Sweden, yet that could not draw him back. The Duke of Holstein, who had married his eldest sister, was thought to have been gained by the French to push on this young King to prosecute the war with such an unrelenting fury, in which he might have a design for himself, since the King of Sweden's venturing his own person so freely might make way for his Duche's to succeed to the Crown. But that Duke was killed in the battle of Lissa near Cracow. There was some hopes of peace this winter; but the two Kings of Poland and Sweden were so exasperated against each other, that it seemed impossible to compose that animosity. This was very unacceptable to the Allies, for both Kings were well inclined to support the Confederacy, and to engage in the war against France, if their own disputes could have been adjusted.

The English fleet sent to Cadiz.
Hist. of Europe.
Vol. vii.
Burnet.

Whilst these things were transacting on the continent, the Confederate fleet was not idle. It consisted of fifty ships of the line, thirty

English and twenty Dutch; the English commanded by Sir George Rooke, having under him Vice-Admiral Hapson, and the Rear-Admirals Fairborne and Graydon; the Dutch under the command of Lieutenant-Admiral Allemond, Admiral Callemburgh, the Vice-Admirals Vandergoes and Pieterfon, and Rear-Admiral Wassenauer, with about fourteen thousand land forces on board the transports, nine thousand six hundred and sixty-three English, and three thousand nine hundred and twenty-four Dutch: The English commanded by Sir Henry Bellasis, Lieutenant-General; Sir Charles O'Hara and Lord Portmore, Majors-General; and the Colonels Seymour, Hamilton, and Matthews, Brigadiers: And the Dutch by Major-General Sparre and Brigadier Baron Palandt: The Duke of Ormond had the supreme command of the whole. Sir George Rooke spoke so coldly of the design, which he went upon, before he failed, that those, who conversed with him, were apt to infer, that he intended to do the enemy as little harm as possible. On the 19th of June, the fleet weighed from Spithead, and came to an anchor at St Helen's, in order to fail with the next fair wind. Three days after, the Rear-Admirals, Fairborne and Graydon were detached from thence with sixteen men of war and two fire-ships, English, and a squadron of the Dutch, in all thirty sail, upon a secret expedition; and, on the 23d, the Prince of Hesse d'Armstadt failed in the Adventure frigate for Lisbon. Advice had been sent over from Holland of a fleet, that failed from France under Monsieur du Cassé, and was ordered to call in at the Groyne. Sir John Munden was recommended by Sir George Rooke to be sent against this fleet; and, though he came up with them with a superior force, yet he did not hinder the French from getting into the Groyne, nor fight them there.

Upon his return therefore to St Helen's where he arrived on the 25th of June, a Court-Martial, of which Sir Cloudesly Shovel was President, was appointed to try him. He was acquitted, Burnet.

" have been compleat in all its parts, had the execution proved as fortunate as the plan was judicious. " And indeed the King's army was preserved in this conjuncture by a circumstance, that was purely accidental, and which it was impossible for Prince Eugene to foresee. This circumstance was of such importance to our troops, that it merits a particular relation: The Emperor's troops, as I have already observed, lay concealed behind the dike of Zero, and Prince Eugene, who had not been discovered by the body of horse, that marched before the rest of our forces, because they halted at the front of the camp, without extending their view any farther, was now very near our army, who had not any suspicion of his situation. The Prince therefore concluded, that our troops, upon their arrival at their post, would lay down their arms, and form their camp, and that the horse would afterwards march out to forage, while the foot would be providing for their refreshment; and, that if he improved this favourable opportunity, by advancing to the foot of our camp, he should be able to seize all our arms, and a considerable number of our horses, upon which the intire destruction of our army would have been inevitable. This project was conducted to the very point of execution, and Prince Eugene was only waiting for the happy moment, when he was discovered by a mere effect of chance, time enough for our escape from the danger, and

" before the foot had dispersed themselves to provide for their accommodation. The accident, to which we owed our preservation, was this: The dike of Zero is not extended in a direct line, for, as it forms the canal, that flows from the Po above Seraglio to another part of the same river at Rovera, it was necessary to make it correspond with the level of the land; and it was carried on so near the front of our camp, that one of our Adjutants thought it the most commodious post for a party of soldiers, who were to form the out-guard of the camp. This Officer therefore, as he was advancing with his guard, in order to station them, had the curiosity to ascend the dike, and to take a view of the country beyond it; and then saw all the enemy's foot lying with their faces to the opposite declivity of the dike, with all the horse in the rear ranged in order of battle. This discovery alarmed our camp thro' the line, and they immediately caught up their arms to oppose the enemy, who, as I intimated before, were separated from them by a tract of land covered with hedges, which obliged them to desile. But this discovery did not prevent them from advancing to us, in hopes of disordering our line in so many different parts, that we should be in no condition to render their design ineffectual. But they were defeated in their expectations, as I observed before, and were incapable of making up to any part of the front of our camp."

1702. quitted, some excusing themselves for their lenity to him, by alledging, that, if they had condemned him, the punishment was death; whereas they thought his errors flowed from a want of sense; so that it would have been hard to condemn him for a defect of that, which nature had not given him. But this acquittal raised such a public clamour, that the Queen ordered him to be broke.

Sir George Rooke, to divert the design, which he himself was to go upon, wrote from St Helen's, that the Dutch fleet was victualled only to the middle of September; so that no great design could be undertaken, when so large a part of the fleet was so ill provided. When the Dutch Admiral heard of this, he sent to their Ambassador to complain to the Queen of this misinformation, for he was victualled to the middle of December. On the 1st of July, the Confederate fleet set sail from St Helen's, steering their course for Cadiz; but they were for some time stopped by contrary winds, accidents, and pretences, many of which were thought to be strained and sought for; however, at last, on the 12th of August, they came to anchor in the bay of Cadiz, about two leagues from that City. Sir George Rooke had laid no disposition beforehand how to proceed upon his coming thither, and some days were lost on pretence of seeking for intelligence. It is certain, that our Court had false accounts of the state of the place, with regard both to the garrison and the fortifications; the garrison being much stronger, and the fortifications in a much better condition, than had been represented. The French men of war, and the gallees, that lay in the bay, retired within the punts. In the first surprize, it had been easy to have followed them, and to have taken or burnt them, which Sir Stafford Fairborne offered to execute; but Sir George Rooke and the rest of his creatures did not approve of it (1). Some days were lost before a Council of war was called. In the mean while, the Duke of Ormond sent some Engineers and Pilots to sound the South-side of Cadiz near the island of St Pedro; but, while this was doing, the Officers, by the taking of some boats, came to know, that the inhabitants of Cadiz had sent over the best of their goods and other effects to Port St Mary's, an open village over-against it, on the continent of Spain; so that there was good plunder to be had easily, whereas the landing on the isle of Cadiz was like to prove dangerous, and, as some made them believe, impracticable. In the Council of war, in which their instructions were read, it was proposed to consider, how they should put them in execution. General O Hara made a long speech against landing; shewing, how desperate an attempt it would prove, and how different they found the state of the place from the representations made of it in England. The greater number agreed with him, and all that the Duke of Ormond could say to the contrary was of no effect. Sir George seemed to be of the same mind with the Duke, but all his dependants were of another opinion; so that this was thought a piece of craft in him. In conclusion, the Council of war came to a resolution not to make a descent on the island of Cadiz; but, before they broke up, those, whom the Duke had sent to sound the landing-places on the South-side, came and told them, that, as they might land safely, so the ships might ride securely on that side. Yet they had no regard to this, but adhered to their former resolution, nor were there any orders given for bombarding the town. The sea was for the most part very high, while they lay there; but it was so calm for one day, that the Engineers believed they could have done much mischief, but they had no orders for it; and indeed it appeared very evidently, that they intended to do nothing but plunder Port St Mary's; a design, which was directly contrary to the advice of Mr Melbuen, the English Envoy in Portugal, who, in a letter to the Duke of Ormond from Lisbon of the 1st of August, told him, "That the point of the greatest importance was to insinuate to the Spaniards, and shew by his proceedings, that he came not as an enemy to Spain, but only to free them from France, and give them assistance to establish themselves under the Government of the House of Austria." However, the land-forces, being set ashore in the Bay of Bulls, made themselves masters of Rota, Port St Katharine, and Port St Mary, which they found deserted, but full of riches, which were immediately plundered; some of the General Officers setting a very ill example to all the rest, especially O Hara and Bellasis. The Duke of Ormond tried to hinder this, but did not exert his authority; for, if he had made some examples at first, he might have prevented the mischief, that was done. But, the whole army running so violently on the spoil, he either was not able, or, through a gentleness of temper, not willing to proceed to extremities. He had published a manifesto, according to his instructions, by which the Spaniards were invited to submit to the Emperor; and he offered his protection to all, that came in to him. But the plundering of St Mary's was thought an ill commentary on that text. After some days of unsuccessful attempts on the forts of that side, particularly Matagorda, it appeared, that nothing could be done; and, provisions now growing scarce, and the Sea-Officers representing the danger of staying any longer in those seas, the Duke of Ormond, though not without great reluctance, consented to the re-embarking of the land-forces. Some of the ships crews were so employed in bringing off and bestowing the plunder, that they took not the necessary care to furnish themselves with fresh water. Sir George Rooke, without prosecuting his other instructions,

(1) Fairborne proposed the ordering a squadron of ships, before the fleet came in sight of Cadiz, to push through the entrance of the harbour, without coming to an anchor at all, which he offered to undertake. Had this advice been followed, they might, in the first surprize of the Spaniards, have destroyed at least their shipping, if not taken the place; but, it being not No. 37. Vol. III.

thought advisable to make such an attempt, the Spaniards had not only the leisure, while the fleet lay in view, of sinking vessels in the very entrance of the harbour, whereby the passage was rendered impracticable, but to put themselves into a much better condition of defending the City itself, than they would otherwise have been. Burichet, p. 622.

1702. in case the design on Cadiz failed, gave orders only for a squadron to sail to the West-Indies, with some land-forces, and, though he had a fleet of Victuallers, that had provisions to the middle of December, he ordered them to sail home; by which means the men of war were so scantily furnished, that they were soon forced to be put on short allowance. Nor did he send advice-boats, either to the ports of Algarve or to Lisbon, to see what orders or advices might be lying there for him, but failed in a direct course for England (1).

The Gallies taken and burnt at Vigo.
Boyer.
Burnet.

Some time before this, the news of the arrival of the French squadron, under Monfieur Chateau-Renault, with the Spanish Gallies, in the harbour of Vigo, being brought to England, orders were immediately dispatched to Sir George Rooke, to attempt the taking or destroying of them; and Sir Cloudesly Shovel was ordered upon the same design, with another squadron of men of war. But, before these orders could reach the grand fleet, Sir George Rooke, in his return towards England, having, on the 22d of September, sent the Eagle, Sterling-Castle, and Pembroke, to water in Lagos-Bay, Mr Beauvoir, the Chaplain of the Pembroke, went ashore in the town of Lagos, and, meeting with a Gentleman in the street, whom, by several circumstances, he judged to be no Portuguese, he accosted him in French; which the other, who proved to be the French Consul, returning in a very obliging manner, invited him to his house. Mr Beauvoir, extremely willing to embrace this offer, continued there two nights, during which the Consul, in their several conversations, could not forbear to boast of his Master's strength at sea, and at last gave some hints of the arrival of the Gallies on that coast. On the 24th, Mr Beauvoir being ready to embark, and understanding, that a Gentleman was arrived in that town bound for the fleet, with letters to the Prince of Hesse and Mr Melbuen (who were gone from the fleet to Lisbon some time before) he invited him to go aboard the Pembroke, without taking the least notice of their departure. The Gentleman having gladly accepted this invitation, and told him, just as they were leaving the shore, that Monfieur Chateau-Renault was arrived at Vigo with thirty men of war, and twenty-two Gallies, and that he was sent by the Imperial Minister to the grand fleet, they went together on board the Pembroke, where Captain Hardy, her Commander, being informed, as well by Mr Beauvoir of what he had gathered from the French Consul, as by the other Gentleman concerning what he knew of the matter, he set sail the next morning in quest of the grand fleet, which at last he met with on the 6th of October. Having imparted his intelligence to the English Admiral, Sir George communicated the same to the Dutch; and it was resolved to attempt the destroying of the French and Spanish ships at Vigo (2). Accordingly, the fleet came to an anchor, on the 11th, against that place, almost unperceived by the enemy, by reason of the hazy weather; and, finding that the French and Spanish ships were carried up beyond a narrow strait, defended by a castle, besides a strong boom about it, made with masts, cables, and chains, it was resolved in a Council of war: That, since the whole fleet could not safely go up to the place, where the enemy's ships lay, a detachment of fifteen English and ten Dutch men of war, with all the fire-ships, frigates, and bomb-vessels, should go upon that service, with all the flag-officers aboard them, whilst part of the land-forces were to make a descent, and to attack the fort on the South-side of Rodondela, a small fishing-town (3).

Pursuant to this resolution, the Duke of Ormond, having, on the 12th of October, landed two thousand five hundred men two leagues from Vigo on the South-side of the river, without the least opposition, he ordered the grenadiers to advance to the fort at the entrance of the harbour; which they did with such cheerfulness and resolution, that, having made themselves masters of a platform of thirty-eight pieces of cannon, they pursued the French to the very gates of the castle or stone-tower, and attacked them so vigorously, that Monfieur Sorel, their Commander, despairing of holding the place, attempted to fight his way through the English sword in hand. But no sooner had they opened the gate, than the grenadiers rushing in made themselves masters of the castle, and took three hundred French seamen and fifty Spaniards prisoners. Whilst these things were transacting ashore, the squadron designed for this expedition advanced briskly towards the boom, and, after a little stop by a calm, Vice-Admiral Hopson in the Torbay broke, amidst the enemy's fire, through the boom, where he received several broad-sides from the Bourbon and l'Esperance (4), two French men of war placed within the boom. The rest of Vice-Admiral Hopson's division, and that of the Dutch Vice-Admiral Vandergoes, bearing at the same time upon the bottom, were becalmed, and consequently struck, so that they were forced to cut their way through it, except their Admiral, who hit the same passage, by which Vice-Admiral Hopson had entered before. Hopson, in the mean time, being boarded by a fire-ship, was in great danger of being burnt, had not the fire-ship been blown up too soon; notwithstanding which, he received considerable damage

(1) Thus ended (says Bishop Burnet) the expedition against Cadiz, which was ill projected, and worse executed. The Duke of Ormond told him, he had not half the ammunition that was necessary for the taking Cadiz, if the Spaniards had defended themselves well: Though, he believed, they would not have made any great resistance, if he had landed on his first arrival, and not given them time to recover from the disorder into which the first surprize had put them. Burnet, Vol. II. 333.

(2) Bishop Burnet observes (Vol. II. 332.) Sir George Rooke, upon receiving the intelligence, was said to steer his course towards Vigo very unwillingly, but, finding it true, resolved to force his way in.

(3) The English ships were the Mary, Grafton, Torbay, Kent, Monmouth, Berwick, Essex, Swiftsure, Ranelagh, Somerset, Bedford, Cambridge, Northumberland, Oxford, Pembroke; the Association and Barfleur were to batter the forts on each side. The Admirals removed the flags from the great ships into third rates, the first and second rates being too big to go in: Sir George Rooke went out of the Royal Sovereign into the Somerset; Admiral Hopson out of the Prince George into the Torbay; Admiral Fairborne out of the St George into the Essex; and Admiral Graydon out of the Triumph into the Northumberland.

(4) Or the Hope, which had been taken from the English.

(1) The

1702. in his rigging, and many of his men, during the first consternation, threw themselves overboard, in hopes to save themselves, but were most of them drowned, whilst the rest behaved so well as to preserve the ship. The French Admiral seeing the boom cut in pieces, the platform and cattle in the enemy's hands, the Bourbon taken, and the whole Confederate Squadron ready to fall in among them, ordered his own ship to be set on fire; and his example, being followed by all the rest, afforded a most dreadful spectacle to the Spaniards as well as to the French. Whilst they were thus busied in the destruction of their own fleet, the English were as careful in preserving it, not without some success; several, as well of the men of war as of the Galleons, being taken, four by the English, and five by the Dutch; but the rest were burnt, with nine French men of war (1). What made this victory the more considerable was it's being gained with inconsiderable loss, there being not above forty men killed and ten wounded of the landmen in this action, and very few of the seamen, except those, that were drowned of Vice-Admiral Hopson's ship. As to the cargo aboard this fleet, which was computed at twenty millions of pieces of eight in gold and silver, besides merchandizes, about fourteen millions of it were taken out before by the enemy; the rest was either taken by the English or Dutch, or left in the Galleons, that were sunk or burnt. The goods were valued at twenty millions of pieces of eight more, of which one fourth part only was saved by the enemy, near two fourths destroyed, and the rest taken by the Confederates, besides a great quantity of plate, and other rich commodities, concealed for the use of private persons in the Galleons, and a great deal of other plate belonging to the French Officers found at Rodondela, of which the Duke of Ormond took possession the next morning, and in which much other plunder was found. The French seamen and soldiers escaped, for the English, having no horse, could not pursue them. The Spaniards appeared at some distance in a great body, but they did not offer to enter into any action with the Duke of Ormond: And it appeared, that the repentment of that proud Nation, which was now governed by French counsels, were so high, that they would not put themselves in any danger, or to any trouble, even to save their own fleet, when it was in such hands.

After this great success, it came under consultation, whether it was not advisable to leave a good Squadron of ships with the land-forces to winter at Vigo, since the neighbourhood of Portugal could supply them with provisions and all other necessaries, and this might encourage that King to declare himself, when there was such a force and fleet lying so near him; and it might likewise encourage such Spaniards, as favoured the Emperor, to declare themselves, when they saw a safe place of retreat, and a force to protect them. Upon these considerations the Duke of Ormond offered to stay, if Sir George Rooke would have consented; but he excused it, alleging, that he had sent home the victuallers with the stores, and therefore could not spare what was necessary for such as should stay there. And indeed he had so ordered the matter, that he could not stay long enough to try, whether they could raise and search the men of war and Galleons, that were sunk; and he was obliged to make all possible haste home, for, if the wind had turned to the East, which was usual in that season, a great part of the ships crews must have perished with hunger.

On the 16th of October, Sir Cloudesley Shovel having joined the Confederate fleet with twenty-nine sail, the land-forces re-embarked the next day; and, on the 19th, Sir George Rooke and Vice-Admiral Hopson, with ten men of war, set sail for England, leaving Sir Cloudesley Shovel with the rest near Vigo, to destroy the enemies ships, that were ran ashore; which being effected, he also steered his course for England, where the fleet arrived (after being separated by a storm at the entrance of the channel) on the 17th of November. Ten days before, Sir George Rooke with his Squadron came into the Downs, and the same day, at four in the afternoon, the Duke of Ormond landed at Deal, and, having given the necessary orders for the landing and quartering the forces, went that night to Canterbury, and arrived at London the next day, being received with great marks of favour by the Queen, and with the loud acclamations of

of the people; the success at Vigo having silenced the clamours about the miscarriages before Cadiz. The Queen gave likewise a noble gratuity to the Lord Shannon and Captain Thomas Hardy, who were sent express by the General and Admiral with the first account of their prosperous attempt; and the Captain, besides a present of a thousand guineas, had the honour of knighthood. On the other hand, Sir Henry Bellasis and Sir Charles O'Hara were, by her Majesty's orders, put under arrest, for having, by their example, promoted and encouraged the plundering of Port St Mary's; but, upon the report of the Generals appointed to examine into that matter, Bellasis only was found guilty, and dismissed from her Majesty's service; and Sir Charles O'Hara was cleared, and his suspension taken off. A proclamation was also issued out, some time before, for discovery and recovery of all such goods, plate, and other effects, as contrary to her Majesty's and the Duke of Ormond's express commands, were plundered or embezzled at Port St Mary's, and from the Gallies taken at Vigo, and put on board her Majesty's men of war and other vessels. But this proclamation had little or no effect, so that the public was not much enriched by this extraordinary capture, though the loss, which the enemy sustained by it, was a vast one; and, to compleat the ruin of the Spanish Merchants, their King seized on the plate, which was taken out of the ships upon their first arrival at Vigo.

Thus ended the campaign very happily for the Allies, and most gloriously for the Queen; whose first year, being such a continued course of success, gave a hopeful presage of what might be hereafter expected.

The Parliament dissolved and a new one called. Barnet.

The Parliament of England was in course to determine six months after the death of the late King; but, before that time expired, the Queen thought fit to exert her Royal prerogative, and to issue out a proclamation, on the 2d of July, for dissolving this present Parliament, and declaring the speedy calling another to be holden at Westminster, the 20th of August next; but afterwards prorogued to the 8th of October, and at last, to the 23d of that month. Her Majesty did not openly interpose in the elections, though, her inclinations to the Tories plainly appearing, all people took it for granted, that she wished they might be the majority. This wrought on the inconstancy and ferility, that is natural to multitudes; and the conceit, which had been infused and propagated with much industry, that the Whigs had charged the Nation with great taxes, of which a large share had been devoured by themselves, had so far turned the tide, that the Tories, in the House of Commons, were at least double the number of the Whigs.

Promotions.

On the 6th of July, the Count de Platens, Envoy Extraordinary from the Elector of Hanover and Zell, had his public audience, both of the Queen, and the Prince; and, about the same time, she made some promotions in the army, and disposed of several places and preferments. Among others, the Earl of Ranelagh was made Receiver and Paymaster-General of her Majesty's forces; William Blatbwayte, Esq; Secretary of War; and the Lord Walden Commissary-General of the Musters; the Duke of Somerfet was made Master of the Horse, in the room of the Earl of Pembroke, who was appointed Lord President of the Council; the Lord Wharton's patent of Warden and Chief Justice in Eyre of all the forests on this side the Trent was revoked; the Duke of Newcastle was made Warden of the Forest of Sherwood in the County of Nottingham. And, upon the 19th of July, the Queen in Council made an order against the selling of offices and places in the household and family.

Prince George of Denmark, being very much indisposed this summer with his usual asthma, was advised by his Physicians to go to the Bath, where the Queen resolved to attend him. They set out, the 26th of August, from Windsor, and lay the first night at Oxford. The Queen was next day present in Convocation, when the University-Orator congratulated her arrival among them; and many of the Nobility and Persons of Quality were made Doctors of Law. From the Convocation the Queen went to the Theatre, where she was entertained with a concert of music, and the rehearsal of several pieces of poetry; and afterwards, with a splendid banquet by the University. Having accepted the usual presents of a Bible, a Common-Prayer-Book, and a pair of Gloves, the Queen and Prince took coach for Cirencester, where they lay that night, and the next day reached the Bath. They were met by the High-Sheriff and Gentlemen on the borders of the County of Somerfet; and, within half a mile of the City, by two hundred maidens, richly dressed, and carrying bows and arrows like Amazons; and at the West-gate of the City, by the Mayor and Corporation in their formalities, who attended them to the Abbey-House, which was prepared for their reception. The Queen likewise, on the 3d of September, visited the City of Bristol, upon an invitation from the Magistrates; and, on the 25th of that month, gave a private audience at Bath to the Baron de Widman, Envoy-Extraordinary from the Elector of Bavaria; and, on the 8th, left that place, and returned to Windsor on the 10th, and to St James's on the 15th, where they received the compliments of the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, upon their safe return.

On Wednesday, the 20th of October, the new Parliament met, and, the Commons having chosen Robert Harley, Esq; their Speaker, the Queen made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

IT is with great satisfaction I meet this Parliament, which I have summoned to assist me, in carrying on the just and necessary war, in which we are engaged. I have called you together as early as was consistent with your convenience in coming out of your several Counties; and I assure myself of such evidences of your affections to me, and your zeal for our common cause, as will not only give spirit and forwardness to our own preparations, but such example and encouragement to our Allies, as, by God's blessing, cannot fail of a good effect, for the advantage of the whole Confederacy.

I have met with so many expressions of joy and satisfaction in all the Counties, through which I have lately had occasion to pass, that I cannot but look upon them as true measures of the duty and affection of the rest of my Subjects.

speech to both Houses,
Pr. H. C.
III. 203.

1702.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I must desire you to grant me such supplies, as will enable me to comply both with our particular treaties and engagements already made, and such others as may be necessary for the encouragement of our Allies, and the prosecuting the war where it shall most sensibly affect our enemies, and be most effectual for disappointing the boundless ambition of France.

"And, that my subjects may the more cheerfully bear the necessary taxes, I desire you to inspect the accounts of the public receipts and payments; and, if there have been any abuses or mismanagements, I hope you will detect them, that the offenders may be punished, and others be deterred by such-like examples from the like practices. I must observe to you, with some concern, that the funds, given by the last Parliament, have, in some measure, fallen short of the sums proposed to be raised by them; and, though I have already paid and applied to the public service the hundred thousand pounds, which I promised to the last Parliament, yet it has not supplied that deficiency.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I cannot without much trouble, take notice to you of the disappointment we have had at Cadiz. I have not yet had a particular account of that enterprise, nor of all the difficulties our forces may have met with there. But I have had such a representation of disorders and abuses committed at Port St Mary's, as hath obliged me to give directions for the strictest examination of that matter.

"I am earnestly desirous, for all our sakes, that this may prove a short Session. However, I hope you will find time to consider of some better and more effectual method to prevent the exportation of wool, and to improve that manufacture, which is of so great consequence to the whole Kingdom. On my part, nothing shall be omitted for its encouragement.

"I am firmly persuaded, that the love and good affection of my subjects is the surest pledge of their duty and obedience; and the truest and justest support of the Throne. And as I am resolved to defend and maintain the Church as by law established, and to protect you in the full enjoyment of all your rights and liberties; so I rely upon your care of me. My interests and yours are inseparable; and my endeavours shall never be wanting to make you all safe and happy."

thanks by
the Lords.*

The Lords returned the usual address of thanks, congratulating the glorious success of her arms, and those of her Allies, under the command of the Earl of Marlborough; but the Commons, who were met full of prejudice against the memory of King William, and of resentment against those employed by him, shewed the first instance of this disposition in their address to the Queen, which was as follows:

Most Gracious Sovereign,

*The Commons
address.
Pr. H. C.
III. 204.*

"WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons in Parliament No. 37. VOL. III.

"ment assembled, do beg leave to lay before your Majesty our most humble and hearty thanks for your most gracious speech from the Throne; which gives us such instances of your Majesty's tender concern for your people, and of your entire confidence in their affections, as must engage them to make your Majesty the utmost returns of duty and gratitude.

"It is great condescension in your Majesty to take notice in so public a manner of the expressions of joy and satisfaction, with which your Majesty was received in all the countries, through which you had occasion lately to pass. All your subjects have already received so many benefits under the influence of your Majesty's happy Government, that your Majesty must have met with the like in any other part of your Dominions, that you had honoured with your Royal presence.

"The late disappointment at Cadiz does the more affect us, because it gives your Majesty so much trouble. But this misfortune cannot make us forget, that the protection and security of our trade, the vigorous support of your Majesty's Allies, and the wonderful progress of your Majesty's arms under the conduct of the Earl of Marlborough, have signally RETRIEVED the ancient honour and glory of the English Nation.

"After your Majesty's repeated assurances, we neither doubt of the full enjoyment of all our rights and liberties, nor of your Majesty's defending and maintaining the Church as by law established. Your Majesty has been always a most illustrious ornament to this Church, and have been exposed to great hazards for it. And therefore we promise ourselves, that, in your Majesty's Reign, we shall see it perfectly restored to its due rights and privileges, and secured in the same to posterity; which is only to be done by divesting those men of the power, who have shewn they want not the will to destroy it.

"The prospect of these blessings, and your Majesty's desire to have the accounts of the public receipts and payments inspected, and to have any abuses and mismanagements thereof punished, will very much endear your Majesty to your people, and encourage us most cheerfully to assist your Majesty with those supplies, that may effectually enable your Majesty to make good such alliances, as shall be necessary to prosecute the war, where it shall most sensibly affect your enemies, and thereby disappoint the boundless ambition of France.

"Your Majesty may safely rely upon the care of your faithful Commons. The value you are pleased to set upon the love and affection of your subjects is the highest obligation, that can be laid on them, to give your Majesty pledges thereof in their duty and obedience. They are and shall always be sensible, that your Majesty's interests and theirs are inseparable; and, and as they gratefully acknowledge your Majesty's great designs to make them safe and happy, so their prayers and sincerest endeavours shall never be wanting to make your Majesty's Reign more prosperous and more glorious than any of your Majesty's Royal Predecessors."

Debate about the word Retrieved.
Burnet.

The word Retrieved in this address, implying, that the honour of the Nation had been lost, occasioned a warm debate. All, who had a just regard for King William, insisted upon the word Maintained instead of it, alledging, that Retrieved was a reflection on the late King's memory, who, instead of losing, had carried the honour of the Nation farther than had been done in any Reign before his: That to him they owed their preservation, their safety, and even the Queen's being on the Throne. That he had designed and formed that great Confederacy, at the head of which her Majesty was now set. In opposition to this it was urged, that, during his Reign, things had been conducted by strangers, and trusted to them; and that a vast treasure had been spent in unprofitable campaigns in Flanders. The Partition-treaty, and every thing else, with which his Reign could be loaded, was brought into the account; and the keeping of the word Retrieved in the address was carried by a majority of one hundred and eighty voices against eighty; all who had any favour at Court, or hoped for any, voting for it (1).

Partiality
in judging controverted elections.
Burnet.

The strength of the Tory-party in the House of Commons appeared not only from this, but also from all the controverted elections being determined in their favour, with such an open partiality, that it shewed the party to be resolved upon every thing that might serve their ends. Of this there were two remarkable instances. The one was of the borough of Hindon near Salisbury; in which, upon a complaint of bribery, the proof was so full and clear, that they ordered a bill to disfranchise the town for that bribery; and yet, because the bribes were given by a man of their party, they would not pass a vote on him as guilty of it; so that a borough was voted to lose its right of electing, because many in it were guilty of a corruption, in which no man appeared to be an actor. The other was of more importance. Mr John How stood for Knight of the Shire for Gloucestershire, and had drawn a party in that County to join with him in an address to the Queen, in which reflections were made on the danger and ill usage, which her Majesty had gone through in the former Reign. This address was received by the Queen in so particular a manner, that it looked like owning the contents thereof to be true; but she made such an excuse for this, when the offence it gave was laid before her, that probably she was not acquainted with the matter of the address, when she so received it. 1702.

Upon this great opposition was made to Mr How's election; and, when it came to the poll, it appeared, that he had lost it. The Sheriff was then moved for a scrutiny, to examine, whether all those, who had sworn, that they were freeholders of forty shillings a year had sworn true. By the act of Parliament the matter was referred to the parties oath, and their swearing falsely was declared perjury; therefore such, as had sworn falsely, were liable to a prosecution: But by all laws an oath is looked upon as an end of controversy, till he, who swore, is convicted of perjury; and the Sheriff being an officer named by the Court, if he had a power to review the poll, this put the election of Counties wholly in the power of the Crown. Yet upon this occasion the heat of a party prevailed so far, that they voted Mr How duly elected.

The House of Commons very unanimously, Supplies granted. and with great dispatch, agreed to all the demands of the Court, and voted all the supplies that were necessary for carrying on the war (2). On the Lord-Mayor's day, the Queen dined at Guildhall, and conferred the honour of Knighthood on several persons (3). The next day, the Lord Shannon brought the news of the success at Vigo; and, four days after, the Queen acquainted the Commons, that, having appointed the 12th of November for a day of thanksgiving, for the signal success of her arms under the Earl of Marlborough and the Duke of Ormond, and of her fleet under Sir George Rooke, she intended to go to St Paul's Church, and had given orders for providing convenient places in the Church for the Members of that House, as well as for the House of Lords. At the day appointed, the Queen went in great state to St Paul's, attended by both Houses of Parliament. The Duke of Ormond, happening to be the Staff-Officer in waiting, rid in one of the Queen's coaches, with the Duke of Somerset, and received the loud acclamations of an infinite number of spectators, with which he seemed pleased; and from that day may be dated the great popularity which he afterwards acquired, and which, in the end, proved fatal to him. The next day, the House of Lords returned him thanks for his services performed at Vigo; and, at the same time, resolved to address the Queen, to order the Duke of Ormond and Sir George Rooke to lay before them an account of their proceedings, which was done. The Commons also voted

Proceedings against the Bishop of Worcester
Nov. 18.
Pr. H. C.
III. 209.

At the beginning of the Sessions, Sir John Packington had exhibited a complaint against the Bishop of Worcester and his son Mr Lloyd, for endeavouring to prevent his election. When this complaint was considered by the House of Commons, and the evidence heard, it was unanimously resolved, "That it appeared to the House, that the proceedings of William Lord Bishop of Worcester, his son, and his agents, in order to the hindering the election of a Member of the County of Worcester, had been malicious, unchristian, and arbitrary, in high violation of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of England: That an address be presented to her Majesty, to remove the Bishop from being Lord Almoner;" and they ordered the Attorney-General to prosecute Mr Lloyd, the Bishop's son, for his offences, after his privilege as a Member of the Lower-House of Convocation was expired.

The Lords address upon it.
Pr. H. L.
II. 45.

The Lords, alarmed at these proceedings of the Commons, against a Member of their House, agreed upon the following address to the Queen, "That it was the undoubted right of every Lord of Parliament, and of every subject of England, to have an opportunity of making his defence, before he suffers any sort of punishment; and therefore humbly desired her Majesty, that she would be pleased not to remove the Lord Bishop of Worcester from the place of Lord Almoner, nor to shew any mark of her displeasure towards him, till he be found guilty of some crime by due course of law." This address being presented to the Queen, she returned answer, "That she agreed, that every Peer and Lord of Parliament, and indeed every other person, ought to have an opportunity of being heard to any matters objected against him, before he be punished. That she had not yet received any complaint of the Bishop of Worcester, but she looked upon it as her undoubted right to continue or displace any servant attending upon her own person, when she should think it proper." The Lords, upon this answer, resolved the same day unanimously, "That no Lord of their House ought to suffer any sort of punishment by any proceedings of the House of Commons, otherwise than according to the known and ancient rules and methods of Parliament. But, however, Sir Edward Seymour having attended the Queen with the resolutions and address of the Commons for the removal of the Bishop, she answered, "That she was very sorry, that there was occasion for that address against the Bishop of Worcester; and that she would order, that he should no longer continue to supply the place of her Almoner." Thus that Prelate fell a sacrifice to the resentment of the opposite party.

Rooke made Privy-Counsellor.
His conduct examined.
Burnet.

On the contrary, Sir George Rooke, who was in great esteem with the Tory-party, was sworn of the Privy-Council.

The Duke of Ormond, upon his first arrival from the expedition to Cadix, had complained very openly of Sir George's conduct, and seemed resolved to carry the matter to a public accusation. But the Court found the party, that prevailed in the House of Commons, determined to justify him; so that, to comply with this, he was not only made a Privy-Counsellor, but much pains were taken with the Duke to suppress his resentments. But, tho' he was in a great measure softened, yet he had made his complaints to so many Lords, that they moved the House to examine both his instructions and the journals relating to that expedition; and accordingly a Committee was appointed for that purpose, who sat long upon the enquiry, and examined all the Admirals and Land-officers, as well as Rooke himself, upon the whole progress of that affair. But Rooke was so well supported by the Court and by his party in the House of Commons, that he seemed to dispise all that the Lords could do. It appeared to some, who were very intelligent in naval affairs, from all his motions during the expedition, that he intended to do nothing but amuse and make a shew; and they concluded, from the protection that the Ministry gave him, that they likewise intended no other. He took much pains to shew, how improper a design the descent upon Cadix was, and how fatal the attempt must have proved; and in doing this he arraigned his instructions, and the design, upon which he was sent, with great boldness, and shewed little regard to the Ministers, who took more pains to bring him off than to justify themselves. The Lords of the Committee prepared a report, which was severe upon Rooke, and laid it before the House; but so strong a party was made to oppose every thing that reflected on him, that, though every particular in the report was well proved, yet it was rejected, and a vote was carried in his favour, wherein it was declared, "That Sir George Rooke had done his duty, pursuant to the Councils of war, like a brave Officer, to the honour of the British Nation." The great post of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which was now given to the Duke of Ormond, had so far prevailed with him, that, though the enquiry was set on foot by his means, and upon his suggestions, yet he came not to the House, when it was brought to a conclusion. So that Rooke, being but faintly pushed by him, and most zealously supported by his party, was justified by a vote, though universally condemned by more impartial judges. The behaviour of the Ministry in this matter heightened the jealousies, with which many were possessed; for it was inferred, that they were not in earnest in this whole expedition to Cadix, since, the conduct being so contrary to the instructions, their justifying the one was plainly condemning the other.

On the 21st of November, Mr Secretary Hedges delivered to the Commons a message signed by the Queen, importing, "That her Majesty considering, that there was but a very small provision made for the Prince her husband, if he should survive her; and that she was restrained from increasing the same by the late act of Parliament for settling her revenue, thought it necessary to recommend the making a further provision for the Prince to their consideration." The Prince was many years older than the Queen, and was troubled with an asthma, that every year had ill effects upon his health, and had brought him into great danger this winter; yet the Queen thought it became her to provide for all events. The Commons having taking her message into consideration, Mr Hov moved, that the yearly sum of one hundred thousand pounds should be settled on the Prince, in case he should survive the Queen; and this was seconded by those, who knew how acceptable the motion would be to the Queen, though it was the double of what any Queen of England ever had in jointure; so that it passed without any opposition. But, while it was passing, a motion was made upon a clause in the act, that limited the Succession to the House of Hanover, which provided against Strangers, though naturalized, being capable to hold any employments. This plainly related only to those, who should be naturalized in a future Reign, and had no respect to such as were already naturalized, or should be naturalized, during the present Reign. It was, however, proposed as doubtful, whether, when that family might reign, all, who were naturalized before, should not be incapacitated by that clause from sitting in Parliament, or holding employments; and a clause was offered to exempt the Prince from being comprehended in that incapacity. Against this two objections lay; one was, that the Lords had resolved by a vote (as will hereafter appear) to which the greater number had set their hands, that they would never pass any money-bill sent up to them by the Commons, to which any clause was tacked, that was foreign to the bill. They had done this, to prevent the Commons from joining matters of a different nature to a money-bill, and then pretending, that the Lords could not meddle with it; for this was a method to alter the Government, and bring it intirely into their own hands; by this means, when money was necessary for preserving the Nation, they might force, not only the Lords, but even the Crown itself, to consent to every thing they proposed, by tacking it to a money-bill. It was said, that an incapacity for holding employments, and for sitting in the House of Lords, were things of a different nature from money; so that this clause seemed to many to be a tack; while others thought it was no tack, because both parts of the act related to the same person. The other objection was, that this clause seemed to imply, that persons already naturalized, and in possession of the right of natural born subjects, were to be excluded in the next Reign; though all people knew, that no such thing was intended, when the act of Succession passed. Great opposition was made, for both these reasons, to the passing this clause; but the Queen pressed it with the greatest earnestness, that she had ever yet shewn in any thing whatever. She thought it became her, as a good wife, to have the act passed, in which she might be the more zealous, because it was not thought advisable to move for an act, that should take Prince George into a partnership of the Regal dignity. This matter raised a great heat in the House of Lords. Those, who had been advanced by the late King, and were in his interests, did not think it became them to consent to this, which seemed to be a prejudice, or, at least, a disgrace to those, whom he had raised. But the Court managed the affair so dextrously, that the bill passed with the clause, though it was protested against by several Lords (1); and the Queen was highly displeased with those, who opposed the clause, which had been put into the bill by some in the House of Commons, only because they believed it would be opposed by those, against whom they intended to irritate the Queen.

The Earl of Marlborough being arrived at London, Sir Edward Seymour, two days after, at the head of a Committee appointed by the Commons, waited upon him with the thanks of that House for the great and signal services performed

(1) January the 19th, upon a report from the Committee of the whole House, on the bill to enable her Majesty to settle a revenue upon the Prince of Denmark, in case he survived her, that they had gone through the bill, and had left out one clause, which enacted, that, in case of the Prince's surviving, he might be capable to be of the Privy-Council, a Member of this House, or to enjoy any office, the Grants herein mentioned, or any other, notwithstanding the act of Succession in the 12th of the late King. And the question being put, Whether to agree with the Committee in leaving out this clause? It was resolved in the negative.

Dissentient.

1. We do dissent from this clause, because we conceive this is a bill of aid and supply; and that this clause is altogether foreign to, and different from, the matter of the said bill: and that the passing of such a clause is therefore unparliamentary, and tends to the destruction of the Constitution of this Government.

2. Because we conceive, that a Parliamentary expedient might have been found, Whereby his Royal Highness might, by an unanimous consent, have all the advantages designed him by this bill, without the Lords being obliged to depart from what we conceive to be their undoubted right.

3. Because we conceive, that this clause was not necessary to enable his Royal Highness to enjoy the benefit of the said Grants.

4. Because that the clause, which pretends to capacitate his Royal Highness to enjoy his Peerage, notwithstanding the act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the Subject, and which makes no provision for other Peers, under the same circumstances, may tend much to their prejudice.

We dissent from the clauses relating to the Grants:

1. Because the said Grants are not laid before the House (though desired) by which we are ignorant upon what considerations the same were granted.

2. Because we conceive, that the saving clauses are so far from having any relation to his Royal Highness, that if they signify any thing (without any respect to him) they prefer their payment before his.

1702. formed by him for the Nation. The Queen likewise was pleased to declare before a Committee of the Council, 'That she was so satisfied of the eminent services of my Lord Marlborough to the public and to herself, both in the command of the army, and the intire confidence he had settled between Her and the States-General, that she intended to make him a Duke.' Nor did the Queen's favour stop here, for, to support this new dignity, she sent a message to the House of Commons, importing, 'That she had thought fit to grant the title of a Duke of this Kingdom to the Earl of Marlborough, and to the heirs male of his body; and also a pension of five thousand pounds per annum upon the revenue of the Post-office, for the support of this honour during her Majesty's natural life. That if it had been in her power, she would have granted the same term in the pension, as in the honour; and that she hoped they would think it so reasonable in this case, as to find some proper methods of doing it.' This message occasioned great debates in the House; and Sir Christopher Musgrave in particular said, 'That he would not derogate from the Duke's eminent services, but insisted that he was very well paid for them;' and then took notice of the profitable employments enjoyed by Him and his Ducheſs. As soon as the Duke was informed of this, he waited on her Majesty, and prayed her, 'rather to forego her gracious message on his behalf, than to create any uneasiness on his account, since it might embarrass her affairs, and be of ill consequence to the public.' And, there being no probability, that the Commons would comply with the Queen's desire, she sent another message to acquaint them, That the Duke of Marlborough had declined her message to them. However, the same day, the Commons being in a grand Committee, a motion was made for an address, containing the reasons, why they could not comply with her Majesty's first message. This motion being agreed to, the address was drawn, and presented to the Queen by the whole House in these words:

Most Gracious Sovereign,

Address on account of the Queen's message.
Dec. 21. WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons in Parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to declare our unanimous satisfaction in the just esteem your Majesty has been pleased to express of the eminent services performed by the Duke of Marlborough, who has not only by his conduct of the army retrieved the ancient honour and glory of the English Nation, but by his negotiations established an intire confidence and good correspondence between your Majesty and the States-General, and therein vindicated the gentlemen of England, who had, by the vile practices of designing men, been traduced, and industriously represented as false to your Majesty's Allies, because they were true to the interest of their Country.

It is to their inexpressible grief, that your Majesty's most dutiful Commons find any instances, where they are unable to comply with what your Majesty proposes to them; but they beg leave humbly to lay before your Majesty the apprehensions they have of making a precedent for the alienation of the revenue of the Crown, which has been so much reduced by the exorbitant Grants of the last Reign, and which has been so lately settled and secured by your Majesty's unparalleled grace and goodness.

We are infinitely pleased to observe, by your Majesty's late gracious acceptance of the Duke of Marlborough's services, that the only way, to obtain your Majesty's favour, is to deserve well from the public; and we beg leave to assure your Majesty, that, whenever you shall think fit to reward such merit, it will be to the intire satisfaction of your people.

To this address, which reflected so highly on the late King's Person and reign, the Queen only answered, 'That she should always think herself much concerned to reward those, who deserved well of her; and that, on this account, she had bestowed some favours on the Duke of Marlborough, and was glad to find they thought them well placed.' However, great liberty was taken of reflecting upon the Queen as well as the Duke for this transaction; and a satirical piece was handed about, wherein among other things, it was affirmed, 'That her Majesty designed to give one Duke * all Marlborough's gold, which the other † had brought home from Vigo (1).'

In the beginning of January, the Queen sent a message to the Commons, 'That the States-General had renewed their applications to her Majesty, to assist them in this time of danger with an augmentation of her forces (2), as the only means to disappoint the great and early Lambers, Vol. II. Burnet.

(1) As this proceeding of the Queen demonstrates the great influence the Duke and Ducheſs of Marlborough had then over her, so it is thought, the refusal of the Commons, to comply with the Queen's desire, began to alienate the Duke from the Tories. It is remarkable, that this circumstance is mentioned neither by Bishop Burnet, in his History, nor by the Ducheſs of Marlborough, in the Vindication of her Conduct.

(2) The States had represented the necessity of this augmentation to the Earl of Marlborough, before he left Holland, in order that some resolution might be taken for that purpose in England. The Earl acknowledged the necessity of such a resolution, and promised, that, at his return to London, he would use his utmost endeavours in that respect. It was observed to his Lordship, that at least it was better to augment the land-forces, than to have forty thousand seamen voted by the House of Commons; since, that sixty English ships would be sufficient, with thirty Dutch, to command the seas, twenty or five and twenty thousand seamen would be enough to man them, and the rest of the expence might be employed in land-forces. Upon these heads, the States-General ordered their Ambassadors to present a memorial to the Queen, importing, that the ill success at Cadix did not discourage them, but that they were ready to redouble their efforts, if her Majesty should think proper; and, at the same time, congratulating her upon the success of the fleet at Vigo, and thanking her for the assistance, which she had given them, by her troops under the command of the Earl of Marlborough, and representing to her the necessity of augmenting them, especially, as they were informed, that France would augment their troops by the addition of eighty thousand men. This memorial 1702. 'early preparations of the French.' Upon which it was resolved, 'That ten thousand men be hired for an augmentation of the forces to act in conjunction with the Allies, but upon condition, that there be an immediate stop put to all commerce and correspondence with France and Spain on the part of the States-General.' This resolution being formed into an address, and laid before the Queen, her Majesty answered, 'That she made no doubt but that condition would be approved, since it was so absolutely necessary for the good of the whole Alliance; and that she would send that night directions to her Ministers in Holland, to concur with the States in providing the troops accordingly.' The Lords also addressed the Queen on the same subject, and to the same effect; to which her Majesty returned the like answer. The chief reason, why both Houses insisted upon an immediate prohibition of all commerce and correspondence with France and Spain, was the great difficulty, under which the Court of France laboured at this juncture, to make remittances of money to their forces in Italy, and to the Elector of Bavaria in Germany; which indeed the French could not do without the assistance of the English, Dutch, and Geneva Merchants, as appeared by a discovery made about this time by the Earl of Nottingham, on an unlawful intercourse of bills of exchange between some French Bankers at Paris and some London Merchants. However, though the insisting upon this prohibition was a thing reasonable in itself, yet the manner, in which it was managed, shewed an ill disposition to the Dutch, who, in the debate concerning it in the House of Commons, were treated very indecently; and the imposing it upon them, in the way in which it was pressed, carried in it too high a strain of authority over them. Theirs is a country, which does not subsist by any intrinsic wealth of their own, but by their trade; and therefore some seemed to hope, that the opposition, which would be raised on that head, might force a peace, which many persons in England were driving at so indecently, that they took little care to conceal it. The States resolved to comply with England in every thing; and, though they did not like the manner of demanding this, yet they readily consented to it; and accordingly the prohibition of all commerce with France and Spain was published by them, commencing from the 1st of June, 1703.

The Toleration-act, passed in the first year of the late Reign in favour of the Protestant Dissenters, was looked upon with regret by many Church-men. King William was no sooner dead, than the Dissenters felt the effects of the change. They that bore them ill will before, and were ready to reflect on them upon all occasions, now openly triumphed. Sermons were preached, and pamphlets dispersed, to blacken them as much as possible, and such a violent temper discovered itself on a sudden, and such an inclination to heat and fury, as plainly shewed the parties affected to have been kept under a sort of restraint. The debate about occasional Conformity, which had been raised in the foregoing Reign, was now received with great warmth. Before the new Parliament met, a pamphlet came out with this title, The Establishment of the Church, the Preservation of the State, shewing the reasonableness of a bill against occasional Conformity: In which the author undertook to prove, that a civil discouragement of Dissenters would be highly agreeable to Religion: That their objections, as to cruelty, and with respect to conscience, had nothing in them: And that the countenancing them would be as little politic memorial had no effect; but her Majesty's Envoy presented to the States-General the following memorial, in answer to that of their Ambassadors:

High and mighty Lords,

'The under-written Envoy Extraordinary of the Queen of Great-Britain is ordered to represent to your High Mightinesses, That her Majesty, having seen and considered the Memorial of your Ambassadors and Envoy Extraordinary, dated the 19th of November, wherein they thank her Majesty, in the name of your High Mightinesses, for the assistance, which has been given you by her Majesty's troops, under the command of the Earl of Marlborough; and, at the same time, congratulate her Majesty upon the success of the fleet and her troops, in conjunction with those of her Allies, in the happy attempt upon Vigo; desiring, that the troops in Flanders may be completed, augmented, and early in the field next year: Her Majesty has ordered the said Envoy to acquaint your High Mightinesses, that her Majesty thanks you sincerely for your obliging acknowledgments towards her, on occasion of the assistance under the command of the said Earl of Marlborough; and that she is extremely well satisfied, that their success has been so considerably to the advantage of your High Mightinesses, by extending and fortifying your frontier. That her Majesty congratulates you likewise on account of the share, which your fleet and troops had in the glorious action at Vigo. That she will take care, that the troops in the Low-Countries be effectually recruited, and provided with all things necessary, in order that they may take the field early the next year. That the measures relating to the number of her Majesty's troops, which ought to be employed in conjunction with those of your High Mightinesses in the Low-Countries, having been taken into consideration in the Parliament, before any mention was made of augmenting them, that affair, according to the rules and method of their proceedings, could not be laid before them; but that all possible care should be taken, that the rest of her Majesty's forces, both by sea and land, should be employed in such a manner, as should appear to be most proper for making the greatest diversion to the enemy, in other parts, and for obtaining the end, that your High Mightinesses propose: And, for that purpose, her Majesty is desirous, that the most proper methods may be concerted between Her and your High Mightinesses; and that you will please to give instructions to some persons for regulating the operations of such expedients, as may most annoy the enemy, and be of most advantage to the common cause."

Hague, Decemb. 5, 1702.

STANHOPE.

The Envoy presented this Memorial at the persuasion of the Pensionary, in order that the States-General might take occasion, from thence, to renew their instances; which they accordingly did, by their Ambassadors. But the Queen persisted in refusing to lay the proposal for the augmentation of the troops before the House of Commons; upon pretence, that the true course of Parliaments did not permit the proposing of new levies, after the state of the war had been once settled; and that this could not be done, without pro-roguing

1702. tic as pious. This was soon followed by another, called, The case of Toleration recognized; in which, a strenuous motion was made for the adding farther conditions to the Toleration, and especially, that of incapacitating such, as had benefited by it for all civil employments. It was dedicated to the Earl of Marlborough, who, as has been observed, was looked upon as a Tory, and, consequently, as one of unsuspected zeal for the Church. Matters being thus prepared without doors, the indiscretion of a Lord-Mayor, in the late Reign, was made the pretence of bringing in a bill in Parliament, against occasional Conformity. It seems, Sir Humphry Edwin, who was a Dissenter, being Lord-Mayor in the year 1697, carried the City-sword with him once to a Meeting at Pinner's-Hall. As this was exclaimed against at the time it was done, so now it was urged as a reason to prevent the like for the future. Accordingly, on the 4th of Novem- ber, Mr Bromley, Mr St John (afterwards Lord Bolbroke) and Mr Annesley (afterwards Earl of Anglesey) were ordered to bring in a bill for preventing Occasional Conformity. It was read a second time, the 17th of November, and, a motion being made for exempting Protestant Dissenters from such offices, as cannot by law be executed, without receiving the Sacrament according to the usage of the Church of England, it was carried in the negative. In the preamble of the bill, the Toleration was asserted, and all persecution for conscience-sake condemned, in a high strain. But, how the enacting part could be reconciled with this preamble, is hard to conceive (1). For by this bill all those, who took the Sacrament and Test (which, by the act passed in 1673, was made necessary to those, who held offices of trust, or were Magistrates in Corporations, but was only to be taken once by them) and did, after that, go to the Meetings of roguing the Parliament, which would intirely annul what had been already done, and would cause an irreparable damage. As this excuse did not appear sufficient, especially, as, under the late King, there had been instances contrary to the custom alleged by the Queen, the answer, which Mr Secretary Hedges gave, in the name of her Majesty, to the Dutch Ambassadors, was examined with great care and attention. Which answer was as follows:

'The Queen, having seen and considered the Memorial of your Excellencies, dated the 1st of this month, has ordered, that the following answer be given it: That her Majesty has nothing more at heart, than to do every thing, that depends upon her, to support the interests of the States-General, which she will always consider as her own. And though, by the forms of Parliament, no effect can be hoped for from proposing to them the raising of new troops to serve in the Low-Countries, without a prorogation of the Parliament, which will intirely destroy all that has been done, and cause an irreparable damage; yet her Majesty has thought of such other expedients, as may effectually support them, or convince them, that nothing shall be wanting, on her part, to assure them of her real concern and care for their security and prosperity. And, for this purpose, her Majesty being assured of the concurrence of her Parliament, in maintaining such new Alliances, as she shall make for her own interest, and that of her Allies, she ardently wishes, that the States-General would immediately concur with her, in sending Ministers to the King of Sweden, to induce him to agree to a peace; in which case her Majesty, in conjunction with the said States, will take into her pay 12000 Swedes, and 8000 Saxons. And, considering the present situation of the King of Sweden, her Majesty hopes, that this negotiation may be finished with such expedition, that the said troops may be in Holland, as soon as shall be necessary for the ensuing campaign. Her Majesty next proposes, that all kinds of means ought to be used, to recover the Elector of Bavaria, by an amicable accommodation; and, for this purpose, to persuade the Emperor to gratify him with those things, which may probably give him satisfaction. And her Majesty is very desirous, in concert with her Allies, to contribute to the necessary subsidies for enabling that Duke to employ his troops in the service of the Allies, in order, by that means, to make such a diversion to France, as may effectually break their designs against the Sates. And besides, as the success of such negotiations is uncertain, as well as of that of Portugal, though her Majesty has reason to hope, that the latter is 'in a good train of being happily concluded, her Majesty instantly desires the States-General to join, with all possible expedition, such a number of their ships to those of her Majesty, in order to send a squadron to the Mediterranean, her Majesty being disposed to embark on board those ships all the troops, which she can spare in England, which, in conjunction with some of the States-General, may make such attempts as shall be agreed upon, as the most proper for making the greatest diversion to France, and most effectually preventing the superiority of that Kingdom in the Low-Countries. And, if there be any other expedient, which the States can think of, and is practicable for her Majesty to join in it, she will receive it with joy, being resolved to omit nothing that can contribute to their security and satisfaction.'

Whitehall, Decemb. 3, 1702. CH. HEDGES.

In the examination of this answer, it seemed, as if the Queen had conceived in her mind some prejudice of the States-General; which might perhaps arise from their not having given the command of the armies to Prince George, as she had wished might be done. Others were of opinion, that this answer was suggested by the Earl of Rochester, who, being ambitious of having the ascendant in the Administration of affairs, looked with a jealous eye upon the glory, which the Earl of Marlborough had gained in the last campaign, and which had induced the Commons, in their address, to stile him the Retriever of the honour of the Nation. They imagined, therefore, that, to prevent him from gaining new laurels, the Earl of Rochester had insinuated into the Queen so far, as to persuade her to give the answer above-mentioned to the Dutch Ambassadors. But others had no manner of doubt, that the Queen's design in that answer was only to captivate the esteem of her Subjects, by shewing how zealous she was for their ease, and how averse to the laying new burdens on them. It is not improbable, that all these three reasons might have more or less influence in this answer.

(1) The bill began thus: 'As nothing is more contrary to the profession of the Christian Religion, and particularly to the Doctrine of the Church of England, than persecution for conscience only; and, in due consideration of it, an act passed in the first year of King William and Queen Mary, for the exempting their Majesties Protestant subjects, dissenting from the Church of England, from the penalties of certain laws; which act ought inviolably to be observed, and ease given to consciences truly scrupulous.' How this is reconcilable with an exclusion from all offices and places of trust, purely on a religious account, cannot easily be made appear.

1702. of Dissenters, or any Meeting for religious worship, that was not according to the Liturgy or Practice of the Church of England, where five persons were present more than the family, were disabled from holding their employments, and were to be fined one hundred pounds, and five pounds a day for every day, in which they continued to act in their employments, after their having been at any such meeting. They were also made incapable to hold any other employment, till after one whole year's Conformity to the Church, which was to be proved at the Quarter-Sessions. Upon a relapse, the penalties and time of incapacity were doubled. No limitation of time was put in the bill, nor of the way, in which the offence was to be proved. But, whereas the Test-act only included the Magistrates in Corporations, all the inferior Officers or Freemen in Corporations, who were found to have some interests in the elections, were now comprehended in this bill. Some thought the bill was of no consequence, and that, if it should pass into a law, it would be of no effect: But that the occasional Conformists would become constant ones. Others thought, that this was such a breaking in upon the Toleration, as would undermine it, and that it would have a great effect on corporations; as, indeed, the intent of it was believed to be the modelling elections, and by consequence of the House of Commons.

Great debates
about it.
Burnet.

On behalf of the bill, it was said, the design of the Test-Act was, that all in office should continue in the Communion of the Church; that coming only once to the Sacrament for an office, and going afterwards to the Meetings of Dissenters, was both an eluding the intent of the law, and a profanation of the Sacrament, which gave great scandal, and was abhorred by the better sort of Dissenters. Those, who were against the bill, said, the Nation had been quiet ever since the Toleration, the Dissenters had lost more ground and strength by it than the Church: The Nation was now engaged in a great war; it seemed therefore unreasonable to raise animosities at home, in matters of Religion, at such a time; and to encourage a tribe of Informers, who were the worst sort of men: The fines were excessive, higher than any laid on Papists by law; and, since no limitation of time, nor concurrence of witnesses, was provided for in the bill, men would be forever exposed to the malice of a bold swearer or wicked servant: It was moved, since the greatest danger of all was from Atheists and Papists, that all such, as received the Sacrament for an office, should be obliged to receive it three times a year, which all were by law required to do; and to keep to their Parish-Church, at least one Sunday a month; but this was not admitted. All, who pleaded for the bill, did in words declare for the continuance of the Toleration, yet the sharpness, with which they treated the Dissenters in all their speeches, shewed as if they designed their extirpation. The bill, on the 28th of November, passed the House of Commons by a great majority, and was carried up by Mr Bromley, on the 2d of December, to the Lords. That House being apprehensive, that the Commons might (as they had done on several occasions) tack their bill to some money-bill, made a vote: 'That the annexing any clause to a money-bill was contrary to the Constitution of the English Government, and 1702. 'the usage of Parliament;' and ordered this vote to be added to the roll of the standing order of their House. The debates upon the occasional bill held longer, in the House of Peers, than they had done in the House of Commons. Many were against it, because of the high penalties: Some remembered the practices of Informers, in the end of King Charles's Reign, and would not consent to the reviving such infamous methods; all believed, that the chief design of this bill was, to model Corporations, and to cast out of them all those, who would not vote in elections for Tories. The Toleration itself was visibly aimed at, and this was only a step to break in upon it. Some thought, the design went yet further, to raise such quarrels and distractions among us, as would so embroil us at home, that our Allies might see, they could not depend upon us; and that we, being weakened by the disorders, occasioned by those prosecutions, might be disabled from carrying on the war, which was the chief thing driven at, by the promoters of the bill. So that many of the Lords, as well as the Bishops, agreed in opposing this bill, though upon different views: Yet they consented to some parts of it; chiefly, that such as went to Meetings, after they had received the Sacrament, should be disabled from holding any employments, and be fined in twenty pounds; many went into this, though they were against every part of the bill, because they thought this the most plausible way of losing it: Since the House of Commons had of late set it up for a maxim, that the Lords could not alter the fines, that they should fix in a bill, this being a meddling with money, which they thought was so peculiar to them, that they would not let the Lords, on any pretence, break in upon it.

The Lords, hereupon, appointed a very exact search to be made into all the Rolls, that lay in the Clerk of the Parliament's Office, from the middle of King Henry the Seventh's Reign, down to the present time: And they found, by some hundreds of precedents, that in some bills the Lords began the clauses, that set the fines; and that, when fines were set by the Commons, sometimes they altered the fines, and, at other times, they changed the use, to which they were applied: The report made of this was so full and clear, that there was no possibility of replying to it, and the Lords ordered it to be entered into their books. But the Commons were resolved to maintain their point, without entering into any debate upon it. The amendments of the Lords were mostly alterations of words and expressions, except this of the alteration of the penalties; and another by which they disowned, that it was the intention of the law, when it provided, that every person to be admitted to office should receive the Sacrament, that such person was obliged to be intirely conformable to the Church. To which amendment the Commons disagreed, as well as to the alteration of the penalties. The Lords also added five clauses, by the first of which information was to be given of the offence within ten days, and the prosecution to be within three months, and the conviction upon the oath of at least two credible witnesses. To this the Commons agreed, but to the other four clauses they would not consent, that Dissenters should not be compelled to hold any office, for which they could not

1702. not be legally qualified without taking the Sacrament: That the University-Churches might be exempted, where sermons were preached without prayers: That such as went to the French and Dutch Churches might be excepted: And that Governors of Hospitals, and Assistants of Corporations and Workhouses for the poor, might also be exempted. The affair depended long between the two Houses, and both sides took pains to bring up the Lords that would vote with them, by which means there were above a hundred and thirty Lords in the House, the greatest number that ever had been brought together.

The Court put their whole strength to carry this bill; Prince George came and voted for it, though he was himself an occasional Conformist. For he had received the Sacrament as Lord High-Admiral, and yet kept his Chapel in the Lutberan way (1). The Earl of Marlborough and the Lord Godolphin also were for the bill. After some Conferences, wherein each House had yielded some smaller differences to the other, it came to a free Conference, on the 16th of January, in the Painted Chamber, which was the more crowded upon that occasion than had ever been known; so much weight was laid on this matter on both sides. The Managers, on the part of the Commons, were Mr Bromley, Mr St John, Mr Finch, Mr Solicitor-General, and Sir Thomas Powis. On the part of the Lords, the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Peterborough, the Bishop of Salisbury, the Lord Sommers, and the Lord Halifax (2).

When the Conference was over, the Commons left the bill with the Lords, and said, that they hoped they would not let the public lose the benefit of so good a law. Then the Managers returned to their respective Houses. When it came to the final vote of adhering, the Lords were so equally divided, that, in three questions put upon different heads, the Adhering was carried but by one vote in every one of them, and it was a different person that gave it in all the three divisions. Upon this, the bill was delivered to the Commons according to form, at a free Conference, and they were told, that the Lords adhered to their amendments. As the Commons likewise adhered to their disagreement with the Lords amendments, the bill was lost for this time. The Lords ordered their proceedings in this affair to be published, and the Commons followed their example. This bill seemed to favour the interests of the Church, and therefore the warm men were for it. The greater number of the Bishops being against it, they were censured, as cold in the concerns of the Church: A reproach, that all moderate men must expect, when they oppose violent motions. Great part of this censure fell upon the Bishop of Salisbury; for he bore a large share in the debates, both in the House of Lords and at the free Conference. Angry men took occasion, from the loss of this bill, to charge the Bishops as enemies to the Church, and betrayers of its interests, because they would not run blindfold into the passions and designs of ill-tempered men; whereas they thought they faithfully pursued

(1) It was reported, the Prince should say to the Lord Wharton, when he was about to divide against him, My heart is with you.

(2) The substance of what passed, at this free Conference, was as follows:

The Managers for the Commons alleged, 'That the intent of this bill was only to restrain a scandalous practice, which was a reproach to Religion, and gave offence to all good Christians, and to the best among the Dissenters themselves. That it enacted nothing NEW, and was only intended to make the laws in being more effectual. That this bill appeared to the Commons absolutely necessary for the preventing those mischiefs which must prove destructive to the Church and Monarchy. That an established Religion and a national Church are absolutely necessary, when so many ill men pretended to Inspiration, and when there were so many weak men to follow them. That the only effectual way to preserve this national Church, was by keeping the Civil Power in the hands of those whose principles and practices are conformable to it. That the Parliament, by the Corporation and Test-acts, thought they had secured our Establishment, and provided a sufficient barrier to disappoint any attempts against them, by enacting, that all in offices should receive the Sacrament according to the usage of the Church of England, and never imagined a set of men could at any time rise up, whose consciences were too tender to obey the laws, but hardened enough to break them. That, as the last Reign began with an act in favour of the Dissenters, so the Commons did desire, that in the beginning of her Majesty's auspicious Reign, an act might pass in favour of the Church of England, That those men might be kept out of offices, who have shown they never wanted the will, when they had the power, to destroy the Church. And that this bill did not in any respect trench on the act of Toleration, or take from the Dissenters any one privilege they have by law, or give any one privilege to the Church of England, Numb. XXXVIII. VOL. III.

' As to the several particular amendments made by the Lords, the Managers for the Commons insisted upon it, That, if the laws provided, that they that had offices should receive the Sacrament, and by that intended a Conformity; then whosoever breaks the intentions of the law, breaks the law, or at least evades it; and that it was fit to provide against such a practice. That, if the intention of the Test-act was the reason to provide against such evaders of it, the like intention in the Corporation-act would serve for a reason to provide against the evaders of that. That, by occasional Conformity, the Dissenters might let themselves into the Government of all Corporations; and that it was obvious how far that would influence the Government of the Kingdom. That to separate from a Church, which has nothing in it against a man's conscience to conform to, is Schism: And that that is a spiritual sin, without the superadding a temporal law to make it an offence. That occasional Conformity declares a man's conscience will let him conform; and in such a man Non-conformity is a wilful sin. And why should occasional Conformity be allowed in Corporations, when the Lords agreed, that out of Corporations it ought not to be allowed? That, in laying penalties, the Commons would always endeavour to make them such as should neither tempt to perjury, nor totally discourage informations and prosecutions; which they thought the Lords amendment would do, should they agree to it. That the punishment of incapacity, the recapacitating, and the increase of punishment for a second offence, are warranted by many precedents of the like nature in other penal laws. That an incapacity is a very proper punishment; and that a second offence is a Re-lapse and Apostacy, which makes it more heinous than the first offence, and therefore deserves an increase of punishment. That he is indeed reduced to a very unhappy condition, who is made incapable

De Foe's
pamphlet,
The shortest way
with the Dissenters, burnt, and pilloried.

While the occasional Conformity-bill was depending, Daniel de Foe, who had been a Hosier in the City of London, and had, some years before, published a severe satire, intitled, The True-born Englishman, now undertook to ridicule the immoderate zeal of the Church-party, in a pamphlet, called, The shortest way with the Dissenters: Or, Proposals for the Establishment of the Church. Some, on both sides, were at first amused with it, as questioning what was the design of it; but it was not long before the Author's real intention was discovered. He began with such bitter reflections on the Dissenters, and their Principles, that it was taken for the work of a violent Churchman for some time, and met with applause from some of that party in the two Universities. The Author, after his reflections, proceeds to tell the world, that the Representatives of the Nation had now an opportunity, and perhaps the only one they should ever have, to secure the Church of England, and destroy her enemies, under the favour and protection of a true English Queen: That this was the time to pull up this heretical weed of sedition, that had so long disturbed the peace of the Church, and poisoned the good corn: That, if it should be objected, that this renewing fire and faggot would be cruelty, and accounted barbarous, he answered, that it is cruelty to kill a snake or a toad in cold blood; but the poison of their nature makes it a charity to our neighbours to destroy those creatures, not for any personal injury received, but for prevention: Not for the evil

they have done, but the evil they may do. And that, as serpents, toads, and vipers are noxious to the body, and poison the sensitive life, so the Dissenters poison the soul, corrupt our posterity, inslave our children, destroy the vitals of our happiness, our future felicity, and contaminate the whole mass; and therefore they are to be rooted out of this Nation, if ever we would live in peace, serve God, and enjoy our own.

The Commons, after the Author and his design was discovered, ordered the pamphlet to be burnt by the common hangman, and de Foe to be prosecuted. He pleaded for himself, that he gave the violent Churchmen but their language, or, at least, the sense of their own expressions, when they talked of hanging out bloody colours and banners of defiance; and shewed what many of their pamphlets and sermons, as well as their conversation tended to. But de Foe was fined two hundred pounds, and put in the pillory. The Earl of Nottingham is said to offer him mercy, whilst in Newgate, if he would discover who let him to write this pamphlet.

The Commons had now passed a bill in favour of those, who had not taken the oath abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales, by the day, that was named; granting them a year longer to consider of it; for it was said, that the whole party was now come intirely into the Queen's interests; though, on the other hand, it was given out, that Agents were come from France, on design to persuade all persons to take the abjuration, that they might become capable of employments, and so might in time be a majority in Parliament; and by that means the act of Succession, and the oath imposed by it, might of serving his Prince and Country: But in the present case both Prince and Country would be in a more unhappy condition, to be served by such, whose principles are inconsistent with the good and welfare of the Establishment. That the Toleration was intended only for the ease of tender and scrupulous consciences, and not to give a licence for occasional Conformity. That Conforming and Non-conforming are contradictions; nothing but a firm persuasion, that the terms of Communion required are sinful and unlawful, could justify the one, and that that plainly condemns the other. That the exempting Dissenters from serving offices would rather establish occasional Non-conformity, than prevent occasional Conformity; and therefore increase and not cure the evil the bill was intended to remedy. That the Act of Uniformity had provided for the sermons or lectures in the Universities; and that therefore the acts against Conventicles in the 16 and 22 Car. II. made no particular exceptions for them, and yet they were never taken to be Conventicles. That the exempting such, as should be present at the Foreign Reformed Churches, would be to open a door to evade this law. And that the places of Governors of some hospitals are very considerable preferments, and given as such to the Clergy of the Church of England; and that the Commons could never consent by any law, to let in the Dissenters to the enjoyment of them.

The Managers for the Lords on the other hand declared, that, 'By agreeing so far as they had done to this bill, they had gone a great way for preventing the evil it was intended to remedy; and owned it to be a scandal to Religion, that persons should conform only for a place. That they did not think going to a Meeting to be malum in se, for that the Dissenters are Protestants, and differ from the Church of England only in some little forms, and therefore they thought loss of office a sufficient punishment without an incapacity. That it could never be thought those of the better sort would be guilty of this offence; if they were, they should lose their offices: That in inferior Officers of the Customs and Excise, who had little else to subsist on, loss of office was severe enough, since thereby they would be undone. And that this was yet more considerable in Patent places, which by a common custom are bought and sold, and are of the nature of freeholds. That incapacity was too great a penalty; and that it is hard to imagine any offence, that is not capital, can deserve it. That there is no more reason to punish this offence with incapacity, than to make it felony. That the Dissenters are not obnoxious to the Government, as when the corporation-act was made; the most considerable persons amongst them being well affected to the present Constitution, and hearty enemies to the Queen's and the Kingdom's enemies. That in some Corporations they took the election of Members to serve in Parliament to be only in such as are concerned in the government of them, as at Buckingham; and the Lords would not by this bill deprive men of their birth-rights, neither did they think fit to bring any greater hardships upon the Dissenters, since great advantages have accrued from the act of Toleration. That the Lords did equally desire a good correspondence betwixt the two Houses, and were so satisfied of the necessity of Union at this time, that they thought all measures fatal, that might create divisions amongst Protestants at home, or check the necessary Union of the Allies abroad. That in a time of war they thought alterations unnecessary and dangerous, and were unwilling to bring any real hardships upon the Dissenters at this time, or give them any cause of jealousies and fears. That the Toleration had had such good effects, contributed so much to the security and reputation of the Church of England, and produced 1702. might be repealed. When the bill for thus prolonging the time was brought up to the Lords, a clause was added, qualifying those persons, who should, in the new extent of time, take the oaths, to return to their benefices or employments, unless they were already legally filled. When this was agreed, two clauses of much greater consequence were added to the bill. One was, declaring it high-treason to endeavour to defeat the Succession to the Crown, as it was now limited by law, or to set aside the next Succession. This had a precedent in the former Reign, and therefore it could not be denied now. It seemed the more necessary, because there was another person who openly claimed the Crown; so that a farther security might well be insisted upon. This was a great surprize to many, who were visibly uneasy at the motion, but were not prepared for it, and did not see how it could be resisted. The other clause was, for sending the abjuration to Ireland, and obliging all there (in the same manner as in England) to take it. This seemed the more reasonable, considering the strength of the Popish interest there. Both clauses passed in the House of Lords, without any opposition; but it was apprehended, that the Commons would not be so easy; yet, when it was sent to them, they struggled only against the first clause, that barred the return of persons, upon the taking the oaths, into places, that were already filled. The party tried their strength upon this, and, upon their success in it, they seemed resolved to dispute the other clause; but it was carried, though only by one voice, to agree with the Lords. When the clause relating to the Succession was read, Sir Christopher Musgrave tried, if it might not be made a bill by itself, and not put as a clause in another bill; but, seeing the House was resolved to receive both clauses, he did not insist on his motion. Every body was surprized to see a bill, that was begun in favour of the Jacobites, turned so terribly upon them; since by it a new security was given, both in England and Ireland, for a Protestant Successor.

At this time, the Earl of Rocheſter quitted his place

duced to good a temper among Dissenters, That the Lords were unwilling to give the least discredit to that act; Liberty of conscience and gentle measures being most proper, and having been found most effectual toward increasing the Church, and diminishing the number of Dissenters. That some parts of the bill had an air of severity not proper for this season; that a proper time ought to be taken to apply remedies, the attempting too hasty cures having often proved fatal. That, if there had been such danger and necessity, this remedy would have been proposed before. That, if this bill did enact nothing NEW, there would not be such a contest about it. That they did consent to a punishment, but would proportion the penalty to the offence. That they hoped their desires of securing the Toleration-act, the peace and quiet of the Kingdom at home, and the interest of the Nation abroad, would meet with a fair construction. That they thought the only contest between the two Houses was, which should most bestir and take care of the Church; the one would procure a hasty settled submission, not so much to be depended on; the other would obtain for her a more gradual but a safer advantage over Dissenters. That they conceived both the last Reign and this began upon the same bottom and foundation; and that, as in this Reign her Majesty has been pleased to give gracious assurances as to Liberty of conscience, so in the last the Church ever met with protection and support. That it is hard, as well as untrue, to say of the Dissenters, they never wanted the will, when they had the power, to destroy the Church and State; since, in the last and greatest danger the Church was exposed to, they joined with her with all imaginable zeal and sincerity against the Papists, their common enemies; and that ever since they have continued to shew all the signs of friendship and submission to the Government of Church and State. That Toleration and Tenderness had never misſed of procuring Peace and Union, as Persecution had never failed of producing the contrary effects. That the Lords could not think the Dissenters could properly be called Schismatics; that such an opinion allowed would bring an heavy charge upon the Church of England, who by a law have tolerated such a Schism: And that, the Church-men having allowed Communion with the Reformed Churches abroad, it must follow they hold them not guilty of Schism, or could not allow Communion with them. That this bill would inflict a second punishment on them, who fled from France for their Religion. That this might be used as an argument to justify even the Persecution in France. That they could not depart from the clause relating to the Dutch and Walloon churches so long established among us, lest it should give great disgust and offence to the Allies abroad, and at the same time forfeit the greatest character can be given a Church, that of tenderness and charity to Fellow-Christians, &c. That, as to Workhouses, they could not conceive, that the distributing of some Presbyterian bread to the poor, and Dissenting water-gruel to the sick, could ever bring any prejudice to the Church of England: And that they were of opinion, that the Dissenters were coming into the Church, and that nothing but terrifying measures and severity could prevent the happy Union.
